Two firms in Liverpool, connected with the American trade, have failed: Messrs. Pryde & Jones, and Harnden & Co. The liabilities of the latter are estimated from £60,000 to £80,000, about £12,000 of which consists in small bills drawn in Boston and New-York.

The winter emigration continued, and so did the remittances from Irish settlers in America. The quays of Dublin are just now crowded with emigrants, chiefly of the most wretched class of peasantry, from the western counties. The Waterford papers say the emigration from that part is as brisk as ever.

The engrossing topic throughout Europe, in the approaching crisis of affairs in France. The Assembly, despite the recent successes of the unmistakeable popularity of the President, seem resolved to provoke him into direct collision with them, and every step taken by either party is evidently watched with intense interest by the other countries of Europe.

A letter from Hamburg, of the 23d, in the Independence of Belgium, says: A grave event has taken place among the Austrian corps d'armee in Holstein. Many of the regiments composing it consists a great part of Hungarians, and among them are many young men of noble families, who are compelled by the Austrian Government to serve as simple soldiers. In spite the disasters drawn down on unfortunate Hungary by the revolution, these soldiers cannot repress the hatred which animates them, or their desire for a new revolution. The presence in England of the ex-dictator, Kossuth, and his violent diatribes against the Austrian Government and dynasty, have greatly contributed of late to excite the sentiments of hatred of the Hungarian soldiers, and an armed revolt, of which the consequences would have been incalculable in the north, has been on the point of breaking out among them; but it has been prevented by the active surveillance of the superier officers of the Austrian battalions. An agent of Kossuth, and of the revolutionary propaganda of London, the Hungarian Count Potocki, who commanded a regiment at Comorn, during the revolution, was arrested the day before yesterday, by the military authorities Rensburg. He had arrived from London, by way of Paris, under a false name. In his possession were found proclamations inciting the soldiers to revolt, and printed copies of the last public speeches in England by the ex-dictator. It was generally stated in the town, that many officers, (the number is said to be nineteen,) and a great number of non-commissioned officers and soldiers, have also been arrested at Rensburg, for having been accomplices in the projected revolt.

The Vienna correspondent of The Daily News has been expelled from that city and from the Austrian Empire.

An International Copy-right treaty has been signed between France and England.

The Submarine Telegraph is working well. Messages both from London and Liverpool have been transmitted on the same day to Paris, Havre, Vienna, Trieste, Hamburgh, and Ostend, and in one instance a communication was forwarded to Cracow, to be dispatched thence by mail to Odessa.

A Family Poisoned.

One of the most shocking crimes ever committed in this community, says the Cincinnati Nonpareil, was brought to light yesterday. Mr. E. Forest, a resident of High-st., between Collard and Little, made affidavit before the Mayor, against Nancy Farrel, a servant in his family, charging her with having caused the death of his wife and two children by means of poison! He states that about six weeks since his wife was suddenly taken sick, and died within a few hours. It was supposed that the disease was the cholera morbus. About two weeks since, the balance of the family were similarly affected, and one of the children, a boy about eight years of age, died within a few hours. Last Wednesday the family were again seized with vomiting just after partaking of a meal, and James, the youngest child, two years old, soon expired, in great agony. Physicians were called in, who confirmed the opinion of those present, that the family had been poisoned. A post mortem examination was made upon the body of the deceased child, and a quantity of arsenic was found in the contents of the stomach. This left no doubt that Mrs. Forest and the other child had died from the effects of poison administered in their food. From the fact that the servant girl had escaped sickness each time, and from other circumstances, she was instantly suspected of the deed, arrested and lodged in the watch-house. The remaining members of the family have recovered. The girl upon whom this horrid crime is charged, is about eighteen years of age, and has heretofore borne a good character. She denies all knowledge of the poisoning.

REVOLUTIONARY HERO GONE.—THADDEUS BELL, one of the very few survivors of the Revolutionary struggle, paid the debt of nature at Darien, Conn., a short time since. Among other engagements of note, he was present at the burning of Danbury, and took part in the pursuit of the British to their embarkation at Compo. He was one of the congregation who, with their pastor, Dr. Marthen, were seized during divine worship by a band of tories and conveyed to the British head-quarters at New-York. Here he suffered all the horrors of a cruel imprisonment for four months, under jailors influenced by mortified hate. Under these tortures his brother sank and died; and so severely did he suffer, that he had to be conveyed to his home on a litter. During the imprisonment he saw frequently from the window of his cell the notorious Arnold riding out alone, shunned even by those who paid for his treason. He retained his faculties to the last—could read without glasses, and his hearing was as unimpaired as his sight. He died resigned, and in the fullness of faith, leaving his blessing and an honorable name to six surviving sons and daughters, thirty-eight grand and seventy-eight great grand children.

STEAMBOT COLLISION AND LOSS OF LIFE.—On Thursday evening, Nov. 27, about 2 o'clock, a frightful collision took place between the steamers Die Vernon and Archer, resulting in the loss of the latter vessel, with serious loss of life. This accident occurred at Enterprise Island, about five miles above the mouth of Illinois River—the Die Vernon descending, and the Archer ascending, the Mississippi river. The collision was not very violent, but the Archer was an old boat, and it did not require any great force to cut her in two, and she sunk in less than twenty minutes to the cabin floor. All the passengers were on deck, and consisted of persons emigrating to Iowa. The whole number of lives lost by this catastrophe was thirty-four, of whom ten were deck hands or firemen engaged on the boat. One whole family, with two exceptions, were drowned. Their names are given as James Smyers, Sen., James Smyers, Jr., Jane Smyers, Mary Smyers, Caroline Smyers, Margaret Ann Smyers, Sarah Smyers, Ellen Smyers and Susan Dick. The survivors were a little boy named Smyers, picked up by the yawl of the Die Vernon, while floating down the river on a log, and Miss Susan Dick. There was also on board an Irish family, consisting of seven or eight persons, an American family of three or four persons, and five or six other deck passengers, all drowned. The destruction of life by this disaster was the greatest, considering the number of persons on board, which ever occurred on our waters. The officers of the boat were saved, it seems, and the boy and the young lady whose names we have given— and these were all. The Die Vernon sustained very little injury, and after the accident rendered all the assistance in her power to the unfortunate boat and passsengers.

MORMON MORALITY.—The following paragraph from Judge Brocchus' statement in reference to the Mormon difficulties, reveals a state of things the existence of which has been often denied:—

The plurality wife system is in full vogue here. Governor Young is said to have as many as 90 wives. He drove along the streets, a few days since, with 16 of them in a long carriage—15 of them having each an infant at her bosom. It is said that Heber C. Kimball, one of the Triune Council, and the second person in the trinity, has almost an equal number; among them, a mother and her two daughters. Each man can have as many wives as he can maintain, that is, after the women have been picked and culled by the head men. The Judges and Secretary of State have had the honor of being introduced by His Excellency, the Governor, to several of his wives; and also by Heber C. Kimball to several of his.

THE UTICA ARSON CASE.—Gov. Hunt has commuted the sentence of James J. Orcutt, who participated in the house-burning for which Conklin was executed. The grounds of commutation are the youth and ignorance of the prisoner and his timely disclosures after his arrest. The Governor does not for a moment question the justness and correctness of his trial and conviction. And by tempering justice with mercy, in reducing the capital sentence to perpetual imprisonment, in this case, he directly intimates that if any persons are found hardened enough, after Conklin's execution and Orcutt's conviction, to repeat the crime, they must expect to suffer the extreme penalty of the law. FIGHTING IN CHILI.—Advices have been received from Valparaiso, by way of Panama, to Oct. 25: In Chili, the rebel army, 13,000 strong, commanded by Carrera and Arteaga, were met by the Government troops, 850 strong, at Petorca, about 40 leagues from Santiago, on the 14th of Oct. They fought for three hours, and the result was the total defeat of the former, with a loss of 70 killed, 200 wounded, and 400 prisoners, including 36 officers. Carrera and Arteaga have not been taken. The Government army, under Col. Vidaurre, lost 15 killed and 15 wounded.

WATER FOR BROOKLYN.—With a view of furnishing a supply of water for the City of Brooklyn W. J. McAlpine, Esq., State Surveyor, has examined 12 streams within 25 miles, that will afford 42,000,000 gallons of water per day. Four streams within fourteen miles, yield 15,500,000 daily, an ample supply for years to come. It is proposed to bring them to a reservoir at the base of Prospect Hill, Flushing side, and then elevate the water by pumps to the proper hight to supply the city.

SUMMARY.

The extension of the Harlem Railroad to Chatham, forming another railroad connection between New York and Albany and all the Northern roads, is nearly a fact. The fine weather has favored the contractors, and the connection with the Western Railroad at Chatham will be made within probably five days, which is six months earlier than was stipulated in the contract. We believe the best feelings exist between the Hudson River and the Harlem Roads, and that only an honorable competition for the business will be kept up. Each has peculiar advantages, and the public will soon learn which is the better route.

The Literary Echo says that a Mr. Amos Maine, of Rockville, R. I., committed suicide on Sunday, Dec. 7, in a most shocking manner. It appears that he had been suffering from insanity for some time past, and had but lately returned from the Insane Asylum. On Sunday he went into his barn, heaped the hay around him, and then set it on fire, thus burning himself to death. It was not discovered until the barn was so badly burned that it was imposible to save him.

The Utica 'Globe Mills' and the Hotchkissville Manufacturing Company have abandoned the broadcloth business and put their mills on Printed Shawls, adapted to spring and summer use. The styles, both in fabric and printing, are beautiful, and well adapted to our climate, and are highly creditable to the parties who have undertaken this new enterprise.

We have news of grave importance from Mexico. A bill has been introduced in the Senate empowering the Executive to enter into negotiations with the British Government with reference to constructing a ship canal through the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. The terms of the bill propose to give to England a formidable position in reference to this inter-oceanic passage.

Thompson's Bank Note Reporter has the following caution: "We have been compelled to quote as doubtful four of the branches of the Ohio State Bank: Farmers' Branch, Ashtabula; Summit County, Cuayhoga Falls; Licking County, Newark; Toledo Branch. The law authorizing the State Bank System, bound the Branches, collectively, to make good the circulating notes of each individual Branch; so that the bill-holders will lose nothing—but the depositors, draft-holders, etc., must look to the Branch itself for all deficits."

A dispatch from Utica, N. Y., dated Dec. 11, says: The confession of the individual who was executed for arson committed in this city, made its appearance to-day. It claims that many of our citizens, in the best standing, were engaged with him in his hellish act. The confession is not believed in this city. In fact, affidavits contradictory are already issued in the daily papers. The confession of Orcutt will shortly appear, which will be adverse to the truth of that by Concklin, in all cases but one.

A dispatch from Philadelphia, Thursday evening, Dec. 11, says: In the trial of Castner Hannaway for treason (in connection with the Christiana Riots) the Court charged the Jury to-day. At the conclusion of the charge the Jury retired, and after an absence of a few minutes, brought in a verdict of NOT GUILTY! The prisoner was consequently discharged, and the other indictments for treason have been abandoned.

Another Railroad Collision occurred on Monday evening, when the Philadelphia train and the New York train met, about seven miles the other side of Amboy, damaging considerably both engines, and injuring Mr. Woodbridge, the conductor. The engineers and firemen saved themselves by jumping from the cars.

Accounts from Independence, Mo., confirm the report of the loss of one hundred and seventy-five mules belonging to the Government train, while en route to the States. Sixty miles beyond Council Grove, one man was frozen to death. The cause of the sad disaster was an immense fall of sleet and rain.

A typhoid fever has been ravaging the north-western parts of South Carolina which in numerous cases has proved fatal. It has been a fact noted in its progress, that the more powerful the remedies employed, the more fatal the disease. Those only have recovered that have taken no medicine.

During the year ending Nov. 14, there arrived at Quebec 40,646 steerage passengers, and 625 cabin passengers. Of the former 22,401 came from Ireland, 9,491 from England, and 6,898 for Scotland. The total number exceeds that of the preceding year by 9,000.

Land warrants are selling at $140 and $150 for 160 acres. There is something doing in the warrants under the new bill, at about 50 cents per acre on speculation. They will doubtless be made assignable at the present session of Congress.

There was a riot in Cincinnati, on the 1st inst., growing out of a strike among the cabinet makers. In attempting to quell it, the police officers were attacked, fire-arms were freely used, and several persons were seriously injured.

The trial of Laurence Reilly for murder, in Kings County, pending these days past, has resulted in a verdict of guilty. The defense attempted was insanity, and very strong proof of insanity was offered.

The Managers of the Delaware and Raritan Canal Company have given notice that navigation for the season will be suspended on the 20th inst., if the canal is not sooner closed by the ice.

A letter from Havana, in The New-Orleans Picayune, says that the circulation of The Picayune, and Delta, and The New York Herald, had been interdicted in the Island of Cuba.

DIED.

In New Market, N. J., Nov. 30, CHARLES DUNN, aged five years. His sufferings were great, the disease being the inflammatory sore throat. In this bereavement the parents and friends have sustained a great loss. He was a very promising child, and during the past summer, he had been very attentive to the Sabbath school, and by his faithfulness and increasing interest he manifested, his teacher with the other members of his class were much attached to him, the loss is felt among the children sensibly. Western Association— xecutive Committee.

THE Executive Committee of the Western Association will hold its next Quarterly Session at Independence on Fourth-day evening, Jan. 7, 1852. All ministers employed by the Committee are expected to make their reports by that time. The Committee is doing whatever it can for the building up of the feeble churches, and the extension of Bible doctrine beyond our denominational limits. Relying upon the benevolence of the churches, appointments have been made involving considerable expense; and the Committee would be glad to extend their operations if men and means could be obtained.

The past operations of the Committee have been successful, adding to the number of the lovers of the Lord Jesus Christ and God's holy Sabbath. Some of the small churches, that have always depended on others for the preaching of the Gospel, have made arrangements to locate a minister, doing most for his support, and asking the Committee kindly to aid them. Others are anxious to do the same. The Committee are desirous to aid them, and could fondly wish and devoutly pray that the "brotherly kindness" of the churches would enable us to meet the earnest calls of the destitute. We ask in the name of the needy a generous contribution from all the churches and brethren in the Association. Upon the reading of this, let every one of you lay by him in store as God has prospered him, so that there shall be abundance to aid the Committee in their efforts to build up the feeble and help the destitute. J. BAILEY, Sec. of Com.

Two Living Aztec Children.

A NEW AND ABSOLUTELY UNIQUE RACE OF MANKIND.—The most extraordinary and inexplicable phenomena that the history of the human race has yet produced, can be seen for a few weeks at the large Exhibition Room of the Society Library, corner of Broadway and Leonard-street. They were recently taken from a newly-discovered and idolatrous people in Central America, by whom they were kept with superstitious veneration, distinct and secluded as a caste of their priesthood, and employed as Mimes and Bacchanals in their Pagan ceremonies and worship.

They are male and female. The latter measuring 29½ inches in height, weighing 17 lbs.; the former is 33 inches high, and weighs 20 lbs.

From repeated and careful examination, the best Physiologists state the older to be 12 or 13 years of age; the younger about 10 years.

They differ altogether from examples of the dwarf kind, and from children; affording complete and undeniable illustration of a Piamean variety of the Human Race!

Tickets of Admission 25 cents. Children under 10 years, half price. Season Tickets, $1 00. Doors open each day, from 11 until 1, and from 7 until 9 o'clock. dec18 4t

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & CO. have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Daguerrean Gallery.

GURNEY'S Daguerrean Gallery, No. 189 Broadway, has been known for years as one of the first establishments of the kind in the United States, and the oldest in the city of New York. He has recently greatly enlarged his Gallery by the addition of more rooms and large skylights, and other improvements, rendering it one of the most extensive establishments in this country. Mr. G. attends personally to his sitters, and from his great experience in the art he is enabled, at all times, to give perfect satisfaction. The large-sized pictures recently taken by his new process are universally acknowledged superior to any heretofore taken in this country. A large collection can be seen at all hours of the day. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to examine them.

Hoe's Cast Steel Circular and Long Saws.

THE subscribers manufacture from the best cast steel, Circular Saws, from two inches to five feet diameter. These Saws are carefully hardened and tempered, and are ground and finished by machinery designed expressly for this purpose, and are therefore much superior in truth and uniformity of surface to those ground in the usual manner. They require less set, less power to drive them, and are not so liable to become heated, and produce a saving in timber.

They also manufacture cast steel MILL, PITT, and CROSS-CUT SAWS and BILLET WEBS, of superior quality, all of which they have for sale at their Ware-Rooms, Nos. 29 and 31 Gold-st., or they may be obtained of the principal hardware merchants in the United States. R. HOE & CO., Printing-Press, Machine, and Saw Makers, Nos. 29 and 31 Gold-st.

The following extract is from a report made by a Committee of scientific and practical gentlemen, appointed by the American Institute:—

"Your Committee are of unanimous opinion, that in the apparatus invented by Mr. R. M. Hoe, for grinding saws, he has displayed great ingenuity and tact in the adaptation of machinery to the production of results in the manufacture of Saws, which may with propriety be denominated the ne plus ultra of the art."

Publishers of newspapers who will insert this advertisement three times, with this note, and forward us a paper containing the same, will be paid in printing materials, by purchasing four times the amount of their bill for the advertisement. nov13 3t

Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet.

New Series—Enlarged—January Number Ready.

WOODWORTH, determined that his Magazine shall excel all its rivals in the quantity as well as the quality of its contents, has enlarged it, so that it will hereafter contain a greater amount of reading matter for one dollar, than any other illustrated Magazine of the kind in the world. With the January number, now ready, commences an entirely new series. Each number will hereafter contain 48 pages, and will be embellished even more elegantly than before. The January number, with its handsome vignette title-page, got up with express reference to the holidays, is the most charming number we have ever issued.

The Cabinet will still be under the entire editorial control of FRANCIS C. WOODWORTH, who designs to spend a considerable portion of the year 1852, traveling in Europe. To secure all his letters from over sea, it will be necessary for new subscribers to commence with the January number, as hereafter all subscriptions must commence either in January or July; and no subscriptions will be received for less than a year.

It is unnecessary, at this late day, to tell the public what the Cabinet is. It has long had the reputation of being the "best juvenile Magazine in America—ever readable, entertaining, instructive, without any sectarianism, and free from every thing which can do harm."

Terms.

For a single copy, $1 a year; 4 copies, $3; 7 copies, $5. Cash in advance in all cases. Those who form a club of 7 copies, shall receive an extra copy for their trouble. A specimen of the January or holiday number will be sent (postage prepaid) to any part of the Union, on the receipt, in postage stamps or otherwise, of 12 cents, without expense to us.

Traveling and Local Agents Wanted.

The new series is just the thing for traveling agents and local dealers. Twenty or more agents are wanted to travel in different States, to solicit subscribers for the new series, and to sell the bound volumes of the old series or "Cabinet Library." Full particulars will be given, and specimens sent on application (post paid) with good references. Agents ought to be in the field as soon as possible. Those who are out of employment, and who wish to engage in lucrative business, and at the same time to circulate useful reading for the family circle, are particularly invited to give this agency a trial. To good agents, who will devote their time wholly or mainly to this work, the publisher will make very liberal terms.

Postmasters, Clergymen, and School Teachers, are authorized to obtain subscribers, and are allowed to retain 25 per cent on all new subscriptions, when the full price (one dollar) is paid.

ABSTRACTS OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Report of the Commissioner of Pensions.

The Report of Mr. J. E. Heath, Commissioner of Pensions, exhibits a favorable condition of affairs in that bureau. The whole number of pensioners on the rolls is 19,611—a slight diminution, as compared with the preceding year. The whole amount expended for pensions during the past year, ending the 30th September, is, as far as can be ascertained, $1,439,848.

"Since the last annual report, 3,308 warrants have been issued for services in the Mexican war. These necessarily required much time, care, and attention, most of them being suspended cases. Much labor is also employed in the examinations necessary to prevent the issue of more than one warrant to a claimant under both these laws. In many cases applicants filed separate applications for their services in the several Indian wars, and in that of 1812."

The passage of the act of 28th September, 1850, having induced inquiry into the rights of those who served in the war of 1812, many just claims for that service have been brought to light. The numerous examinations necessary to decide whether claimants under the act of 1850 had received or were entitled to bounty for services in the war of 1812, have materially increased the labors of the latter division in this office. Ninety-two warrants have been issued in the past year, under the acts of 24th of December, 1811; 11th of January, 1812, and 10th December, 1814, and there are now 450 suspended claims under those acts.

Thus it will be seen that since the last report from this office, there have been issued under the acts of 1811, 1812, and 1814, ninety-two warrants, to wit:—

					Acres.
65	warrants for	160	acres each,	amount'g to	8,800
36	"	40	"	"	1,440
1	"	320	"	"	320

Under the act of 1850 to 1st Nov. 1851,

—and 63 certificates for $100 each, in lieu of 160 acres, and 2 certificates for $25 each, in lieu of 40 acres.

Up to the 1st of November, about one hundred and fifty-seven thousand cases had been filed, leaving, after deducting such as were fully or partially acted on, upwards of eighty thousand still to be considered. The suspended cases (about twenty-two thousand at the time mentioned) require much more labor than the same number of ordinary claims, and give rise to a heavy correspondence.

The act of 21st of July, 1848, made certain provisions for the widows and orphans of officers and soldiers in the Mexican war. The number who have received the benefit of the act, and are now on the rolls, is 1,750.

Report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The Annual Report of Commissioner Butterfield, comprises very full details of the business of the Land Office during the past year.

The sales of the public lands from the 30th June, 1850, to 30th June, 1851, amount to 1,846,847 49-100 acres; and the purchase money is $2,370,947 45.

The amount of land sold, during the first quarter of the fiscal year, commencing July 1, 1851, was 473,140 65-100 acres, for which there has been received the sum of $601,691 01. The amount of land sold for the corresponding quarter of the last fiscal year, was 266,879 66-100 acres, for which the sum of $349,876 06 was received. The sales thus appear to be largely on the increase.

The quantity of public land proclaimed for market, during the year, amounts to 7,731,537 acres; and the estimated quantity available for market, during the coming year, will not be less than 12,000,000 acres.

The locations by military bounty land warrants during the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1850, cover an area of 2,454,000 acres, making an aggregate of cash sales, and locations by warrant, during that period, of 4,300,846 49-100 acres, which, at the minimum price, would amount to $5,376,059 36. The sales, however, exceeded the minimum price by $62,388 09. The whole number of land warrants issued to the 1st November, 1851, under the Mexican Bounty Land act of 11th February, 1847, is 80,781. Of this number 66,618 have been returned to the General Land Office as located; and of these located land warrants 66,200 have been patented. The whole number of land warrants issued up to the same period, under the General Bounty Land Law of 28th September, 1850, is 54,201. Of this number, 3,708 have been returned to the General Land Office as located; and of the located land warrants of this class, 1,950 have been patented.

The existing provisions of law regulating the surveying operations in California are undefined, and the practical operations, thus far ordered, are restricted to the main lines of survey. The Commissioner recommends the immediate extension of the land system over California, in such details as are best adapted to the peculiar condition of the country; and suggests for the consideration of Congress, whether it would not be just and proper to make provision, in a supplemental law, for securing to actual settlers, by preëmption or otherwise, their improvements, in the smallest legal subdivisions that will embrace them, in all cases where, at the passage of the act of 3d of March, 1851, for the adjustment of California land claims, they were bona fide settlers, on alledged grants from the former Governments, allowing at the same time, to the claimants under such grants, an equal quantity on other public lands. This measure may be regarded as being analogous to the principle recognized in the 11th section of the act of Congress of the 26th of May, 1824, for the adjudication of claims by the courts, which act was revived, and extended to several States, by the act of Congress of the 17th of June, 1844.

In Wisconsin, in the Menomonee cession, and in other portions of the State, the surveys of large bodies of land will have been completed before the close of the season, ready for market next year, and from the showing made as to the settlements, number of inhabitants, and saw-mills found in those regions, there is every reason to believe the new lands will command ready sale.

Since the publication of the late decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on the boundary question between the States of Missouri and Iowa, instructions have been given to the respective Surveyors General for those States to close and connect the lines of the public surveys with that boundary on both sides of it. The work will be accomplished at the earliest practicable period.

The execution of the law granting the swamp and overflowed lands, unfit for cultivation, to the States respectively, is occupying great attention.

The access to the mining region of Lake Superior is at present difficult and expensive. The waters of that lake all flow through the St. Mary's river, and around the falls (Sault Ste. Marie) there is a portage of about a mile, across which provisions, copper ore, &c., have to be transported; and vessels destined for navigating that lake, already built, have also to be transported across that portage, at great cost, there being no timber fit for ship-building near the lake. Were a ship-canal cut across the portage, a fresh impulse would be given to the mining operations as to copper; and it is represented that the iron ore of that region promises to be equally attractive, both as to abundance and purity. The Commissioner invites attention to the subject, with the suggestion that should Congress see fit to grant to the State of Michigan a quantity of land to aid in constructing such a canal, the mining interests would be promoted by it, and the sales of public lands in the upper peninsula of Michigan much increased.

Some idea may be formed of the extent of the official operations of this bureau, when it is considered that the archives of the General Land Office consist of seven thousand three hundred and eighty-three folio manuscript volumes; that about one million two hundred and twenty-one thousand patents of different kinds, all duly recorded, have been issued; and that, as preliminary to the preparation of these patents, the examination of about two million nine hundred and fifteen thousand five hundred title papers were necessary, all of which are on file."

Report of the Secretary of War.

The Annual Report of the Secretary of War gives a summary view of the operations of the Army during the last year, and its present condition.

The protection of our South-western frontier, and of the Mexican territory adjoining our own, against the incursions of hostile Indians, has engaged the attention of the Department. The savages are actuated not so much by hostility to the whites as motives of plunder. The character of the country in which they live makes it extremely difficult to guard against their ravages, or pursue them to punishment. Congress having failed to provide a mounted regiment at its last session, as many troops adapted to the service required as could be spared from other quarters, were concentrated upon the frontier, to operate against the Indians. The Indians of California and Oregon appearing unwarlike, and comparatively harmless, the Regiment of Mounted Riflemen was withdrawn from the Pacific, and ordered to Texas. With the double object of overawing the fierce tribes occupying the northern part of Texas, and of affording protection to emigrants, a chain of military posts was established upon that frontier. In order to chastise and hold in check the Indians of New Mexico, who had become exceedingly bold and troublesome, Brevet Col. Sumner was ordered to that Department, and set out in July last with a portion of his command on an expedition into the country of the Navajos, a powerful tribe which had spread terror in Texas, New Mexico, and Sonora. The result of the expedition is not yet known. Experience has shown that the most effectual way to protect our frontier settlements is to overawe the Indians by a constant display of military force; for this reason, among others, the Military Stations in Texas and New Mexico have been removed as near as possible to the frontiers.

The Indians west of the Rocky Mountains are less warlike; but several outbreaks have occurred in California and Oregon. Treaties recently concluded, if faithfully observed on our part, will probably prevent further trouble. It would not be safe, however, to rely entirely on any pacific policy for the protection of those remote regions. The entire military force on the Pacific is only 736 men, which is inadequate. An increase of the rank and file of the Infantry and Artillery is recommended, as well as an additional regiment of Cavalry. The entire Army force is numbered at 10,538, which gives an effective force of 8,500 men.

The increase in the expense of supporting the Army is mentioned, and the causes are stated. The increase resulting from our newly acquired territory (including Texas) amounts to $4,556,707 75.

After an enumeration of measures adopted to curtail the expenses of the Army, the result is shown in a reduction of $1,161,492 75. Other contemplated reforms require the aid of legislation.

The enormous expense of maintaining a large portion of the regular Army on the frontier must continue if the force is maintained. It is recommended, with a view to reducing these expenditures, that the necessity for regular forces be diminished by encouraging the formation of a local militia in the frontier territories, by distributing arms among the inhabitants. The very fact that the people were armed would intimidate the Indians.

Both policy and humanity require that we should endeavor to stop Indian depredations by conciliatory measures, instead of the terror of our arms. Starvation, forced upon the savages by the advancement of the whites upon their hunting grounds, has frequently instigated their outrages. The U. S., as the owners of the public domain, have always acted on the principle that the aboriginal race had the right of occupancy in the soil and have extinguished their claim to the land by purchase when required for use. Texas, on the contrary, as the owner of all the vacant lands in her limits, acknowledges no such right, and has laid it off and proceeded to sell it at once, a course well calculated to alarm and exasperate the Indians, and to bring about collisions with the whites.

Report of the Secretary of the Interior.

Most of the facts presented in the Report of the Secretary of the Interior are embodied in the Reports of other Departments. We copy the following paragraph from it:—

Mr Chas. F. Stansbury, an officer in the Patent Office, was sent to the World's Fair, to examine and inform himself relative to the many objects of interest on exhibition. His report, which will soon be forthcoming, is expected to be a most valuable and interesting document, giving descriptions of natural productions, implements, machinery, manufactures, processes of manufactures, works of art, and other objects of interest peculiar to each nation.

The establishment of an Agricultual Bureau is again urged upon the attention of Congress. Agriculture is the great interest of our country, more than four-fifths of our population being engaged in it, and yet it is without a Bureau devoted to its interest, although recommended since the days of Washington.

The best mode of illustrating the utility of an Agricultural Bureau is to present a condensed statement of the duties which it should be required to perform. It should be charged with the duty of collecting and disseminating information in regard to the cultivation of the soil, in all its branches. It should investigate every proposed improvement in the tillage of the earth or in the construction of implements of husbandry. It should collect from our own and foreign countries every variety of seed, fruit, plant, and vegetable, and distribute them, with full and accurate information as to the soil, climate, and mode of cultivation best adapted to each. Trhough the agency of our national ships and merchant vessels arrangements could be made for the importation of all the valuable vegetable productions and animals of other countries. This would enable us to appropriate to ourselves the results of the wisdom, experience, and improvements of all the world in regard to agriculture, and we should soon be rendered independent of other countries for many articles which are now imported at great cost. One or more officers should be connected with it, thoroughly acquainted with the principles of geology, mineralogy, chemistry, and botany, for the purpose of investigating and reporting upon the character and properties of every variety of soil, rock, mineral, and vegetable, and their adaptation to useful purposes. To this bureau should also be entrusted the duty of superintending the taking of each decennial census, and of procuring and classifying from year to year all the statiscal information which can be obtained in respect to the agriculture, manufactures, commerce, tunnage, revenue expenditures, financial and banking systems, improvements by railways, canals, and roads, industrial pursuits, and general progress of every State in the Union, and of the principal nations of the world. By this means a vast fund of useful knowledge, which cannot now be obtained, would be always accessible to Congress and the Executive.

In this department of knowledge our government is behind England, France, Belgium, Prussia, Austria, Russia, Sweden, Spain, and other countries in Europe.

The operations of the Commissioners to run the Mexican Boundary have been delayed by differences between the Commissioners on behalf of the parties to the line, and between officers of the U. S. Surveying Party. The work is now being prosecuted with vigor, but an extension of the time allowed for its completion is asked.

The apropriation of a sum of $500,000 for the introduction of a plentiful supply of water in the City of Washington, is recommended as highly essential to the securement of a valuable blessing to the population, and a surety of the public buildings against damage by fire, which an be obtained in no other way.

Gathering and Preserving Apples.

Various modes have been adopted for gathering and preserving apples; and if we should follow Napoleon's rule, "to adopt that which succeeds," then Mr. Pell's method should certainly be adopted. His plan is to pick his apples by hand, never to bruise or dent them, and on no account to pour them from the baskets into the barrels. Every apple is placed in the barrel by hand, and the barrel is then carried, not rolled, to his warehouse, from whence it is carried to the boat, and this boat proceeds to New-York and is placed alongside of the English packet. All the apples which are not sold at full prices, $6 per barrel, are shipped on account of Mr. Pell, and carefully placed on board the ship without being rolled over. Apples so cared for arrive in England in good order, and sometimes sell for four pounds sterling ($20) per barrel.

Mr. Pell has occasionally made a thumb-dent in an apple, and after tying a label to the stem, placed the apple so dented in the centre of a barrel of sound apples, requesting his agent in England to examine the barrel and report the state of the labeled apple. The report has always been that the label and stem were there, but that more than half the apples were decayed. The Editor of the Maine Farmer says:

"Every one knows that an apple, in order to insure its preservation as long as possible, should not be bruised, but every one does not practice this rule. If they did, they would pick them off carefully by hand, and see that they were so gently handled that no sign of a bruise could be found. But this is too hard or too slow work for many, and so they shake them off, or "club" them off, regardless what they hit, or where they fall. The bruises not only cause the apple to decay much sooner, but injure the texture and flavor of it, even if used for cooking."

Some people are in the habit of picking or gathering their winter fruit before it is fairly ripe, in order that it may shrink or wither a little, as it will, by the escape of the thin, watery, or unripe juice in it. Apples thus used will keep longer, but they never have that sprightly and true taste that they do when suffered to hang on the tree until more matured.

Apples should be gathered carefully, when mature, and placed in a cool place. Many of our orchardists put them immediately into barrels, and head them up in the orchard; others carry them to some out-house, where they can be placed in a pile, in order to sweat, as it is called, which is probably owing to the escape of what fluid may be in them, that has been elaborated into the peculiar juice of the fruit itself.

After having undergone this process, they are sorted over, and barreled, or put into bins in a cool cellar, for winter. Your cellar should not be so cool as to allow them to freeze, nor so warm as to cause them to rot. If your cellar is a warm one, it would be well to keep them in some cool barn or out-house; or, if barreled, you may keep them out of doors until cold weather comes on, being careful to roll them in before they freeze. Some of our friends preserved apples in very excellent order though the past winter, by packing them down in dry plaster of Paris.

A writer in the Farmer and Mechanic of 1847, says that he adopted the following mode of packing some very fine apples, which he shipped to England, and when they arrived every one was sound. The moisture, if any, was wiped from them, and each apple was then rolled in clean, dry wrapping-paper. The barrel was then thinly lined with straw, and the apples placed in as closely as possible, without jamming them, and then headed up. An inside lining-hoop prevented all danger of the heads being knocked in by accident. Thus put up, they could not be made to rattle by common usage. Directions were sent with them as follows:—"These barrels of apples are not to be rolled or tumbled about. If carted, or sent by land, something is to be put on the floor of the cart or wagon, to keep them from being bruised, rattled or jolted."

This care and labor, says the writer, will appear small, when it is recollected that it may insure an additional price of several dollars on each barrel, in the English market. [Working Farmer.

Gambling in Europe.

The enormous sums of money which daily change owners at Wiesbaden, Carlsruhe, and other watering-places, which are generally resorted to by the fashion and aristocracy of Europe, are almost incredible, and of course the high playing is frequently attended with tragical results.

A few weeks ago, at Carlsruhe, a gentleman named Tissard, who had long been considered the most successful gambler of his day, and who has frequently won $100,000 in one night, suddenly took it into his head to send a bullet through his heart, because on one occasion his good luck had deserted him, which, though it would not be the cause of his ruin, yet he thought would dishonor him. Playing with a German countess, he lost every time, though they continued for thirty-one hours without the slightest interruption, except while once taking a cup of coffee. At last, finding himself minus the sum of 400,000 francs, he coolly rose from the table, and requesting the lady to excuse him for a moment, retired. After the lapse of some time, the Countess having become a little fidgety about his return, sent a servant to seek him, who, finding his door locked, knocked several times for admission, but receiving no answer, at length broke it open. There lay the gambler extended on the floor, with a bullet-hole through his heart, and beside him on the table an envelop bearing the address of the Countess, and containing, in bank-bills, the amount she had won from him. The Countess, it is said, when she was informed of the catastrophe which had occurred, remarked, "Well, at least he might have told me he was never coming back, and not have kept me waiting here so long."

Pizarro's Grave at Lima.

In the crypt under the high altar are deposited the remains of the celebrate Pizarro, who was assassinated at the palace close by. A small piece of silver, dropped into the hand of the sacristan, procured me admission into the crypt. Descending a few steps, I entered a small place, some twenty feet long, quite light and whitewashed, and which smelt and looked so much like a comfortable wine-cellar, that I caught myself more than once looking round for the bins and bottles. The first object that I saw was a large square tomb, surmounted by the erect figure of an abbot, and close by, in an opening in the wall, I noticed what appeared to me to be a collection of dusty rags, but a closer inspection proved that this was all that remained of the renowned conqueror of Peru. He has still on him the clothes and shoes which he wore at the moment of his assassination. Of course his body is nothing but a skeleton covered with dried flesh and skin, so that no features are discernible. The body is covered with the remains of what was once white linen, swathed round him, but the dust of centuries has collected on it and turned it to a light brown color, and it almost pulverizes when touched. The body is placed on a narrow piece of plank, in a sloping position, and has been placed in this hole merely to put it out of the way. The folks in Lima do not think anything of the remains of poor Pizarro; and I dare say that a little money, judiciously invested, would procure for any curiosity-hunter the whole of his remains. A Touching Incident.

Some two years ago, says the Waterville Mail, Mr. Edlon S. Moody, of Monmouth, went to California, leaving his wife and his young child with her mother in Boston. The correspondence between the husband and wife was regularly kept up, and the wish was often expressed by the former that his young wife could join him in the far off land of gold; but the definite plan and arrangements for this object had been deferred. A short time since a letter from the absent husband pictured again the prospects that cheered his long and weary absence, and touched again the hope that the time would soon come when he should find it proper to make arrangements for his wife and child to join him in San Francisco. The heart of the affectionate woman cast the questions of safety and economy to the winds, and she resolved, in spite of all obstacles, to start immediately for California, and surprise her husband by her unexpected arrival.

She started; and almost on the day that she landed in California, with a heart swelling to meet her husband, that husband landed in the city of Boston! He had made a sudden determination, instigated by poor health, to return home. His serious disappointment, connected with the loss of a considerable portion of his hard earned property by the failure of a New York house to whom he had entrusted it, so wrought upon his declining health that he survived but about one week—and was brought to Monmouth for buriel a few days since. No details of the wife's dreadful disappointment have yet been received; but the thought that, whatever may have been its effect, a still deeper affliction yet awaits her, adds a most painful feature to the picture.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF PHILADELPHIA.—In 1839 and '40, the population was 250,000, and the number of scholars 18,800, or about one thirteenth of the whole. In 1850-51, the population reached 410,000, and the pupils numbered 48,000, or more than one-ninth of the entire community. The total expenditure for the school year terminating June, 30, 1851, was $366,361 62, of which sum $24,473 54 having been expended in the building of new school houses, and $20,617 97 in repairs and additions to existing buildings, the balance of $321,270 11, remaining after deducting these two items, may be considered as indicating the current expenses of the schools for the year. The large sum of $42,160. 11 was expended in books and stationery, Number of male pupils 24,508; females, 23,548; total, 48,056 in attendance at 270 schools. They were under the care of 781 teachers, 82 male, 690 female. The direction of the schools is committed by law to 228 directors and 24 controllers.

COLD WATER FOR BURNS.—A correspondent of the Scientific American says: When about 15 years of age, a woman told me, if I ever got burned, to plunge the part into cold water. Since that time I have frequently been benefited by her advice. When burned with a hot iron, I at once immerse the burned part in cold water. A few days since, when forging a small article, I cut a small piece from its end, while red-hot, and by mistake, when looking in a contrary direction, I took hold of the anvil cutter with my right hand thumb and finger, when the small piece of iron I had cut off stuck to the end of my finger. I shook it off, and at once dipped my hand in water and held it there for about a minute, after which I dipped it in spirits of turpentine and put on a cloth; no blister arose, nor was it sore. I believe that cold water prevents the heat from penetrating into the system; and if it were possible for a person to be sent through boiling water into cold as fast as a bullet travels from a rifle, not a blister would be raised. Heat does not travel faster than sound.

THE DAKOTA TREATY.—A treaty was concluded, July 23, between the United States and two bands of the Dakotas. By this treaty the Indians make a cession of territory, which embraces the entire valley of the Minnesota and the eastern tributaries of the Sioux river, and is estimated to contain 21,000,000 acres. In return, they are to receive $1,665,000, as follows:—To be paid after their removal to the Reservation, $275,000; and to be expended in breaking land, erecting mills, and establishing manual labor schools, $30,000; amounting to $305,000. The balance of $1,360,000 to be invested at five per cent for fifty years, which will give an annual income of $68,000, to be paid as follows: in cash annually $40,000, goods and provisions $10,000, civilization fund $12,000, education $6,000. After fifty years, all payments to cease, and the principal of $1,360,000 to revert to the government. The intercourse laws, so far as relates to the introduction and sale of ardent spirits, shall be continued in full force, until changed by legal authority.

REAL HEROISM.—The Zanesville (Ohio) Gazette relates the following case of daring on the part of Mr. Thomas Launder, of that place. He was aroused from his sleep in the middle of the night by the call of a man in the street. When Mr. Launder awoke, the man informed him that something was on fire in his store. He rushed in and found some boxes of papers all in a flame, immediately over which, on a shelf, sat a keg of gunpowder. The shelf and the keg containing the powder had also taken fire, and were burning rapidly, the keg considerably charred. Under these circumstances, Mr. L. deliberately seized the keg of power, carried it into the street, and got water and put the fire out, burning his hands badly in the operation. This daring act on the part of Mr. Launder is, perhaps, the only thing that could have saved the lives of his family, who were sleeping in another part of the same building, as well as the building itself and all its contents.

Variety.

Some of the Illinois papers accord high praise to Miss Hannah Dix, to whose benevolent efforts they ascribe the erection of the beautiful and commodious Asylum for the Insane recently opened in that State. Six years since, this philanthropic lady collected the statistics relating to the subject, and placed them before the Illinois Legislature, with an eloquent appeal in behalf of the unfortunate class for whose benefit she has so successfully labored in various States of the Union. The success of her benevolent effort in this instance is seen in the noble structure already dedicated to the use of the objects of her generous sympathy.

We spend annually, says the N. Y. Courier and Enquirer, "more than five million dollars for public amusements. How poor is the sum total of our charities when brought into comparison with this single item; and how immeasurably poor would they be if set opposite to our innumerable extravagances in houses and furniture and dress and equipage. We are prosperous, and should thank Heaven for it; but let us remember that improved prosperity brings with it new responsibilities, and that our natural sympathies have an infinitely more rightful claim over us than our artificial ones."

The Steamer Mississippi which had the honor of rescuing the gallant Hungarians, sailed from Norfolk on the 7th of June, 1849, and arrived at New York on her return on the 10th of November, 1851, having been absent nearly two years and a half. During her absence she lay in port 709 days; she sailed 29,578 miles; she entered 103 different ports; she visited 16 different countries; she was 177 days at sea, and 172 days under steam; she consumed 5,722 tuns of coal, and lost 4 men.

An old resident of Oregon is M. Revit, a Canadian Frenchman, who went to that country in 1805, in the company of Lewis and Clarke. He is in his 93d year, and the newspapers of Oregon say he is healthy, rebust and active, bidding fair to outlive the hundred. He is the next oldest man in the Territory, there being one other old inhabitant who approximates more nearly a centenarian.

In the Legislative Assembly of South Carolina, Dec. 4, the Committee of the Whole House reported against the proposition for prohibiting the use of the Courts of South Carolina for the collection of debts, &c., to residents in States opposed to the rendition of Fugitive Slaves. The Report was agreed to by Ayes 82, to Noes 28.

The Albany Evening Journal says the amount of tolls received at the Canal Collector's Office at Albany during the season of navigation in 1851, was $358,457 59; Same period in 1850, $312,653 68. Increase in 1851, $35,804 01.

The amount of duties received at the Philadelphia Custom House in the eleven months ending Nov. 30, was $3,532,982 against $3,213,031 same time last year.

There are now 191 convicts in Penitentiary at Jeffersonville. This is the largest number that has ever been in the Indiana State Prison.

New York and Boston.

REGULAR MAIL LINE, via Stonington, for Boston Providence, New Bedford, Taunton, and Newport, carrying the great Eastern U. S. Mail, without change of cars or detention. The secure and elegant steamers C. VANDERBILT and COMMODORE leave on alternate days (Sundays excepted) Pier No. 2 North River, (first wharf above Battery-place,) at 5 o'clock P. M. For passage, state-rooms, or freight, apply at Pier No. 2, or at the office, No. 11 Battery-place.

New York and Albany Steamboat.

THE splendid steamer RIP VAN WINKLE, Capt. S. Schuyler, runs regularly between New York and Albany, leaving New York on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday evenings at 6 o'clock, and Albany on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday evenings at 8 o'clock, or on the arrival of the Express Trains from the West. There is no safer, quicker, or pleasanter boat on the Hudson River than the Rip Van Winkle.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year commences the last Wednesday in August, and closes the last Tuesday in June of each year.

Board of Instruction.

Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress
Rev. J. W. MORTON, } Assistants.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, }

The Terms for 1851 and 1852 are as follows:—

The First	commences	Aug. 27	and closes	Dec. 2.
" Second	"	Dec. 3	" "	March 16.
" Third	"	March 17	" "	June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one of two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term, Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.

Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS.

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00
Drawing,	1 00
Monochromatic Painting	3 00
Oil Painting,	5 00
Writing and Stationery,	0 50
Vocal Music, Elementary,	1 00
Advanced Class,	2 00
Instrumental Music,	8 00

Use of Organ or Piano, $2 00 per quarter.

BOARD, in private families, per week, from $1 25 to $1 50; in clubs, from 60 to 90 cents.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall Term, and at the middle of the Winter Term, and continue seven weeks. The course will embrace a thorough review of the common school branches, with daily lectures on "The Art of Teaching," Chemistry, Physiology, Laws of Health, School Laws, &c., &c. Tuition $2 50.

Students should not be furnished with unnecessary pocket-money, neither should minors be allowed to contract debts in the village. Either member of the Faculty will superintend the financial affairs of pupils placed under their care, by special direction from parents and guardians, if funds are furnished in advance.

OUR FOREIGN MISSION.

Building of the Chapel.

The following letter from Bro. Carpenter to the Board, dated Shanghae, August 7, 1851, presents the subject of the Chapel still more fully than the communication from Bro. Wardner, which, we gave to our readers last week.

From our new home I now write to you, not to say it is completed, but to report progress. If an apology is due for my long silence, I have no other to offer than the simple fact that since we have been building, my time has been so constantly employed that I could scarcely keep track of the arrivals and departures of ships. I know of no other foreigners here, who, from the outset, have undertaken to make all their purchases themselves, and hire workmen by the day. Some few, after having let out their work to be done by the job, have been compelled to change their plan. The Chinese are so slippery to deal with, that we thought it better to hold the reins in our own hands, make our own purchases, and then we could dismiss our workmen at any time we might choose; whereas, on the other plan, a builder would certainly want money in advance, with which to make purchases, and if he could manage to get a hundred dollars in his pocket, he would be almost sure to bolt, break his engagement, and demand a higher price to enable him to finish the job. At any rate, this has been the experience of many. And this we were resolved to avoid, conscious, however, of the burden we should take upon ourselves. We have been sustained, however, to go through with the heaviest of it, and still think it is the best plan.

But before saying more, I must begin farther back. After having received information that $3500 were subscribed for the Chapel, a question arose which we found not easy to dispose of. The plan first submitted to the Board, and in view of which the funds had been raised, embraced a Chapel and dwelling house for one family. Another plan submitted, was to have two chapels, that each missionary with his assistant might have one. But when we were under the necessity of consummating our plans, and entering upon the work, by this time Bro. Wardner, in the providence of God, having had an addition to his family, became decided in his opinion that he should obtain, if possible, a home for his family outside the city. He will, doubtless, give you his reasons in full for this preference of the country. I am giving mine for consenting to such a division of the funds as would divert a part of them from the direct object of the subscribers—a thing always to be avoided, unless Providence direct otherwise. The only question now is, whether we have rightly interpreted the voice of Providence in this matter. If not, then I must receive the deserved censure of my brethren.

I remark—1st. The funds were more than sufficient to build the Chapel with rooms over it for a family, and such out-houses as would be necessary. 2d. They were not sufficient for two lots, and two chapels. 3d. By close calculation, we thought that in addition to the house and Chapel had in contemplation by the subscribers, a cheap lot might be purchased in a pleasant location, and a cheap one-storied house erected, or got in such a state of forwardness that by strict economy, and saving of $170 rent, it could be paid for. 4th. It was argued, that by saving the annual rent, and perhaps by a little further help from home, the time would not be far distant when a second chapel would go up; indeed, that it would go up as soon as though we should continue to pay a heavy rent, and perhaps lose our health in the bargain. 5th. The health and comfort of Bro. Wardner's family seemed to demand something of the kind. 6th. If I had refused my consent to such a division of the funds, especially as we are so far from home, and it requires so long time to ask and obtain advice, it might have been set down to the wrong motive instead of the right one. 7th. It was argued that our brethren would probably be well pleased to see how much could be done with their funds.

Right or wrong, such was the plan we settled down upon; and by mutual consent, Bro. W. went about the building of his house, and I the Chapel, &c. Upon the supposition that $3500 should be raised at home, and that it should all be transmitted with as much sacrifice as that which had already been received, it would amount to but little over $2800 in hand. Of this, the Chapel lot required $714, and Bro. W.'s lot $107, leaving but about $2000 for building purposes. Of this I was to take $1500, and see what I could do towards building the Chapel and house for my family, and Bro. W. was to take the remainder and see what he could do with it. Thus we went harmoniously to work.

On the 34th of March I commenced taking down the old buildings, and among them was one, which had been the resort of opium smokers. As soon as we were fairly at work, I discovered that my new neighbors all around were taking the precaution customary for warding off disease, which it is supposed might attack them in consequence of any old building being demolished. The means they used for this purpose, were neither homeopathic nor hydropathic, but the regular Chinese practice, i. e. for each family to erect upon a pole and fasten to their house an old broom. I have counted fourteen of these old brooms in our immediate vicinity, sticking up towards the stars. On some of the poles an old basket is tied.

The old houses "squared away," the next thing was to drive spiles into the ground, upon which the walls were to be erected. These were from 2 to 6 feet, according to the hardness or softness of the ground. By this process, I found that the land here is harder than outside the city. It is also several feet higher than the surrounding country. About three feet below the surface, we found a limestone, handsomely cut, about 20 inches square. It now supports one of the pillars in the Chapel.

The spiles being driven, the corner stone was laid without ceremony, and I regret to say, without the list containing the names of the subscribers; and the walls slowly went up. At the foundation, up to the Chapel floor, (about 3 feet,) they are 20 inches in thickness; from the Chapel to the chamber floor, (14 feet,) they are 16 inches; and from the chamber floor to the eaves (10 feet,) 14 inches on two sides, and on two sides 16 inches. The mason work was made as solid as possible. My aim was not to have the least space within the walls to contain air, for this must contract in winter and swell in summer; it would also resist the pressure of the external air, and render the walls a little less like our solid brick. Building with this design, it was necessary that I should be constantly on the ground when the work was going on, and then it was with considerable difficulty that I could bring the workmen up to the point. Dr. Bridgman, who frequently called while the work was in progress, and who has had considerable experience in building, pronounces the walls "very strong." The building is 35 feet by 39; from the foundation to the eaves 27 feet. The roof is four-sided, having eave-troughs lined with lead, so that the water is carried to the back side of the house where it runs down hollow bamboo poles, into large earthern jars (kaung) holding more than a barrel a piece, standing in the shade. In the Chapel, occupying a central position, are four pillars nearly a foot in diameter, and fifteen feet apart. These support the beams upon which the joists of the chamber floor rest. They also extend above the chamber, and give support to the roof of the attic, which is just 15 feet square, and overlooks the whole city, and surrounding country. The space between the main roof and the attic roof is occupied with windows. This room is finished, except painting the floor. All the rooms of the chamber are finished except the painting, which is in progress as these hands of mine can find leisure and strength to do it. All the glass I have put in myself, and done it much better and much quicker than any of my workmen could do it.

The workmen are engaged at present in making Venetian blinds and stairs, together with a roof to protect them. The Chapel is unfinished. The out-houses for a cook room, sleeping apartments for our Chinese household, &c., are not yet built. On the entrance way, between the Chapel and the street, there are two small smoky old houses yet to be torn down, but they cannot be spared at present.

The whole amount thus far expended on the building, has been little less than 1,300 dollars. And it ought to be mentioned here, that soon after we commenced, the price of brick became higher, (one third higher than at present,) and kept up till we had done purchasing. We saved something by sending our teachers out to the kilns to make purchases. Timber also is much dearer here than at home. For instance, the four pillars cost about 40 dollars, and the beams and joists, &c., in proportion.

One advantage in making purchases myself has been this, that I have been able to obtain timbers that were suitable, whereas, if it were let out by the job, the sure result would be that, for the sake of cheapness, unsuitable timbers would have been used, if not in size, yet in quality.

Some of the advantages of our present dwelling, compared with the old one, are already manifest. In this climate, in the summer season, it is important to obtain the refreshing breezes, which come almost constantly from the south-west. The old place is spacious, but not airy. Our new house is less spacious, but more airy. If there is any breeze from any quarter, being elevated seventeen feet above the surface of the ground, we can obtain some of it. And by ascending into the attic, which is ten feet higher, we get more. As to the pleasantness of the two locations, there is a vast difference. At the old place, from our windows we could see nothing but clouds or sky or stars. But from our present chamber we can look abroad upon the sea of roofs, undulating as it were beneath our feet, and from the attic we have at once a view of the whole city and portions of the surrounding country. Besides the pleasantness of it, we may be reminded through the eye of the extent of the field which is white already to the harvest, and thus receive, perhaps, in the hour of retirement and meditation, a new impetus to our zeal.

Perhaps I should not go beyond the truth in saying, that it has been with the most constant effort and care, that I have got so near through with the building, without spending more money. In the outset I entered into a contract with a builder to do the work for so much a day, he boarding his men. It was 150 cash (about 10 cents) a day for each man. But before the walls were completed, I dismissed him for misdemeanor, and hired my own men, and boarded them. This plan I have pursued ever since, and find it more economical, notwithstanding I give the workmen better board than they had before. The discipline upon the man was a severe one, as it touched both his pocket and his reputation. He made several most beseeching efforts to regain his place, but to no avail. I think I lost nothing in the eyes of the workmen, in consequence of my thus fixing the seal of my disapprobation upon that which was wrong.

In the process of building, I have frequently found valuable assistance in my teacher Taung. And what is still more gratifying, he has given additional proofs of his integrity. At one time I entrusted him with $45, with which he, in company with Bro. W.'s teacher, went into the country to buy brick. At another time he took $50 for the same purpose, and all came off in a most business-like manner. It was for an indirect charge of dishonesty, preferred against him by my head man while the proof of his honesty was apparent, that I dismissed the said head man, as before stated. This, however, was not his first offense. The teacher was assisting me in making purchases more economically than suited the head man. For this reason he, from the first manifested a hostility towards him, making unjust charges, &c.

My visits to the country, at the tea shop formerly referred to, were continued weekly until the extreme heat rendered it impracticable to continue them. As to other missionary labor, it has been limited. Frequent opportunies, however, have been granted me of addressing individuals, and sometimes a small group of them, on the concerns of the soul. To the workmen I have endeavored to impart instruction as opportunities have occurred.

We have probably gone a little in advance of your expectations in the line of building. One object was to stop that rent; and another was to get through with the heaviest of it, if possible, before the hottest part of the season should be upon us as an armed man. Thanks to God, that we have succeeded in both of these respects. If other remittances shall arrive early enough, we hope to be able to open the chapel for divine worship in September or October. Indeed, it might have been ready by the present time, if I had not dismissed a part of the workmen more than two months ago. When all shall have been completed, I will report again. I see no good reason yet to regret our choice of this place. Pray for us, brethren, that the work of the Lord may prosper in our hands.

My teacher Taung, learning that I am writing home, of his own accord requests to be remembered to you all, saying that although we are separated by the distance of several myriads of miles, we are all as one family, and should all be diligently engaged in disseminating the truths of the Bible. I trust he will prove to be a jewel in the diadem of our Redeemer. So may it be.

Yours truly, S. CARPENTER.

A REMINISCENCE OF OLDEN TIME.

The following interesting document, showing the patriotism which animated the people of Westerly, R. I., in the commencement of those aggressions which led to the severance of the ties between the colonies and the mother country, was copied for the Providence Journal from the records of the town of Westerly. The Samuel Ward who served as Moderator of the meeting described, was connected with what is now the 1st Hopkinton Seventh-day Baptist Church. He was a member of the Continental Congress during the years 1774–75, and till March '76, when he died, just before the Declaration of Independence. Had he lived long enough, his name would doubtless have been attached to that document:—

At a town meeting especially called and held at the dwelling house of Major Edward Bliven, in Westerly, in the county of Kings, February 2d, A. D., 1774.

The Hon. Samuel Ward, Esq., chosen Moderator. The Moderator and several other gentlemen laid before the meeting the vast importance of civil and religious liberty to society, and then stated the natural and constitutional rights and privileges of the colonists, and the many infringements of those rights by several acts of Parliament for raising a revenue in America, and other unconstitutional purposes, upon which the Moderator, Joshua Babcock, Esq., Mr. James Rhodes, Col. Wm. Pendleton, Mr. George Sheffield, Oliver Crary, Esq., and Capt. Benjamin Park, were appointed a committee to take the important subjects before the meeting into their consideration, and report as soon as may be what measures will be proper for the town to take in the present alarming situation of the colonies.

The meeting was adjourned for a few hours, and the freemen being again assembled, the Committee reported the following resolves, all which were unanimously received and voted:—

Resolved, 1st. That our ancestors being oppressed in their native country, and denied the liberty of worshiping God according to the dictates of their consciences, had a natural and just right to emigrate from Britain to this or any other part of the world.

2d. That upon their arrival in America, they found the country in the actual possession of the Indian natives, who had the sole and absolute jurisdiction of the same, and a perfect and exclusive right and property in the soil and its produce of every kind.

3d. That they purchased the soil, and with it the jurisdiction of the country, of the Sachems, the then lords and proprietors thereof, and accordingly became possessed of an exclusive natural and just right and property in the same, with a right to improve or dispose of the same and all its various produce in any manner which they chose, and might have incorporated themselves into distinct or separate societies or governments without any connexion with any European power whatsoever.

4th. That their attachment to their native country and its excellent constitution, made them forget their former sufferings, hope for better times, and put themselves and the vast territory which they had acquired under the allegiance of the Crown of England, upon express condition that all their natural, civil, and religious rights and privileges should be secured to them and their heirs forever. This security was solemnly granted and confirmed accordingly in their respective charters, with all the "liberties and immunities of free and natural subjects within any of the dominions of the then King of England, &c., his heirs or successors, to all intents, constructions and purposes whatsoever, as if they or every one of them had been born within the realm of England." And these privileges have been since confirmed by several acts of Parliament.

5th. That the charter of this colony doth in the strongest manner possible grant unto the inhabitants thereof, all those rights and privileges, with complete jurisdiction within the territory they had purchased, and an entire exemption from all services, duties, fines, forfeitures, claims and demands whatsoever, except the fifth part of all the ore of gold and silver found in the colony, which is reserved in lieu of these duties. The General Assembly therefore of this colony have the sole and exclusive right to lay taxes and imposts upon the inhabitants thereof.

6th. That the act of the British Parliament claiming a right to make laws binding upon the colonies in all cases whatsoever, is inconsistent with the natural, constitutional and charter rights and privileges of the inhabitants of this colony.

7th. That the acts of Parliament forbidding us to transport our wool by water from one town to another, or prohibiting the working up the iron or other raw materials which the country affords, are arbitrary, oppressive, and inconsistent with our natural and charter rights.

8th. That all acts of Parliament for raising a revenue in America are a notorious violation of the liberties and immunities granted by charter to the inhabitants of this Colony, and have a tendency to deprive them of the liberties which, as freemen and subjects, they have a right to by Magna Charta, and the Bill of Rights, and also to deprive them of the fruit of their own labor and the produce of their own lands, and to make the present colonists and all their property slaves to the people, or rather the Ministry, of Great Britain.

9th. That the granting salaries to the Governor's and Judges in the Colonies, the enlarging the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty, the appointment of the Board of Commissioners, the increase of the Custom House officers, the arbitrary power given to those officers to break into any man's house, (ever considered by law as a sacred retirement from all force and violence until now,) and to forcibly enter into his bed-chamber, break open his desks and trunks, and offer all kinds of insult to his family, the introducing fleets and armies to support these officers, and enforce a submission to every act of oppression, are inconsistent with every idea of liberty, and will certainly, if not immediately checked, establish arbitrary power and slavery in America, with all their fatal consequences.

10th. That the act of Parliament entitled an act for the better preserving his Majesty's dock yards, &c., is a flagrant violation of all our natural and constitutional rights, for by this act any man in America may be seized and carried to any part of Britain, there to be tried upon a pretence of his being concerned in burning a boat, vessel, or any material for building, or any naval stores, and subjected to a foreign jurisdiction, under the direction of those who neither know nor regard him, and though innocent, he is sure to be ruined.

11th. That the act allowing the East India Company to export tea to America, subject to a duty payable here, and the actual sending the tea into the Colonies by the Company, are manifest attempts to enforce the revenue acts, and undoubtedly designed to make a precedent for establishing taxes and monopolies in America, in order that a general tax upon all the necessaries of life and on all our lands may take place, and monopolies of all valuable branches of commerce may be established in this country. We will, therefore, neither receive as a gift any dutied tea, but shall consider all persons concerned in introducing dutied tea into this town as enemies to their country.

12th. That it is the duty of every man in America who loves God, his King, or his country, to oppose, by all proper measures, every attempt upon the liberties of this country, and particularly the importation of tea subject to a duty, and to exert himself to the utmost to obtain a redress of the grievances the Colonies groan under.

13th. That the inhabitants of this town ever have been, and now are, loyal and dutiful subjects to their Sovereign; that they have a most affectionate regard for their brethren in Britain and Ireland; that in all the wars in America they have, when the government has been constitutionally applied to by the Crown, granted all the aid in their power, and frequently more than was expected; that they are still ready, in a constitutional way, to grant such aid and assistance to the Crown as the necessity of the case may require, and their ability will admit. But though we are ready to sacrifice our lives and fortunes for the true honor and good of our mother country, we cannot give up our liberties to any person on earth; they are dearer to us than our lives. We do therefore solemnly resolve and determine that we will heartily unite with the other towns in this, and all our sister colonies, and exert our whole force and influence in support of the just rights and privileges of the American Colonies.

14th. That the Moderator, Joshua Babcock, Esq., Mr. James Rhodes, Mr. George Sheffield, and Maj. James Babcock, or the major part of them, be a committee for this town, to correspond with all other committies appointed by any town, in this, or the other colonies, and the committee is directed to give the closest attention to everything which concerns the liberties of America, and if any tea, subject to a duty, should be imported into this town, or any thing else attempted injurious to liberty, the committee is directed and impowered to call a town meeting forthwith, that such measures may be taken as the public safety may require.

15th. We highly applaud and sincerely thank our brethren in the several sister colonies of America, particularly in Boston, Virginia, and Philadelphia, for their public and virtuous stand in defense of the common liberties of America. And we return thanks to the town of Newport, for their patriotic resolutions to maintain the liberties of their country, and the prudent measures they have taken to induce the other towns in this colony to come into the same generous resolutions.

Voted, That the proceedings of this town meeting be published in the Newport Mercury.

The meeting was the fullest ever held in this town at this season of the year, and there was not a single dissenting vote upon any occasion.

Voted, This town meeting be dissolved.

WESTERLY, Aug. 1851.

For the Sabbath Recorder.

DIED, in Hopkinton, R. I., on the 11th inst., Mrs. EMILY SAUNDERS, wife of Daniel Saunders, in the 24th year of her age. Mrs. S. was a worthy member of the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church in the town where she died. Her disease was consumption, which manifested itself in her case something more than a year since. Her husband, and a son about one year old, sustain a severe loss in her death.

For a wife and mother—gifted, young, and ardent in her affections—to know that she must soon be forever parted by death from her husband and dear prattling boy, must be a sufficient reason for the following production. It was the last effort of our sister at writing with her own hand, and this she placed in her small Bible, as a present to her husband after her death. It is as follows:—

To my Husband.

And must we part so soon, love?
Say, must I bid adieu
To all that earth holds dear,
And go so soon from you?

The earth seems fair and pleasant,
The birds are singing gay,
All nature smiles so sweetly,
Yet I must pass away.

It costs me many a pang, love,
To yield up all that's dear;
For who has dearer friends than I,
Her weary hours to cheer?

But I must give thee up, love,
And you will lonely be;
I ne'er shall come to you again,
But you will come to me.

And when the day is done, love,
And you're from labor free,
'T is then you'll be most lonely;
Oh! then commune with me.

'T is then you'll take our darling boy—
And hush'd be ever sigh—
You'll strain him closely to your breast,
While my spirit hovers nigh.

You'll bring him where I sleep, love,
Show him my lonely bed,
Tell him his own dear mother
There rests her weary head.

Then tell him of the angels,
Who bear the spirits home,
To dwell where pain, and sorrow,
And death, can never come. EMILY.

A day or two before her death, when she had been much distressed for a while, being entirely unable to write, she asked her mother to take paper, and she would tell her something to write. She then dictated the following:—

I am weary, I am weary,
Oh! fain would I rest;
I would fly to my Jesus,
And lodge in his breast.

The earth is all faded,
Its beauty is gone;
Oh! hasten, dear Saviour,
And carry me home.

Still nearer the closing scene, she was heard to repeat this extract:—

"Though cold are the billows,
And dark is the wave,
With Jesus beside me,
Its surges I'll brave."

She was farther heard to say, "I shall fall into the arms of my Saviour; he will take me; I am not afraid to go;" and soon she rested quietly in death.

Having had the opportunity and pleasure, from personal conversation with sister Saunders during her illness, to witness to a good degree the power with which religion operated on her heart, and feeling that such illustrations of its efficacy are among the most tangible and profitable of its actual and living manifestations, I communicate the same in the foregoing, in hope that it may serve to incline others to seek in life, as preparatory to death, the same boon which our sister so richly enjoyed in the time of her trial—the hour of her visitation. L. C.

THE AFRICAN CITY OF ABEOKUTA.

Notices of this place have recently appeared, for the first time, in our missionary journals; and as it is quite unknown to most persons, the following facts, which have cost considerable research, may be useful to our readers:—

Abeokuta stands on the Ogee river, in latitude 7 deg. 8 min. north. It is the capital of the Yariba country, lying contiguous on the eastward to Dahomey, and about 140 miles eastward of Liberia, in nearly the same latitude. Abeokuta is 50 miles from Badagry, and about the same distance from Labos, in the Bight of Benin, where Clapperton, and both the Landers, landed on their exploring expeditions to the river Niger. The inhabitants of this kingdom are called Yombas.

The city of Abeokuta is about eleven miles in circuit, and contains according to some authors 50,000 inhabitants. Others give it 75,000, and one 100,000.

About 3,000 of the inhabitants are natives of this region, who had been carried off as slaves, recaptured, and sent to Sierra Leone, whence after a few years they found their way back, bringing with them a valuable amount of knowledge and civilization.

The market is daily supplied with all the necessaries of life; and an active trade is carried on with the interior, though attended with great risk of property and life. Kidnapping is very common, and the citizens are continually in danger of being seized and sold by their warlike neighbors.

The chief of Abeokuta seems to possess intelligence and energy. He is the man who first attempted to imitate our mode of building houses. His doors will admit a person to enter erect, he has windows, and rooms floored with boards, and paint on his house. His example and influence will doubtless be felt for good by his people. They are already greatly ahead of the tribes around Sierra Leone in intelligence and civilization. Arrangements were in progress, at our last advices, to establish "a model farm."

Three black clergymen of the Church of England are settled here, viz: D. H. Trotter, S. Crowther, and Mr. Townsend, all well educated men. There is also a Methodist station and missionary here. The number of disciples to Christianity is about 300, some of whom became converts at Sierra Leone. The mass of the natives adhere to their superstition, but the existence and operations of Christian teachers is exciting much attention in the interior.

The people of Abeokuta stand in constant terror of the people of Lagos, as the latter are devoted to the slave trade, and often seize and sell citizens of adjacent regions. The Abeokutans have a law prohibiting kidnapping, under the heaviest penalty, but the chiefs are not able to enforce it fully, and never will be, while Lagos is under the influence of the Portuguese and Brazilians. REFUSAL TO COMMUNE.

Some time since, we attended a sacramental meeting in a neighboring church, and as we were distributing the elements, observed a worthy deacon sitting on the seats appropriated to the portion of the congregation that did not wish to partake of the ordinance. Knowing him to be a very good man, we took occasion, after the services were over, to express our surprise and regret at seeing him in such a position. He replied that he had a personal difficulty in a pecuniary transaction with one of the members of the church, and, having lost all confidence in his piety, could never again sit down at the same communion table with him. He seemed to think that he was perfectly justifiable in this course. We replied by asking a simple question: "Do you consider yourself better than the Saviour? He sat down to his own table with Judas, who, he knew, in a few hours would betray him, and who was a thief from the beginning."

The question seemed to puzzle him, and we parted; but as we were about to leave, on the next day, he came and expressed his great sorrow for having acted as he did. We then took occasion to remark, that there was a strong probability that he had harshly judged his brother; but if he had not, the other's having done wrong could never justify him in committing another wrong, in refusing to remember Christ. The command of the Master was, "Do this in remembrance of me." The fact that another had defrauded him could never authorize him to defraud his Saviour of that grateful and heartfelt remembrance of him in his ordinance which was his just due. He quoted the saying of the Saviour: "If thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother has aught against thee, leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; first be rceconciled to they brother, and then come and offer thy gift." We replied that that passage was not more applicable to the Lord's supper than it was to prayer, or any other approach to God; that if his interpretation of it was correct, he ought never to pray any more until he had settled his difficulty with his brother. We parted, and were happy to learn from him, a short time since, that the train of thought then started in his mind had led him to seek a reconciliation, and that he had been successful. Perhaps the same thoughts may be useful to some of our readers, who have been guilty of similar folly with this good brother. [Herald.

THE COUNSEL OF WOMAN.

Dr. Boardman, in his amirable work, "Hints on Domestic Happiness," inculcates this doctrine, which we cordially endorse:—

"In a conversation I once held with an eminent minister of our Church, he made this fine observation: 'We will say nothing of the manner but the intutive judgments of women are often more to be relied upon than the conclusions which we reach by an elaborate process of reasoning.' No man that has an intelligent wife, or who is accustomed to the society of educated women, will dispute this.

"Times without number you must have known them to decide questions on the instant, and with unerring accuracy, which you had been poring over for hours, perhaps, with no other result than to find yourself deeper and deeper into the tangled maze of doubts and difficulties. It were hardly generous to allege that they achieve these feasts less by reasoning than by a sort of sagacity which approximates to the sure instinct of the animal races; and yet there seems to be some ground for the remark of a witty French writer, that, when a man has toiled, step by step, up a flight of stairs, he will be sure to find a woman at the top; but she will not be able to tell how she got there.

"How she got there, however, is of little moment. If the conclusions a woman has reached are sound, that is all that concerns us. And that they are very apt to be sound on the practical matters of domestic and secular life, nothing but prejudice or self-conceit can prevent us from acknowledging. The inference, therefore, is unavoidable, that the man who thinks it beneath his dignity to take counsel with an intelligent wife, stands in his own light, and betrays that lack of judgment which he tacitly attributes to her."

THE GREAT PROBLEM.

A young man who had graduated at one of our best colleges, and who was celebrated for his literary attainments, particularly in mathematics, settled in a village where a faithful minister of the gospel was stationed. Soon after the young man had settled there, the clergyman met him in one of his evening walks, and after some conversation, when they were about to part, he said to him—"I have heard you are distinguished for your mathematical skill; I have a problem which I wish you to solve." "What is it?" eagerly asked the young man. The clergyman answered, in a solemn tone of voice, "What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" The youth returned home and endeavored to shake off the impression fastened on him by the problem proposed, but in vain. In the giddy round of pleasure, in his business, and in his studies, the question still forcibly returned to him, "What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" It resulted in his conversion, and he became an able advocate and preacher of that gospel which he once rejected.

FOREKNOWLEDGE.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

On perusing the article in the Recorder of Dec. 11, in answer to my queries of Nov. 28, I am led to fear that I am misapprehended, or that I misapprehend you. I will therefore explain, and by your permission further inquire.

As to the question of "God's foreknowledge," I readily admit my full belief that it is perfect. "Great is our Lord, and of great power; his understanding is infinite." Ps. 147: 5.

In regard to the term "contingency," I used it in the sense of freedom; not as opposed to certainty, but to necessity. Now, all actions are certain, but are all actions therefore necessary? But that the matter may be clearly understood, I will further explain. The term "necessary" is used in the sense of force. When I say a thing was necessary, I mean that God "decreed" it; it could not have been otherwise. And when I say a thing was "contingent," I mean that it might be thus or otherwise for aught that God has "decreed" with respect to it; the creature being free in this respect.

It is not my purpose to be captious, but I notice in your second article on the "Efficacy of Prayer," in the paper containing the strictures above alluded to, the following statements: "No one truly prays, till the Spirit of Life has taken possession of his soul." "And not an instance can be cited of spiritual blessings being bestowed upon any one who did not seek them by fervent prayer." As I understand these statements, the first affirms that no one can or will truly pray for a spiritual blessing, until it is first bestowed; and the second declares, that no one can obtain a spiritual blessing, until he first seeks it by earnest prayer.
N. V. HULL.

ALFRED CENTER, Dec. 16, 1851.

Remarks.

We deny that God foreknew actions or events as certain, except upon the supposition that the certainty of them was first established. If God, from all eternity, foreknew that Bro. H. and ourselves would be engaged in this discussion, he foreknew it as certain. But unless the certainty of it were first established, determined, or decreed, he could not have foreknown it. He might have conjectured it; but he could not have pronounced, with infallible certainty, that the event would take place. But he was able to declare the event with infallible certainty; for "his understanding is infinite." Therefore the event was decreed.

We do not argue that the foreknowledge of an event makes it certain. If God should, by immediate revelation, give us to know that, fifty years hence, a certain John Smith will commit murder, it is very clear that our knowledge of what John Smith will do, will have no influence to make him do it. So God's infallible foreknowledge of all events has no influence to make them certain. But the question is not whether God's foreknowledge of events makes them certain, but whether it implies or proves their certainty. Our foreknowledge of the fact that John Smith will commit murder, does not, it is true, cause him to do such wickedness; but, most unquestionably, it implies the infallible certainty of the event. We could not foreknow it, and God himself could not give us the foreknowledge of it, if it were not first decreed or established. So neither could God foreknow all other events, unless the certainty of their occurrence were first decreed.

To say that God's decrees argue the necessity of the events decreed, and that this necessity implies force to bring them about, and that they are therefore not brought about in perfect consistency with the freedom of the agent, is to say what there is no just ground for saying. As we have already seen, the foreknowledge of an event shows that it will, infallibly and certainly, take place. Now, suppose the event to have actually taken place. Of course, the proposition which affirms it to have taken place, is not only true, but it is necessarily true. The proposition which affirms it not to have taken place, is not only false, but it is necessarily false. That is, it is impossible that it should be otherwise than true that the event has transpired. Now, only let it be considered, that God's foreknowledge of an event is just as clear and certain as our *after*knowledge of it, and it will be seen that the proposition which declares that it will take place, is not only true, but that it is impossible that it should be otherwise than true; that is, it is necessarily true. And if the proposition, which declares that the event will take place, is necessarily true, then there is a necessity that the event should take place to make it true. But we deny that this necessity argues force to bring the event about. It argues merely, that God sees a firm and indissoluble connection between the subject and predicate of the proposition which affirms its future existence. For example, in the proposition, John Smith will commit murder fifty years hence, the subject is the commission of a murderous act by John Smith; the predicate, the future existence of that event, or the occurrence of it fifty years hence. Now, between the subject and predicate of this proposition there is such an established connection, that any proposition affirming that John Smith will not commit murder fifty years hence, is not only false, but it is impossible that it should by otherwise than false.

If it be inquired, How can God decree, foreordain or determine the future existence of an event, and yet not use force to bring it to pass?—our reply is, that we cannot tell. There is a mystery in God's operations, which we do not pretend to comprehend. But we are disposed to ascribe to Him not only a physical but a moral omnipotence. And in virtue of this moral omnipotence, he orders events certainly and infallibly, without infringing in the least degree upon the freedom of those who are concerned in bringing them about.

The discrepancy discovered by our correspondent in the two sentences which he quotes from our second article on the efficacy of prayer, may be very important in his mind. We beg leave to reiterate our statement, however, that "no one truly prays, till the Spirit of Life has taken possession of his soul." Prayer, being a spiritual exercise, proceeds only from a spiritual nature. As a beast cannot act like a man, without first partaking of human nature; or, as a man cannot act like an angel, without first partaking of the angelic nature; so neither can the carnal man act spiritually, without first partaking of the new or spiritual nature. Nothing can exceed the limits of its own nature in action. "A corrupt tree cannot bring forth good fruit." But as our article was written, not in view of this controversy which our correspondent has founded upon it, but for the practical benefit of those misguided Christians who dispute the necessity of prayer, we conceive that the second statement, that "not an instance can be cited of spiritual blessings being bestowed upon any one who did not seek them by fervent prayer," is not fairly at variance with the first. In the second statement, we did not so much speak of that spiritual life, without which there can be no true prayer, and of which every Christian is supposed to be possessed already, as of those additional blessings which are essential to the perfection of Christian character.

JEWISH MISSIONS.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

A long period has elapsed since any prominent position has been taken by Seventh-day Baptists in favor of a Jewish Mission. Has the necessity ceased in the contemplation of a Chinese Mission? Do the Haytiens, Abyssinians, and Canadians, possess a stronger claim on us than the descendants of Abraham? Or is their conversion to pure Christianity considered hopeless, because they refuse to be discipled by those whose Christianity is scarcely preferable to Judiasm? Have the promises to that people of a glorious future ceased to inspire us with hope? No. The promise of a glorious future for God's ancient people, still inspires the true believer with hope. Their conversion is as sure as the Book of God is true. They are a perpetual miracle before us, which no circumstances can conceal, and the rise and fall of empires has no tendency to involve or annihilate. Though they have been crushed, peeled, and spoiled, and the iniquity of their oppressors has been active to destroy, yet there remains a living army to mock their spoilers with their own madness and folly. They are still the same peculiar people, as distinct from the other nations of the world as they were when Jerusalem was the seat of their empire, and the residence of their kings.

The Jews are charged with being a stiff-necked and stubborn people, because they will neither conform to the Pagan, Mahometan, or Christian religion, but persist in being Jews. But there are those who take a different view, and are disposed to consider their adherence to their ancient religion as a dictate of faith, which, by a peculiar providence of God, they inherit and adhere to as a part of their very existence. Not that God has shut them up in unbelief, but more properly he has shut them out from a belief in a corrupted christianity—that is, a christianity in contradiction to the prophets, and to its own profession of inspiration. The purposes of God in respect to the Jews are only understood by his word. All that has been predicted of them has come to pass, except the last and now unfulfilled prophecy of their conversion and ingathering. And shall we adopt the language of unbelief, that since the fathers have fallen asleep, all things shall remain as they were from the beginning? Or shall we, as believing and confiding disciples, rejoice in the prospects of their sure adoption, and the testimony that as their rejection has been the riches of the gentiles, their ingathering and conversion will be as life from the dead, and the hope of the world?

But some will object, that efforts for their conversion have been made, not only by other denominations, but by Seventh-day Baptists, and the result has been alike abortive and unprofitable. This is in part true; but the fact is, that we have never given the test required, or gone to work in a manner that promised success. It is true that a dozen years since our churches were somewhat interested, and our Missionary Society entered into the consideration of the subject. They did then solemnly pledge themselves that they would commence the work that had pressed on their hearts, and they felt themselves involved in missionary effort for the lost sheep of the house of Israel. And well I remember the feeling manifested by the members of the Missionary Board, when the resolve had passed. "It is now evident," said a worthy minister to his brethren present, with much emotion, "that some of us must lay our bones in a foreign land." But what was the sequel? Why, trembling under the responsibility of a foreign mission, they compromised the matter, and sent a brother to labor among the Jews in New York. The consequences were foretold as ruinous to the mission, and certain not only to end in disappointment as to present labors, but discouragement in time to come. Whether this prediction has proved true, is obvious to all.

If the reasons then urged for the Seventh-day Baptists to engage in a Jewish Mission were sound, they remain so at present, unless it is evident that we are rejected from the work, which I trust is not the case. The oppressed and suffering Israelites in other lands, are vastly different from the free, irreligious, speculating, and thriving Jews of our own country. Mr. Wolff, the celebrated missionary to the Jews, admitted in conversation with the writer, that the Sabbath-observing Christians would be by far more accessible to the Jews of other countries, than those who observed the first day, as the change of the Sabbath was a great obstacle to their conversion to Christianity.

Whether we shall ever gather resolution again to commence this mission, is a question; but, at the very place contemplated, there is now a society of seventh-day people, converted in part from the Jews, and who sedulously maintain their faith, and refuse and repel the advances of first-day christians. That seventh-day people, and Baptists too, should have arisen at Jerusalem, without our aid, or any knowledge of Seventh-day Baptists, is a matter worthy of note, and requires a serious thought, whether there is not a duty remaining for us to do. They are endeavoring to avail themselves of the arts of enlightened agricultural nations, and need much aid to accomplish what they desire. And if we are not permitted, on account of our unbelief, to enter that land of promise, to propagate the gospel of the divine Redeemer, to carry the glad tidings of salvation to those perishing, and the claims of Christ to the confidence of Israel as their Messiah and King, we may contribute to aid the converts to live, and obtain an honest support by industry, in agriculture and the arts, without being tempted to abandon their faith, or unite themselves with the more popular denominations to perpetuate their existence. There are facts in connection with this subject which, if I am permitted, I will place before the readers of the Recorder, for their information and consideration.

RESEARCHES IN PALESTINE.—Rev. Edward Robinson, D. D., Professor of Biblical Literature in the Union Theological Seminary of New York, sailed for Liverpool by the steamer of last Sabbath, on a tour of research in Palestine. Several years ago Dr. Robinson visited that country under the promptings of curiosity. Finding that many important facts concerning it had never been made public, and that a great deal that had been written was mixed with error, he made a somewhat thorough examination of localities, &c., the results of which were embodied in his volumes, now almost indispensable to the biblical student, entitled "Researches in Palestine." For a while past, distinguished scholars in Europe and America have been urging him to renew and extend his researches; and the Trustees of the Seminary having seconded this appeal, he has consented to go forth again to that field, there to study and interpret the Bible, not for himself only, but for the benefit of all who may see fit to avail themselves of the aid his researches will afford.

THE THEOLOGY OF DYING MEN.—In a notice of the death of Rev. Dr. Alexander, of Princeton, N. J., it is stated that near the closing scene he said, "All my theology is reduced to this narrow compass, 'Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners.'" In an account of the last hours of Rev. Dr. Carroll, lately deceased, it is said that near his end he repeated, with a slight alteration in applying it, the words of the great Apostle, 'This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am indeed the chief.' The added "indeed" indicates how much in that trying moment he felt the humility which becomes a sinner, and the consequent helplessness which creates the necessity for an Almighty Saviour.

KOSSUTH ON THE BIBLE AND RELIGION.—It is stated (says the Watchman and Reflector) that Kossuth has been made a Vice President of the American Bible Society, on motion of Rev. Dr. Tyng, who accompanied the motion with an eloquent speech on his life and services. It is certain that while Kossuth was in England, he won the respect of the religious portion of the people, by his recognitions of Divine Providence in the affairs of his nation, and by the religious sentiment which so often appeared in his speeches. In receiving a German Bible from ladies in London, he welcomed it as the source of his own consolation, and as the foundation of freedom. "Religion," said he, "is a necessity to an honest and thinking man."

ROCHESTER UNIVERSITY AND THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—A meeting in behalf of these institutions was held in New York city on Fifth-day evening of last week. They occupy a commanding position in the heart of one of the richest sections of our country, and their growth thus far has been unprecented. Since their opening in November, 1850, over 240 students have been received into the different departments of the two. Able Professors have been secured, and it is the aim of the Boards of Trust to furnish the highest grade of instruction. $200,000 has already been pledged toward the endowment. One object of this meeting was to awaken a deeper interest in securing an additional $50,000, deemed essential for safe endowment.

SPREAD OF THE GOSPEL IN FLORENCE.—Under the influence of the Spirit of God, a deep religious interest has been excited in Florence, and numbers of Italians are now inquiring for the Scriptures, and reading them with delight. According to the Count Guicciardini, there are more than 2000 persons who are under the influence of the gospel in various degrees, some still seeking it, and others having found it.

BAPTIST MISSION AT RANGOON.—Rev. Mr. Kincaid writes: The governor of Tha Nhen, a city some fifteen miles from Rangoon, called on us with forty or fifty followers, and when he left, gave us a pressing invitation to visit him and his family. Yesterday morning, twelve priests, with twenty-five or thirty of their pupils, called on us, and remained about two hours. Among other things, they wished to know where the religion of Christ had spread.

LOUIS KOSSUTH.

Louis Kossuth, Governor of Hungary, has closed his labors in New York. Last week, in addition to receiving committees and delegations daily, he delivered addresses at the Press Banquet on Second-day evening, at a Military Levee on Third-day evening, at a meeting in Brooklyn on Fifth-day evening, at a Banquet of the Bar on Sixth-day evening, and at a meeting of Ladies in Metropolitan Hall on Sabbath afternoon. The first three days of the present week were to be spent in retirement at the house of some friend, in the hope of recruiting his overtaxed energies preparatory to proceeding on Fourth-day to Philadelphia, where he was to spend that and the following day, departing on Sixth-day morning for Baltimore, where he will remain till Second-day, when he will visit Washington. Probably all of next week will be given to Washington, whence he will proceed to visit Cincinnati and a few other of the most important points in the West, prior to his return to Europe in February.

In New York a large Committee has been organized to collect funds in aid of Hungary, and they are now receiving subscriptions in sums of from one dollar to one thousand dollars. For the meeting in Brooklyn, tickets were sold at $5 each, while as much more was in many cases given for a choice of seats, so that some ten thousand dollars for the Hungarian Fund was realized from that gathering. For the meeting in Metropolitan Hall, also, tickets were sold at from two to five dollars, and the avails were devoted to the cause which Kossuth pleads.

The deep interest every where felt in the sayings and doings of the distinguished Hungarian Leader, induces us to give entire his farewell speech in New York. He was introduced to the audience by Rev. Dr. Tyng, who, after appropriate remarks, concluded by saying that "the ladies are now ready to hear the voice of Kossuth, and respond to the claims of Hungary."

Kossuth's Farewell Speech.

I would I were able to answer the call. I would I were able conveniently to fill the place which your kindness has assigned to me; but really I am in despair. I do not know how many times I have spoken within the last fourteen days in New York. Permit me to make some few remarks which are suggested to my mind by what has been stated. You were pleased to say that Austria was blind to let me escape. Be assured that it was not the merit of Austria. Austria would have been very glad to bury me, if not in the cold grave of death, at least in the equally cold grave of morality and government. But the Emperor of Turkey took courage to interfere with Austria; and notwithstanding all the reclamations of Austria, I am free—restored to life, because restored to duty and activity. If Austria had her will, it is true, I should have vanished out of the memory of man. It is a curious fate which I have. Perhaps there never was a man in the world who was so fond of tranquility as I am; and perhaps no man so fond of doing as much good as possible without being known, or even noticed as being in the world. Thus longing for tranquility, it was my destiny never to have a single moment in my life to see it fulfilled. But my guiding star was and will be "Duty;" and the pleasure and delight of the heart must wait, even for ever, if necessary, when duty calls. Ladies, worn out as I am, still I am glad, very glad, that it is the ladies of New York who have condescended to listen to my farewell. This, my farewell, cannot, will not be eloquent. When, in the midst of a busy day, the watchful care of a guardian angel throws some flowers of joy in the thorny way of man, he gathers them up with thanks, a cheerful thrill quivers through his heart, like the melody of an Æolian harp; but the earnest duties of life soon claim his attention and his care. The melodious thrill dies away, and on he must go, and on he goes, joyless, cheerless, and cold, every fibre of his heart bent to the earnest duties of the day. But when the hard work of the day is done, and the stress of mind for a moment subsides, then the heart again claims its right, and the tender fingers of our memory gather up again the violets of joy which the guardian angel threw in our way, and we look at them with so much joy, we cherish them as the favorite gifts of life—we are so glad—as glad as the child of Christmas eve. These are the happiest moments of man's life. But when we are not noisy, not eloquent, we are silent, almost mute, like nature in a midsummer's night, reposing from the burning heat of the day. Ladies, that is my condition now. It is a hard day's work which I have to do here. I am delivering my farewell address; and every compassionate smile, every warm grasp of the hand, every token of kindness which I ~~have~~ received, (and I have received so many,) every flower of consolation which the ladies of New York have thrown on my thorny way, rushes with double force to my memory. I feel so happy in this memory—there is a solemn tranquility about my mind; but in such a moment I would rather be silent than speak. I scarcely can speak. You know, ladies, that it is not the deepest feelings which are the loudest. (Applause.) And besides, I have to say, farewell to New York! This is a sorrowful word. What immense hopes are linked in my memory with this word New York—hopes of resurrection for my down-trodden fatherland—hopes of liberation for oppressed nations on the European Continent! Will the expectations which the mighty outburst of New York's young and generous heart foreshadowed, be realized? Will these hopes be fulfilled, or will the ray of consolation which New York cast on the dark night of my fatherland—will it pass away like an electric flash? Oh, could I cast one single glance into the book of futurity! No, God forgive me this impious wish. It is He who hid the future from man, and what He does is well done. It were not good for man to know his destiny. The energy of our sense of duty would falter or subside, if we were assured of the failure or success of our aims. (Applause.) It is because we do not know the future that we retain our energy of duty. So will I go on in my work, with the full energy of my humble abilities, without despair, but with hope. It is Eastern blood which runs in my veins; and I came from the East. I have, accordingly, somewhat of Eastern fatalism in my disposition, but it is the fatalism of a Christian who trusts with unwavering faith in the boundless goodness of a Divine Providence. But among all these different feelings and thoughts that come upon me in the hour of my farewell, one thing is almost indispensable to me, and that is, the assurance that the sympathy I have met with here will not pass away like the cheers which a warbling girl receives on the stage—that it will be preserved as a principle, and that when the emotion subsides, the calmness of reflection will but strengthen it, because it is a principle. This consolation I wanted, and this consolation I have, because, ladies, I place it in your hands. I bestow on your motherly and sisterly cares, the hopes of Europe's oppressed nations—the hopes of civil, political, social and religious liberty. Oh, let me entreat you, with the brief and stammering words of a warm heart, overwhelmed with emotions and with sorrowful cares—let me entreat you, ladies, to be watchful of the sympathy of your people, like the mother over the cradle of her beloved child. It is worthy of your watchful care, because it is the cradle of regenerated humanity. Especially in regard to my poor fatherland, I have particular claims on the fairer and better half of humanity, which you are.

The first of these claims is, that there is not, perhaps, on the face of the earth, a nation which, in its institutions, has shown more chivalric regard for ladies, than the Hungarian. It is a praiseworthy trait of the Oriental character. You know that it was the Moorish race, in Spain, who were the founders of the chivalric era in Europe, so full of personal virtue, so full of noble deeds, so devoted to the service of the ladies, to heroism, and to the protection of the oppressed. You are told that the ladies of the East are almost degraded to less than a human condition, being secluded from all social life, and pent up within the harem's walls. And so it is. But you must not judge the East by the measure of European civilization. They have their own civilization, quite different from ours in views, inclinations, affections, and thoughts Eastern mankind is traditional—the very soil retains the stamp of traditional antiquity. When you walk upon that old soil, with the Old Testament in your hand, and read the prophets and the patriarchs, on the very spot where they lived and walked, you are astonished to find that nature is as it was five thousand years ago, and that the cedars still grow on Lebanon, under the shadow of which the patriarchs were protected. You see the well just as Jacob saw it when Rachel gave drink to him and his camels. Every thing—the aspect of nature, the habits, the customs, the social life of the people, is measured, not by centuries, but by thousands of years. The women of the East live as they lived in the times of the patriarchs, and they feel happy. Let them remain so; (applause); who can wish them more on earth than happiness? Nothing is more ridiculous than to pity those who feel happy. But such is the fact, that there is almost a religious regard paid to women in the East. No man dares to injure or offend a woman there. He who would do so, would be despised by all like a dog. That respect goes so far, that the lord does not dare raise the carpet of his harem's door, still less enter it, where a pair of slippers before the threshold tells him that a lady is in the room. (Applause.) Respect and reverence for woman is the characteristic of the Orient. The Magyars are of Eastern stock, cast in Europe. We found all the blessings of civilization in your ladies; but we conserved for them the regard and reverence of our Oriental character. Nay, more than that, we carried these views into our institutions, and into our laws With us, the widow remains the head of the family, as the father was. As long as she lives, she is the mistress of the property of her deceased husband. The chivalrous spirit of the nation supposes she will provide, with motherly care, for the wants of her children, and she remains in possession so long as she bears her deceased husband's name. The old Constitution of Hungary, which we reformed upon a democratic basis—it having been aristocratic—under that instrument the widow of a lord had the right to send her representative to the Parliament, and in the county elections of public functionaries widows had a right to vote alike with the men. Perhaps the chivalrous character of my nation, so full of regard toward the fair sex, may somewhat commend my mission to the ladies of America.

Our second particular claim is, that the source of all the misfortune which now weighs so heavily upon my bleeding fatherland, is in two ladies—Catharine of Russia, and Sophia of Hapsburg—the ambitious mother of the young Nero Francis Joseph. You know that one hundred and fifty years ago, Charles the Twelfth of Sweden, the bravest of the brave, foreseeing the growth of Russia, and fearing that it would oppress and overwhelm civilization, ventured with a handful of men to overthrow the rising power of Russia. After immortal deeds, and almost fabulous victories, one loss made him a refugee upon Turkish soil, like myself. But, happier than myself, he succeeded in persuading Turkey of the necessity of checking Russia in her overweaning ambition, and of curtailing her growth. On went Mehemet Balzordsi with his Turks, and met Peter the Czar, and pent him up in a corner where there was no possibility of escape. There Mehemet held him with his iron grasp till hunger came to his aid. But nature claimed her rights, and in a council of war it was decided to surrender to Mehemet. Then Catharine, who was present in the camp, appeared in person before the Grand Vizier to sue mercy. She was fair, and she was rich with jewels of nameless value. She went to the Grand Vizier's tent. She came back without any jewels, but she brought mercy, and Russia was saved. From that celebrated day dates the downfall of Turkey, and that of Russia's growth. Out of this source flowed the stream of Russian preponderance over the European continent; and down-trodden liberty, and the nameless sufferings of Poland and of my poor native land, are the dreadful fruits of Catharine's success on that day, cursed in the records of humanity. The second lady who will be cursed through all posterity, in her memory, is Sophia, the mother of the present usurper of Hungary—she who had the ambitious dream to raise the limited power of a child upon the ruins of liberty, and on the neck of down-trodden nations. It was her ambition—the evil genius of the House of Hapsburg in the present day—which brought desolation upon us. I need only mention one fact to characterize what kind of a heart was in that cursed woman. On the anniversary of the day of Orod, where our martyrs bled, she came to the court with a bracelet of rubies gathered together in so many roses as were numbered by the heads of the brave Hungarians who fell there, and declared it a gift which she joyfully presented to the company as a memento which she wears on her very arm, to cherish its eternal memory, that she must not forget the pleasures she derived from the killing of those men who died at Orod. This very fact can give you a true knowledge of the character of that woman. And this is the second claim to the ladies' sympathy for oppressed humanity, and for my poor fatherland. I wish the free women of free America will help my down-fallen land to get out of that iron grasp, or to get out of those bloody fangs, and become independent and free.

Our third particular claim is the behavior of our ladies during the last war. It is no wanton praise—it is a fact what I say—that, in my hard task to lead on the struggle, and to govern Hungary, I had no more powerful auxiliaries, and no more faithful executors of the will of the nation, than in the women of Hungary. [Applause.] You know that in ancient Rome, after the battle of Cannæ, which was won by Hannibal, the victor was afraid to come down to the very walls of Rome. The Senate called on the people spontaneously to sacrifice all their wealth on the altar of their fatherland, and the ladies were the first to do it. Every jewel, every ornament, was brought forth, so much so that the tribune judged it necessary to pass a law prohibiting the ladies of Rome to wear jewlery or any silk dresses, in order that it might not appear the ladies of Rome had not, by their own choice, done so. Now, we wanted in Hungary no such law. The women of Hungary brought all they had. [Great applause.] You would have been astonished to see how, in the most wealthy houses of Hungary, if you were invited to dinner you would be forced to eat soup with iron spoons; and when the wounded and the sick—and many of them we had, because we fought hard—when the wounded and the sick were not so well provided as it would have been our duty and our pleasure to do, I ordered the Ministry and the respective public functionaries to take care of them. But the poor wounded went on suffering, and the Ministry went on slowly to provide for them. When I saw this, one single word to the ladies of Hungary, and in a few hours there was provision made for hundreds of thousands of sick. [Applause from the gentlemen present.] And I never met a single mother who would have withheld her son from sharing in the battle; but I have met many who ordered and commanded their children to fight for their fatherland. [Applause.] I saw many and many brides who urged on the bridegrooms to delay their day of happiness till they would come back victorious from the battles of their fatherland. Thus acted the ladies of Hungary. That country deserves to live; that country deserves to have a future left yet, which the women, as much as the men, love and cherish. [Applause.]

But I have a stronger motive than all these to claim your protecting sympathy for my country's cause. It is her nameless woes, nameless sufferings. In the name of that ocean of bloody tears which the sacrilegious hand of the tyrant wrung from the eyes of the childless mother—of the brides who beheld the hangman's sword between them and their wedding-day—in the name of all those mothers, wives, brides, daughters and sisters, who, by thousands of thousands, weep over the graves of Magyars so dear to their hearts, and weep the bloody tears of a patriot (as they all are) over the face of their beloved native land—in the name of all those torturing stripes with which the flagging hand of Austrian tyrants dared to outrage humanity in the womankind of my native land—in the name of that daily curse against Austria with which even the prayers of our women are mixed—in the name of the sufferings of my own dear wife—[here the whole audience rose and cheered vehemently, which compliment was gracefully acknowledged by Mad. K.]—the faithful companion of my life—of her, who for months and months was hunted by my country's tyrants, like a noble deer, not having for months a moment's rest to repose her wearied head in safety, and no hope, no support, no protection, but at the humble threshold of the hard-working people, as noble and generous as they are poor—[applause]—in the name of my poor little children, who, so young and scarcely conscious of their life, had already to learn what an Austrian prison is—in the name of all this, and, what is still more, in the name of down-trodden liberty, I claim, ladies of New York, your protecting sympathy for my country's cause. Nobody can do more for it than you. The heart of man is as soft wax in your tender hands. Mould it, ladies; mould it into the form of generous compassion for my country's wrongs, inspire it with the consciousness of your country's power, dignity, and might. You are the framers of man's character. Whatever be the fate of man, one stamp he always bears on his brow—that which the mother's hand impressed upon the soul of the child. The smile of your lips can make a hero out of the coward—(applause)—and a generous man out of the egotist; one word from you inspires the youth to noble resolutions; the lustre of your eyes is the fairest reward for the toils of life. You can even blow up the feeble spark of energy in the breast of broken age, that once more it may blaze up in a noble, a generous deed before it dies. All this power you have. Use it, ladies, use it in behalf of your country's glory, and for the benefit of oppressed humanity; and when you meet a cold calculator, who thinks by arithmetic when he is called to feel the wrongs of oppressed nations, convert him, ladies. Your smiles are commands, and the truth which pours forth instinctively from your hearts, is mightier than the logic articulated by any scholar. The Peri, excluded from Paradise, brought many generous gifts to heaven in order to regain it. She brought the dying sigh of a patriot; the kiss of a faithful girl, imprinted upon the lips of her bridegroom, distorted by the venom of the plague. She brought many other fair gifts; but the doors of Paradise opened before her only when she brought with her the first prayer of a man converted to charity and brotherly love for his oppressed brethren and humanity.

I am told that one of the newspapers, with a kind and generous intention, has declared of the cause which I have the honor to plead—has pointed out that there is a committee, who are about to raise money for the purpose of revolutionizing Europe. I perfectly understand the kind intention of the generous friend who wrote these words; but I beg leave to remark, that it is not my intention to get any people whatever to aid in the revolution of Europe. My axiom is that of the Irish poet; "Who would be free, themselves must strike the blow." [Applause.] All that I claim is fair play; and that is the aim for which I claim the United States to become the executive power of the laws of nature, and of nature's God. The revolutions in Europe will be made by the nations of Europe; but that they shall have fair play is what the nations of Europe expect from the protection of the United States of America. Remember the power which you have, and which I have endeavored to point out to you in a few brief words. Remember this, and form associations; establish ladies' committees to raise substantial aid for Hungary. Who could, who would refuse, when the melody of your voice is pleading the cause of my bleeding, of my oppressed native land?

Now I have done. One word only remains to be said—a word of deep sorrow—the word, "Farewell, New York!" New York! that word will forever make thrill every string of my heart. I am like a wandering bird; I am worse than a wandering bird. He may return to his summer home. I have no home on earth! Here I felt almost at home. But "Forward" is my call, and I must part. I part with the hope that the sympathy which I met here, is the trumpet sound of resurrection to my native land; I part with the hope that, having found here a short, transitory home, Fortune will yet bring me back to my own beloved home, that my ashes may yet mix with the dust of my native soil. Ladies, remember Hungary, and—farewell.

THE METHODIST BOOK CONCERN.—The business of this Concern is transacted in buildings of its own, situated in Mulberry street, New York. The number of persons at present employed is about 200, or 188 exclusive of clerks, laborers, &c. There are in the printing-office 70 hands and 8 power presses. In the bindery, there are 118 persons, of whom 74 are men and 71 are girls. The motive power is furnished by a 15 horse power engine. Steam is also furnished for heating the building—no fire being used except a small one in a single apartment. In the course of the year, about $80,000 worth of paper is consumed, 50 tons of paper board, and large quantities of other binder's materials. The expenses in the bindery last year, for materials and wages, were $49,172. The publications of the Book Concern are mostly stereotyped. They are not far from 1,500 in number, including probably 900 Sunday School Books. Three newspapers are published in the establishment, whose aggregate circulation is 140,000, viz.: The Sunday School Advocate, 80,000; Missionary Advocate, 30,000; Christian Advocate and Journal, 30,000.

REAL CURIOSITIES.—The Aztec Children now on exhibition in this city are really the greatest curiosities of the day. Ever since Stevens, in his work on Central America, announced the existence there of "a large city, spread over a great space, with turrets white and glittering in the sun," the inhabitants of which are Indians of precisely the same character and in precisely the same state as those of the country in general before the discovery of the continent and the desolating conquests of its invaders, there has been a strong desire for further information upon the subject. This led to an exploring expedition, one of the results of which is the introduction to the world of these two Aztec children, the greatest ethnological curiosities, perhaps, that ever appeared among civilized men. At an early day we intend to give some account of the expedition. Meanwhile our readers who have an opportunity will be interested in seeing these representatives of a race which many supposed to exist only in the imagination of travelers.

DR. ACHILLI AND DR. NEWMAN.—Dr. Newman, the famous Anglican convert to Romanism, having very grossly attacked the character of Dr. Achilli in a book recently published, the latter instituted legal proceedings against him, whereupon the former desired a long postponement of the case to enable him to send on to Italy, and look after Dr. Achilli's history for the last thirty-two years. Lord Campbell refused to grant the desired postponement. The offenses alledged were the same, with some coloring, which had been previously charged, and concerning which an examination was made in London by a most respectable committee, who published as the result a vindication of Dr. Achilli.

COLPORTEUR IN OREGON.—We learn from the Christian Watchman and Reflector, that the Rev. Richmond Cheadle, a colporteur of the American Baptist Publication Society, continues his labors in Oregon, with encouragement. He writes, Sept. 23, that he had received a new supply of books by the Golden Age, and reports that he had traveled six hundred miles, visited one hundred families, sold one hundred and thirty volumes, preached eighteen sermons, delivered six addresses, baptized one, and organized one church. He also encloses fifty dollars as a donation from five ladies of the Santiam church, for the Building Fund of the Society.

"WOODWORTH'S YOUTH'S CABINET," for January, commences a new series, with a new and elegant costume, and with an excellent variety of original matter. Its editor, Rev. FRANCIS C. WOODWORTH, possesses a decided genius for preparing juvenile books. "The Cabinet" can be recommended to families without reserve. The beauty of its embellishments, the healthiness of its moral tone, and its profusion of attractive and informing articles, give it a high place in our juvenile literature. (D. A. Woodworth.)

ENDOWING A THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—An effort was commenced about a year ago to endow two new professorships in the Theological Seminary at Bangor, Me. Not far from $40,000 has been received, rendering it certain that the sum proposed will be made up.

The subscription to the New York and Boston or "Air-Line Railroad" has been filled above the amount required for a complete organization of the Company, under one Board of Direction, from New-Haven to Boston. The whole road will probably be soon put under contract, and no expense will be spared to make it a "model road" both for speed and safety.

SECOND-DAY, DEC. 15.

In the SENATE, numerous private memorials were presented, among them one from the American exhibitors at the World's Fair, in London, asking an appropriation by Congress to defray their expenses; referred to the Committee on the Post-Office. The bill for establishing a branch mint in California was reported back, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. Several bills granting pensions were reported. Mr. Foote's resolution, declaring the compromise Acts a definite settlement of the Slavery question, was taken up, and its discussion occupied the remainder of the day.

The HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES passed a resolution asking the President for information relative to the trial of Mr. Thrasher, in Cuba. Several other resolutions requesting information from the President were adopted. The Senate's Resolution, giving in behalf of the People of the U. S., a cordial welcome to Kossuth to the Capital of the Country, and requesting the President to transmit him a copy of the same, was taken up and without debate passed, under the operation of the previous question; Yeas 181, Nays 16.

THIRD-DAY, DEC. 16.

In the SENATE, Mr. Jones, of Iowa, presented the joint resolution of the Legislature of his State, approving of the Compromise measures. Gen. Shields' resolution, appointing three Senators to introduce M. Kossuth to the Senate, was at first refused to be taken up, a quorum not being present. It was afterward put to the vote, when 30 voted in favor of its being taken up. A debate followed, in which several Senators took part. On putting the question finally, the Senate divided; ayes, 30; nays, 15. The bill establishing a Mint in California was passed. The Senate then resumed the debate on the Compromise Resolution. Mr. Rhett spoke at great length. Messrs. Mason, Foote, Borland, and others, took part, but the Senate adjourned before taking a vote.

In the HOUSE there was a good deal of routine business. A question arose in reference to the employment of the workmen who have been hitherto employed on the improvements on the wings of the Capitol, whose work had been suspended for want of funds. The resolution ordering an appropriation was referred to the Committee on the State of the Union. The House adjourned—no quorum.

FOURTH-DAY, DEC. 17.

In the SENATE, several Petitions were presented, including one from Philadelphia for the restoration of flogging in the Navy. The President's Message in answer to a resolution of the Senate, calling for information on the subject of the firing into the Prometheus, was received and read. It declines to furnish the precise instructions forwarded to our Minister at the Court of St. James, on this delicate question. But the instructions to Commodore Parker are given, and they afford an unmistakable index to those of the Ambassador. In those it is unqualifiedly stated that the United States do not recognize, absolutely deny, the ships of Great Britain any right whatever to exercise a police over the United States merchant vessels any where. And further, it is asserted that such right or authority is expressly forbidden by the Clayton Bulwer treaty. The instructions direct Commodore Parker to repair at once to the harbor of San Juan, and protect all merchant vessels from such surveilance in future, of which he is to notify the British officers on his arrival. Mr. Walker of Wisconsin introduced a preamble and resolutions in relation to the rights of nations to interfere in case of revolutions. The Foote resolution was taken up, and occupied the Senate to the hour of adjournment.

In the HOUSE, after some preliminary business, and a variety of resolutions—among them one to give each Hungarian 160 acres of land, which was laid over—Mr. Hebard (Vermont) proposed a resolution to the effect that, since M. Kossuth had declared that the resolution of Congress had a political meaning, be it therefore resolved, that it had no such meaning; the House postponed the subject until the morrow, and soon after adjourned.

FIFTH-DAY, DEC. 18.

In the SENATE, numerous petitions mostly of a private and unimportant character, were presented. Mr. Gwin, of Cal., introduced a bill granting the right of way and aid in the construction of a line of telegraph from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean. Mr. Foote's Resolution in the Compromise was then taken up, and the remainder of the day was spent in talking about it, mostly by Mr. Foote himself.

In the HOUSE, the Senate bill establishing a Branch Mint in California was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. A communication was received from the Secretary of State, stating that nearly $6,000 of the $10,000 appropriated for the expenses of Amin Bey remained unexpended. A joint resolution was passed, authorizing the Postmaster-General to legalize the contract for carrying the mails between California and Oregon. Several petitions were presented and referred, when the House adjourned.

SIXTH-DAY, DEC. 19.

In the SENATE, Mr. Seward introduced a joint resolution for establishing certain post-routes in New York. Mr. Gwin, of Cal., introduced a resolution, which was adopted, calling on the Secretary of the Navy to lay before the Senate all letters received by that Department concerning flogging in the Navy. Several bills ordered to be engrossed yesterday, were taken up and passed. The Compromise Resolutions were then taken up. Mr. Foote resumed his discourse and spoke at much length. Mr. Rhett rose to answer some personal allusions, when the Senate adjourned.

SABBATH-DAY, DEC. 20.

In the SENATE, Mr. Seward, N. Y., presented the petition of the Industrial Congress of New York, praying that the Government will adopt such a policy with regard to foreign nations as will secure to people struggling for liberty justice from other nations. The joint resolution making land warrants assignable, was taken up, several amendments presented, and the whole subject referred to the Committee on Public Lands. Mr. Foote's Compromise Resolution was then taken up, and the discussion of it occupied the remainder of the day.

FELL DEAD.—Mr. Calvin B. Gay, a resident of Jamaica, L. I., but doing business in this city, while running to the cars on Tuesday morning, when within a few rods of the station, fell dead in the path. The cars usually stop nearly in front of his house to take up passengers who are in waiting. Mr. Gay was a little behind time, and came running from his house, with a basket on his arm, to catch the train. Just before he got to the cars, the passengers observed him to stagger and fall; they ran immediately to him, and raised him up, but he was dead. His wife and children were standing on the stoop of his house, looking to see him get on the cars, and observed his sudden and unexpected fall. The blow was so sudden, so shocking and terrible, as to overwhelm and stupefy them.

European News—Revolution in France.

By the steamship Europa, which sailed from Liverpool on the 6th inst., we are in receipt of seven days later news from Europe.

The news from France is most important, the affairs of that country having engrossed attention to the exclusion of everything else.

The long-dreaded coup d'etat has been made, and the President has seized the reins of Government—dissolved the Assembly—declared a state of seige—arrested the leading opponents of his policy—and appealed to the people.

All this was done at an early hour on Tuesday, the 2d instant—preparations for it having been perfected with consummate skill and secrecy during the preceding night, and completed before any one had the least idea it was in progress, or even in contemplation.

An entire new Ministry was formed during the night of Monday.

Proclamations dissolving the Assembly, appealing to the people, restoring universal suffrage, and proposing a new system of Government, were printed at a private printer's in the Elsyée, and posted throughout Paris before daylight. Copies of these and of circulars from the Ministry, and the Prefect of Police, printed in like manner, were dispatched to all the provinces, announcing what had been done, appealing to the nation at large, and conveying stringent orders and instructions to all the officers of the Government throughout the country.

The President's proposal is the instant restoration of universal suffrage; the instant election by the People and the Army of a President to hold office for TEN YEARS; supported by a Council of State, and two houses of Legislature; and that during the few days required to complete the elections, the executive power shall remain in the hands of the President.

The President declares himself to have been forced into this measure; and it is ascertained that Changarnier, Lamoriciere, Thiers, and others of his opponents, had decided to demand his arrest and impeachment on the 2d inst., and were gathered and in the very act of confirming this decision, when they were themselves arrested and conveyed to Vincennes.

The temporary hall used for the Assembly has been taken down by the Government, and whenever members have attempted to meet officially, they have been ordered to disperse, and arrested if they refused; two hundred had been arrested in all, many, however, being released in a few hours; but all the leaders of the Opposition are imprisoned.

Many members of the Assembly have given their adhesion to the President. It is said as many as 300 performed this act during the first four days. No organized resistance to the Government was attempted, and telegraphic reports from the Departments declare the news to have been hailed with enthusiasm by the provincial population.

Subsequently, however, partial attempts at opposition were made in Paris, and rumors reached that city from the provinces hostile to the alleged unanimity of feeling in the provinces.

Barricades were erected in the more turbulent quarters of Paris, but were all broken down by the troops. At one of these, two members of the Assembly, taking prominent places, were killed in the conflict.

The full rigor of Martial Law had been proclaimed against all persons concerned in barricades, and they were accordingly shot without delay.

Up to Thursday night the success of the Government seemed certain, and London advices to Friday night did not materially change the same prospect—but new elements were constantly mixed in the struggle, and so long as any actual contest continues there must be more or less uncertainty; but the difficulty of obtaining reliable information was indescribable.

California News.

The steamship Daniel Webster, from San Juan, arrived at New York on Sixth-day last, bringing sixteen days later news from California. The Webster had some eight hundred thousand dollars on her freight list and in the hands of her passengers, and she announces the sailing of the Northerner from San Francisco with about two and a quarter millions of gold dust, of which $1,800,000 was on her freight list.

The following summary of news since the sailing of the previous steamer, is from the San Francisco Herald of Nov. 15:—

The question of the division of the State, which formed the leading topic of interest at the departure of the last steamer, is but little agitated at present. The people of the Southern counties, though differing among themselves as to the details, are unanimously in favor of the proposed division, and will introduce the subject into the Legislature soon after it assembles. All the Southern delegates are pledged to support it warmly, and some of those from the North are disposed to favor it.

The excitement which existed in the city a fortnight ago in relation to the cruelties alledged to have been practiced by Capt. Waterman, of the ship Challenge, upon his crew, has entirely subsided.

Within the past two weeks few cases of crime against property have occurred in our city, and none of violence to person for the purpose of robbery; but a number of personal rencontres have taken place, which have resulted in the death of three persons and the severe wounding of three others. A man named McCabe had his head split open by a butcher named Wilson. He died from the effects. Wilson was discharged, having acted in self-defense.

A Chileno named Exequier was assassinated by a countryman of his named Gonzales. He received ten wounds in the back from a dirk. His murderer awaits his trial. A difficulty occurred between Charles Brown and a man named Greenfield, which resulted in the death of the latter. Brown is under bonds of $15,000 to stand his trial.

Samuel Gallagher, who killed Pollock on the night of the 22d of June last, has undergone a second trial for murder. The first Jury could not agree; the second, after being out about twenty-four hours, returned a verdict of "guilty of manslaughter."

Numerous murders have recently been committed in the northern and southern portions of the State. In the south a number of Indians have been killed, and fears were entertained that an attack would be made upon Los Angelos by the tribes in that vicinity.

From the North, late advices bring the news of the murder of seventeen men in the vicinity of Marysville within three or four days. These atrocities are supposed to have been committed by an organized band of Mexican assassins. The people of Yuba are greatly exasperated, and measures are being taken to capture the murderers.

The Indians at the North have of late murdered several white men. But a single execution by the people has taken place within the State for a month past. About a week since a young man named Dixon murdered and robbed an old man at Mud Springs, near Placerville. He was arrested, tried by a jury of the people, condemned and executed.

We have to record the same favorable accounts from the mines that have been sent abroad for the last three months. The export of gold dust during the month of October was $6,884,875. The mail steamer of to-day takes about $1,500,000.

Agricultural operations have proved remarkably profitable during the past year, and in consequence a much larger tract of land has been taken up and will be cultivated the present season. Some of the farmers have availed themselves of the late rains to commence planting.

Our prosperity continues unabated. The mines are yielding well, agriculture is flourishing, commerce is increasing, and things are fast settling down into that permanent state which must ultimately make California one of the greatest members of the Confederacy.

Oregon News.

The steamer Daniel Webster brought later news from Oregon. The steamer Columbia had arrived at San Francisco from Oregon. She made the passage up in 65 hours—the shortest trip she has yet made to Astoria. She left again for San Francisco on the 9th ult., at 2 P. M., and made the passage back in 74 hours. The Columbia brought 74 passengers and $11,000 treasure.

The rainy season had commenced.

Horse thieving is going on to a considerable extent, and some of the scoundrels have been caught.

On the 19th ult. a murder was committed at the house of Mr. Bonsor on Louvies Island, by one Crede Turner, who stabbed a man named Edward E. Bradbury. The difficulty grew out of a love affair.

By late advices from the Dalles, we learn, says the Spectator, that there were about forty wagons still behind, and which would be through in a few days. This will make over eight hundred wagons in all, and completes the overland immigration for this year. There has been but little sickness or other discomfitures, except that which has been caused by the loss of stock, and other property, by Indian thefts, and a few deaths from their hostilities, among the whole immigration. It is fortunate, also, that the bulk of the emigration arrived much earlier this year than formerly, thereby escaping the early rains of the season.

The contract for carrying the mail from Astoria to Oregon City, has been let for $10,000 per annum. The distance is about 112 miles. The contract for carrying the mail to to the Great Salt Lake has been let at $8,000.

There are two new flouring mills nearly completed on the lower Willamette—one at Astoria, and one at Milwaukie. We also learn that there are two more to be erected at Oregon City.

SINGULAR SUIT AGAINST AN OLD DEFAULTER.—At New-Orleans, on the 5th inst., in the District Court, a singular suit was commenced by the United States against Kelty Smith, a rich broker of New-Orleans, and John Chandler Smith, his son, residing in Baltimore. Counsel for plaintiff states that Kelty was a defaulter, 30 years ago, as a Navy Agent, to the extent of $280,000, for which judgment was obtained in the District of Columbia in 1822. Since then Kelty has been doing a heavy business under his son's name. The Court granted a writ authorizing bank deposits and all property to be held until the suit is decided.

SUMMARY.

A dispatch dated Girard, Pa., Wednesday, Dec. 17, says:—The steamer Mayflower went ashore last night, 5 miles below Coneaut, during one of the most awful gales ever experienced on Lake Erie. She is a perfect wreck. They saw nothing from Monday evening till last night, when they went ashore. The rudder chains and the smoke pipe were carried away. Nothing but the skill and coolness of the officers saved all on board from a fearful death.

The assets of the James Bank and Bank of New Rochelle were sold at auction in Albany, on the 18th. The Bonds and Mortgages of the former brought an average of 75 cents on the dollar, which will enable the Department to pay a dividend of 90 cents, to the note holders. The bonds and mortgages of the latter averaged 50 cents, and the dividend to be paid will be 80 cents. Both dividends will probably be paid in January.

Jenny Lind passed through New York last week, and went to Philadelphia. She will soon return to New York, and remain at the Union-place Hotel during the remainder of her stay in America. Her farewell concerts will commence about the close of the year, and it is her intention to leave for home about the middle of January.

The report of the death of the venerable poet James Montgomery was premature. Montgomery is still in the land of the living, and in the enjoyment of his usual health. May he live to see many happy returns of his birth day, of which the eightieth was recently celebrated.

Hon. Henry Clay has forwarded to the Governor of Kentucky his resignation, which is to take effect next September. Ill health, from which there is but little prospect of his ever recovering, is the cause. On Sunday last, Mr. Clay was confined to his bed, and was very feeble.

Mrs. Bloomer, author of the new style of dress, has an article in the last number of her paper, in which she says that, could she have foreseen the notoriety and ridicule which she has incurred, she would never have commenced the movement.

The Marquis of Londonderry has purchased fifty or sixty Shetland ponies, to be employed in coal mines as substitutes for children, who have hitherto moved the coal trucks along the confined corridors under ground.

The Newport (R. I.) News says that James Lord, a resident of South Kingston, has recently had a fortune of a quarter of a million dollars left him in England, and he is about to go there to take possession of the property.

The commerce of the Western rivers is estimated by a memorial to Congress in favor of removing obstructions in the rivers at $22,000,000; it is greater than the amount of the total exports of the nation.

Elsey A. Huxford, aged 19, a pupil of Miss Wells' boarding school, Mass., drowned herself on Wednesday, the 3d inst. She left a note stating as the cause of the rash act, want of friends, troubles and trials of life, novel reading, &c.

The Ship Virginia, Capt. Pendleton, of New York, was lost on the 26th of November in latitude 33 deg. 40 minutes, from springing leak. Her crew and passengers were taken off by ship Marion.

The schooner Merchant, which sailed from Charleston for Havana with the mails and passengers on the 29th ult., was lost the third day out on Carysford Reef. The passengers were taken off by the wreckers.

There has been another of those fierce gales, which, during the season, have swept over Lake Erie, causing the total wreck of the steamer Mayflower. The storm did much other injury.

The Dunkirk and Erie Railroad was not opened on the 15th as it was announced to be, but it will be in operation in a few days.

MARRIED.

In New Market, N. J., Nov. 21st, by Eld. W. B. Gillett, Mr. HENRY C. COON, of West Edmeston, N. Y., to Miss I. ELVIRA STILLMAN, of Alfred, N. Y.

Dec. 13, by Eld. N. V. Hull, Mr. JOSEPH EDWARDS, Jr., to Miss HARRIETT H. WILLIAMS, all of Alfred, N. Y.

In Alfred, N. Y., Dec. 14th, 1851, by H. G. Witter, Esq., Mr. AMBROSE BALL to Miss CORDELIA EMERSON, both of Alfred.

DIED.

In Bridgewater, Oneida Co., N. Y., on the 9th inst., Mrs. CATHARINE CLARKE, widow of the late Henry Clarke, Esq., aged 76 years. Mrs. C. was for many years a worthy member of the first Seventh-day Baptist Church in Brookfield. In her sickness, which was for many weeks peculiarly distressing, she was supported and comforted by the precious promises of the Saviour in whom she trusted, and we entertain a strong assurance that she has exchanged her earthly sorrows for that fullness of joy which is found only in the presence of the Redeemer.

In Watson, N. Y., November 27th, 1851, of typhus fever, HENRY ALLEN, aged 20 years.

At his residence in Hopkinton, R. I., Dec. 5th, Mr. RUSSELL CRANDALL, 79 years of age.

Missionary Society—Board Meeting.

A QUARTERLY MEETING of the Executive Board of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society will be held at the house of Randolph Dunham, in Plainfield, N. J., on the afternoon of Fourth-day, Jan. 7, 1852, commencing at 1 o'clock. G. B. UTTER, Rec. Sec

Publishing Society—Board Meeting.

A QUARTERLY MEETING of the Board of Managers of the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society is appointed to be held at Plainfield, N. J., (house of Randolph Dunham,) in the evening of Fourth-day, Jan. 7, 1852, commencing at 6½ o'clock.

Western Association—Executive Committee.

THE Executive Committee of the Western Association will hold its next Quarterly Session at Independence on Fourth-day evening, Jan. 7, 1852. All ministers employed by the Committee are expected to make their reports by that time. The Committee is doing whatever it can for the building up of the feeble churches, and the extension of Bible doctrine beyond our denominational limits. Relying upon the benevolence of the churches, appointments have been made involving considerable expense; and the Committee would be glad to extend their operations if men and means could be obtained.

The past operations of the Committee have been successful, adding to the number of the lovers of the Lord Jesus Christ and God's holy Sabbath. Some of the small churches, that have always depended on others for the preaching of the Gospel, have made arrangements to locate a minister, doing most for his support, and asking the Committee kindly to aid them. Others are anxious to do the same. The Committee are desirous to aid them, and could fondly wish and devoutly pray that the "brotherly kindness" of the churches would enable us to meet the earnest calls of the destitute. We ask in the name of the needy a generous contribution from all the churches and brethren in the Association. Upon the reading of this, let every one of you lay by him in store as God has prospered him, so that there shall be abundance to aid the Committee in their efforts to build up the feeble and help the destitute. J. BAILEY, Sec. of Com.

Two Living Aztec Children.

A NEW AND ABSOLUTELY UNIQUE RACE OF MANKIND.—The most extraordinary and inexplicable phenomena that the history of the human race has yet produced, can be seen for a few weeks at the large Exhibition Room of the Society Library, corner of Broadway and Leonard-street. They were recently taken from a newly-discovered and idolatrous people in Central America, by whom they were kept with superstitious veneration, distinct and secluded as a caste of their priesthood, and employed as Mimes and Bacchanals in their Pagan ceremonies and worship.

They are male and female. The latter measuring 29½ inches in height, weighing 17 lbs.; the former is 33 inches high, and weighs 20 lbs.

From repeated and careful examination, the best Physiologists state the older to be 12 or 13 years of age; the younger about 10 years.

They differ altogether from examples of the dwarf kind, and from children; affording complete and undeniable illustration of a Piamean variety of the Human Race!

Tickets of Admission 25 cents. Children under 10 years, half price. Season Tickets, $1 00. Doors open each day, from 11 until 1, and from 7 until 9 o'clock. dec184t

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & CO. have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

New York Type Foundry and Printers' Warehouse.

Established in 1810.

JOHN T. WHITE, No. 53 Cliff-st, corner of Beekman-st., New York, would call the attention of Editors and Printers to his varied and extensive assortment of Types, Flowers, and Ornaments, all cast of the very best metal, and finished with the greatest care, and now offered at reduced prices, on a credit of six months, and a liberal discount made for cash.

Also, Presses of the different kinds, Chases, Cases, Brass Rules, Composing Sticks, Ink, and every article required in a Printing Office, constantly on hand, at the lowest market prices.

Spanish and French orders accurately executed, with all the necessary accents, &c. This being one of the oldest and most extensive foundries in America, with a very large stock and unsurpassed assortment, orders of any magnitude can be executed without delay.

A supplement to his last Specimen Book will be issued about the 1st of November, (copies will be furnished on application,) which will contain new series of Book and News Type, of the favorite Scotch Cut, embracing light, medium, and heavy faces, the latter particularly designed for Machine Printing, surpassing any thing ever offered in this country; to which are added Metal Rule, Fancy Borders, and a great variety of new and handsome Ornamental Type.

Old Type taken in exchange for new at nine cents per pound.

Editors or Printers wishing to establish a Newspaper, Book, or Job Printing Office, will be furnished with an estimate in detail for the same by stating the size of the paper, or the particular style and quantity of the work to be executed.

 Editors of Newspapers who will insert this advertisement three times previous to the 1st of January, 1852, and will send one copy of the paper containing the same to the Foundry, will be allowed the amount of their charge on purchasing four times its amount.

Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet.

New Series—Enlarged—January Number Ready.

WOODWORTH, determined that his Magazine shall excel all its rivals in the quantity as well as the quality of its contents, has enlarged it, so that it will hereafter contain a greater amount of reading matter for one dollar, than any other illustrated Magazine of the kind in the world. With the January number, now ready, commences an entirely new series. Each number will hereafter contain 48 pages, and will be embellished even more elegantly than before. The January number, with its handsome vignette title-page, got up with express reference to the holidays, is the most charming number we have ever issued.

The Cabinet will still be under the entire editorial control of FRANCIS C. WOODWORTH, who designs to spend a considerable portion of the year 1852, traveling in Europe. To secure all his letters from over sea, it will be necessary for new subscribers to commence with the January number, as hereafter all subscriptions must commence either in January or July; and no subscriptions will be received for less than a year.

It is unnecessary, at this late day, to tell the public what the Cabinet is. It has long had the reputation of being the "best juvenile Magazine in America—ever readable, entertaining, instructive, without any sectarianism, and free from every thing which can do harm."

Terms.

For a single copy, $1 a year; 4 copies, $3; 7 copies, $5. Cash in advance in all cases. Those who form a club of 7 copies, shall receive an extra copy for their trouble. A specimen of the January or holiday number will be sent (postage prepaid) to any part of the Union, on the receipt, in postage stamps or otherwise, of 12 cents, without expense to us.

Traveling and Local Agents Wanted.

The new series is just the thing for traveling agents and local dealers. Twenty or more agents are wanted to travel in different States, to solicit subscribers for the new series, and to sell the bound volumes of the old series or "Cabinet Library." Full particulars will be given, and specimens sent on application (post paid) with good references. Agents ought to be in the field as soon as possible. Those who are out of employment, and who wish to engage in lucrative business, and at the same time to circulate useful reading for the family circle, are particularly invited to give this agency a trial. To good agents, who will devote their time wholly or mainly to this work, the publisher will make very liberal terms.

Postmasters, Clergymen, and School Teachers are authorized to obtain subscribers, and are allowed to retain 25 per cent on all new subscriptions, when the full price (one dollar) is paid.

Miscellaneous.

An Indian Election.

The editor of The St. Louis Republican, writing from Fort Laramie under date of September 15, gives an interesting account of an election of Chief by the Sioux nations. Colonel Mitchell indicated a mode of election. He said he would nominate a man, and gave each voter a stick, one being selected from every nation with direction to give the stick to the nominee if approved of. The winter thus describes the election:—

Col. M. announced to the bands that Mah-toe-wah-yu-why was selected by him. When this announcement was made, the squaws of of his band set up a shout of joy. This act of impropriety on the part of the squaws, interfering with the business of the men, recalled Mah-toe-wah-yu-why to himself, and he indignantly rebuked them for it. Then turning to Col. M., he addressed him in substance as follows:

"Father, I am a young man and have no experience. I do not desire to be Chief of the Dahcotahs. I have not attended the Councils much, because there are older and better heads in our nation than I am. There are men who know the white man longer than I have, and they know better what to do, and understand what you and our Great Father proposes for our good, better than I do. Father, I have not attended the Councils for several suns. I have been hunting buffalo, and I would not have come here to-day if I had known that this would have happened. Father, I think you should have selected some older and wiser man than myself."

Col. M. explained to him, that he had selected him because of the character he bore among the whites and Indians, for honesty, intelligence and courage. That it was necessary there should be one principal Chief, and if the nation selected him, his Great Father would sustain him in his office.

Mah-toe-wah-yu-why replied: "Father, I am not afraid to die, but do be Chief of all the Dahcotahs, I must be a Big Chief. If I am to be Chief I must be a Big Chief, or in a few moons I will be sleeping (dead) on the prairies. I have a squaw and papooses that I do not wish to leave. If I am not a powerful Chief, my opponents will be on my trail all the time. I do not fear them. I have no sleep (die) on the prairies sometime, and it don't concern me what time it comes. If you, Father, and our Great Father, require that I shall be their Chief, I will take this office. I will try to do right to the whites, and hope they will do so to my people. And, Father, if any of my people are determined to leave me on the prairie (kill me) I will have a large company of my enemies to accompany me to the Great Spirit. I know the Great Spirit will protect me, and give many spirits of my enemies to accompany me, if I have to sleep for doing what you and our Great Father asks. The Great Spirit, the sun and moon, and the earth, knows the truth of what I speak."

Col. Mitchell then placed Mah-toe-wah-yu-why in the center of the semi-circle, and again, through the interpreters, explained that those who were willing to take him for the Chief of the nation, should come and give him the stick, or twig; and if they did not desire him, they would either keep the stick or give it to the Commissioner.

At length, after a very protracted consultation a Yancton Chief, (one of the voters,) arose, approached Mah-toe-wah-yu-why, and gave him his stick. Soon after a Chief from the Shoshon band did the same, and then the representatives of all the bands came up and gave him their sticks. But we had a strong and marked evidence of native and untutored dignity. Not one of the bands to which Mah-toe-wah-yu-why belonged, voted until all the others had given in theirs, and himself threw away the stick which had been given him before he was selected. After the Colonel had satisfied Mah-toe-wah-yu-why, as the Chief of the nation, one of the Chiefs harangued the bands and especially the young men, telling them to open their eyes and look upon the man who was hereafter to be the Chief of the nation—to have their ears bored, that they might listen to his words, and do what he said. Hereafter, this Chief was to be the voice of their Great Father.

Farm Accounts.

All generals are made up of particular, and upon the soundness and truth of the latter depend the value of the former. This applies particularly to statistics, and especially agricultural statistics. They are too often made up from guess work—from hap-hazard estimates, which mislead all who rely upon them for any practical information.

But what we would refer to, at present, is a prposal to our readers to keep an account of their crops—of their cost—and of the amount realized, so that they may act understandingly. Few farmers know how much a crop of wheat or corn has cost them, or how much they pay for the animals they rear for use and sale. How, then, can they tell which is most profitable? How do they know but they are losing money by that to which they give greatest care and attention, and making good profit upon what they consider of very little consequence? A correct account of capital, expenses and receipts, with each branch of products, will settle the question.

Let those who have not done so, take an inventory of lands, stock implements, &c., and commence the next season's operations with a determination to know what they are about. Let there be no more guess-work, and there will be fewer failures and losses. What would be thought of the merchant who pursued the same system, or no system, practiced by too many farmers. He would be looked upon with wonder and distrust, as a man of whose fate there could be no question. Adopt, then, some system of accounts—and make yourself sure about the profit and loss of your labor—and of the best mode of expending it. [Moore's Rural New Yorker.

Great Engineering Feat.—One of the most gigantic engineering operations ever effected took place recently near Welschmetz, in the Italian Tyrol. A quantity of stone being required for the construction of viaducts and bridges for a railway, it was resolved to use a huge rock 360 feet high and 85 wide, which rose like a wall. In two places only was this rock connected with the chain of Alps. First of all it was entirely separated from the mountains (a very difficult operation, which occupied 800 workmen for some time;) then seven or eight large openings were effected at the base, so that the immense mass was supported on columns; and then trains of gunpowder were placed in each opening. Everything having been prepared, fire was set to the trains. In 11 minutes a frightful explosion took place, and the mass came down. The fall shook the earth for a distance of nearly two leagues, and the pieces of rock spread over nearly ten acres.

Plan of Search for Sir John Franklin.

Lieut. Pim recently gave before the Royal Geographical Society of London, an explanation of his plan to search for John Franklin. His proposal was to start on the 15th of the present month, and travel by way of St. Petersburg, Moscow, Tobolsk, Irkutz, and Jakoutz, to the mouth of the Kolyma, and thence commence exploring the coast of Siberia, east and west, a distance little short of 10,000 miles. He did not ask for a party, but merely for a companion and servant; and stated that the expense attending the voyage would be trifling, in comparison with the result which it appeared to promise. To his great disappointment the Admiralty Board declined to undertake his plan. Lady Franklin, however, impressed with the hope of obtaining some satisfactory intelligence, requested him (Lieut. Pim) to carry out his proposal by private means; and unlimited absence being granted by the Admiralty, he had no hesitation in responding to her desire. An interview with the head of the Foreign Office was obtained, and he could not speak too gratefully of the kindness of Lord Palmerston on that occasion, as well as Mr. Addington's promptitude in forwarding the necessary documents. Success was rendered more certain by Mr. R. Brown's (the president of the Linnean Society) introduction to Sir Roderick Murchison. It was accordingly his intention to proceed to St. Petersburg on the 18th instant, and enlist the sympathy of the Russian Government in the cause. His orignal plan had undergone some modification, and in consequence she was compelled to proceed alone, and look forward to companions provided by the Imperial service of Russia. Supposing that the negotiation with the Court of Russia terminated favorably, his track would lead from St. Petersburg to Moscow by railway; from Moscow to Irkutz by Teligi, on sledges, a distance of 3,544 miles, and from Irkutz to Jakoutz also on sledges, a distance of 1,824 miles; the whole journey occupying about four months. At Jakoutz all regular trreveling conveinces terminated, and the 1,200 miles to the River Kolyma, as well as the 2,000 miles of search would have to be performed in a manner best adapted to the resources of the country. In 1854 the task might be completed, if, unfortunately, before that time no traces should have been found.

Cultivate Fruit.

We are surprised at the apathy of our citizens to the cultivation of fruit. Nine-tenths of the intelligent, industrious, pains-taking, and economical people, who will busy themselves twelve or fifteen hours a day in their ordinary pursuits, will entirely neglect providing themselves and their families with this luxury, though they may have ample grounds for the purpose, every way fitted for producing it in profusion.

We call it a luxury, but it is more properly one of the necessaries of life; and for the want of it persons frequently become diseased, or continue so, if disease is induced from other causes, when the free use of seasonable, well-ripened fruit, would have restored them at one-fiftieth part of the expense incurred by apothecaries' and doctors' bills. Who ever heard of an ailing family, whether adults or children, who indulged freely in wholesome fruits, and abstained from the made-up dishes of the pastry and other cooks?

But it is not as a corrective or medicine only, that we deem fruits invaluable as an article of diet. It has a direct money value, estimable in dollars and cents, for the amount it contributes as food for the support of the human system. This is conclusively proved, both theoretically and practically; for accurate analysis has shown that cultivated fruits contain large proportions of nutritive matter, and experience equally proves that when fruit enters largely into the diet of the family, a corresponding diminution of other food is always apparent. As profit, then, is directly concerned in the cultivation of good fruit, we hope we may command the favorable attention of our readers for a moment, while advocating its increased cultivation.

Many residences in the city, and nearly all in the country, have yards or grounds sufficiently extensive to admit of the cultivation of some choice fruit trees; and where they are too limited for these, a few well-selected grape vines can seldom want suitable earth for rooting, or a favorable wall for climbing with its profuse branches. The yards, even, of the densely built city of New York, if well planted and cultivated with vines, would yield no inconsiderable proportion of the grapes required by its citizens. Yet, how few tables in the city, and even in the country, are supplied with this delicious fruit from their ample surroundings.

We know of a half acre of cultivated raspberries, (the genuine red Antwerp,) that produced in one season fruit which sold for $1,400 in the New York market. Yet, how seldom do people have a plate of this fine fruit, of their own raising, to treat a friend with.

The strawberry is one of the most wholesome, as it is one of the most delicious of fruits, and a patch of four rods square, if judiciously selected and nicely cultivated, would yield an abundance for a large family; yet, not one household out of every hundred in the Union is supplied with any, except such as they buy, or gather from the untilled meadow.

The cherry is a hardy tree, a prolific bearer, and a most delicious fruit, if the finer varieties be selected; and the tree is decidedly ornamental withal; yet, numberless families get no cherries worth eating, save what they beg, or buy at extravagant prices,

The pear, the peach, and the plum, are abundant bearers, and the richness of flavor of their best varieties are not surpassed by any that grow either within or without the tropics. They have of late been subjected to their respective scourging diseases of blight, the yellows, and the curculio; but a moderate share of attention to their proper treatment and remedies, will remove each, and afford an ample return to such as will give a small part of their time to cultivating them.

If objection be still made to the nice and discriminating attention required by the foregoing fruits, what possible excuse can our indolence frame for the neglect of that hardy, self-sustaining, universally acceptable fruit, the apple? This, the king of American fruits, will grow everywhere, produce abundantly, and of the choicest flavor, provided, only, that a suitable position, fertile soil, and the best varieties, and adapted to the locality, be adopted. If objections—thick as blackberries—can be alledged against the cultivation of any or each of the other fruits, none can be success fully maintained against this. It is a fruit that is suited to all tastes, as it runs through any conceivable shade of flavor; it is in full season from July to June, and is equally adapted for use when plucked from the tree, as when prepared by an almost infinite variety of forms, when artificially compounded by skillful cookery. We marvel at the neglect so frequently observable in the cultivation of this splendid fruit.

A reasonable degree of attention to these products would not only be attended with decided pleasure in the planting and rearing of the trees, and in the luxury and support they yield to the family as food, but there would be frequently, besides, an ample result in money profit, from the sale of the fruit. A friend whom we visited the past season had but two or three acres around his house, and this mostly devoted to lawns, gardens, out-buildings, and ornamental trees; yet he informed us that a fruiterer solicited the privilege of gathering some of his surplus cherries for market, and paid him $75 for what he scarcely missed. He had an abundance of choice peaches, and we have not, for years before, seen such a profusion of the daintiest plums and pears, including barrels of the fairest Seckles we ever saw, the white Doyenne, Bartlett, &c.

The progress of the age, we are happy to observe, is decidedly towards fruit-raising. Reading, observation, and the impulse given by the various agricultural and horticultural societies of the country, have stimulated effort and sharpened invention, and thousands of our more intelligent countrymen are commencing a system now, which posterity will carry forward to a successful issue. It will be a disgrace to them if the finest fruit-producing country on the globe does not hereafter yield an abundance of fruit to supply every mouth in the Union. [Amer. Agriculturist.

"What about those Onions?"

While our last General Conference was in session at Pittsburg, the Temperance Societies in that city had frequent meetings, and several members of the Conference addressed the meetings. One of the delegates, from "down East," related an incident, in substance as follows:—

A merchant in a small village sold rum, and had, of course a large number of customers, who became poor in consequence of his ruinous traffic. The wife of one of those men had waited on the rumseller to entreat him to sell her husband no more of his deadly drink. She was coldly received, and obtained no assurance of favor. It was in vain that she told him what her husband once was, and what he would be again, but for his traffic, which had already reduced them to abject poverty. In vain she drew the truthful picture of poverty, want, and sorrow! No sympathy was inspired in the heart of the rumseller.

As time rolled on, the inebriate husband went still downward in his course, and had not only sold for rum every thing which he could exchange for the very beverage, but had run up a bill of a few dollars for the article at the store of this merchant; for, though nearly all the labor he performed was for this man, and all for rum, he was so far destroyed in his physical, as well as mental and mental powers, as to be able to work but little, besides rendering his home a place of sorrow and want.

The afflicted wife struggled, as well as she was able, to provide for her little children, herself, and her ruined husband. A small plot of ground, which composed the yard of the rented cottage, was put in order by the wife and her little boys, and sown with onions. These were tended and weeded with much care, and gave early and unmistakable signs of yielding a fine return. Oh, with what delightful anticipations did the children look upon the work of their hands—upon all which they could call their own! And, as some dollars' worth were likely to be realized, the mother told them of many little comforts which might be procured for the coming winter by the sale of their little harvest. No wonder they looked eagerly for the time of gathering their all—their only wealth!

At last the time arrived, and the little hands which reared, were now busy in securing the cultivated treasures. But little did they know the grief and dissappointment which awaited them. On the very day on which they hoped to gather the harvest, they were to be robbed of the fruit of their toil. The rumseller had long had his eye upon that only fruitful spot upon the desolate premises of the victim of his cupidity; and as soon as the onions were out of the ground, the officer of the law was there to seize them at the bidding, of the merchant, on his demand against the poor husband and father of the producers! Such an affliction was great and overwhelming to those poor ones as would be the burning of the store of a wealthy merchant, with all its contents, or the sinking of the ship in which his all was ventured! It was their all! and, though that was little, it was much to them! Despise not the trials which come upon the poor, nor the tears which they shed over their little GREAT losses! The deed of the oppressor was told in every part of the village, and in an hour a hundred hearts beat high with indignation! The injured and robbed ones shared in the sympathy of the good people, and the sympathy took on substantial forms.

But the rumseller—what was done to him? Verily, he had his reward! Did the strong men of the place hang him on the nearest tree? No. Did they give him "a hundred lashes on his bare back, well laid on?" Nothing of the kind. Well, what did they do? Now, be patient, and I will tell you all about it. They left him to the ladies; and wo to the poor wight against whom they combine! A large number met in an "indignation meeting," and laid their plan of vengence. Its details can best be seen in its execution.

Next morning, one of the ladies called at the store, for the purpose of examining several articles in the the dry goods line. After looking and having the counter well loaded by the obliging trader, she said, "How is it about those onions?" and firmly told the abashed merchant she should trade no more with such a man!

Scarcely had he time to return his goods to the shelves before another lady entered, and, going through a similar process, looked him in the face with an expression of contempt, saying, "What about those onions?" and left, with the assurance that he could not have her trade!

Such were the calls with which the trader was favored, in quick succession, to the number of a dozen or more, each in turn asking "What about those onions?" and pouring upon his miserable head their burning invectives, worse than coals of fire; closing with the declaration that they should trade no more with him!

As the proceedings of the ladies became known, the indignation apeared to be contagious; and even the little boys, as they passed the store, would shout, "How is it about those onions?"

Such reader, was the vengeance which was meted out to that miserable sinner! And what do you think was its end? Why, it would have been easy to foretell that. What could a man like him do? Not a man would brave the displeasure of the ladies by trading with him. He could not show his head without bringing it in contact with onions—figuratively; and his quiet as well as his occupation was gone.

Having an opportunity to sell out to a better man, he embraced it, and went to a land which was very far off; it is hoped to reform his conduct, and establish a good reputation. It is, however, doubted whether he ever relished onions, "fried, roasted, boiled or raw."

I will not be sure, but my impression is, that after the tempter fled, the poor inebriate was restored to his former sobriety; and his wife and children were again happy in his love, and the peace and plenty which blessed them with their presence. See what the ladies can do! We read that "the wrath of a king is terrible;" but it is nothing, when compared to that of a dozen virtuous females, brought to its focus upon the head of such a man! Let all the good women of our land take a stand against rumselling, and it shall flee away like the onion-man. [Adv. and Jour.

Kossuth's Personal Appearance.

From an English Paper.

He stands about five feet eight inches in height, has a slight and apparently not strongly knit frame, and is a little round-shouldered. His face is rather oval; a pair of grey eyes, which somewhat reminded me of O'Connel's in expression, well-set beneath a full and arched brow, give an animated and intelligent look to his countenance. His forehead, high and broad, is deeply wrinkled, and time has just begun to grizzel a head of straight dark hair, and to leave a bald spot behind. He has got the true Hungarian nose, but it is a fair, well-formed feature—such as a French passport would describe as moyen; a thich moustache nearly covering his mouth, except when he speaks or smiles, and unites with beard and whiskers in a full flock of dark hair, falling down from the chin. The portraits are singularly unlike him in either person or expression. Whether from his recent captivity or constitutional causes, there is somehow an air of lassitude in his look, to which the fatigues of his voyage not improbably contributed. Altogether he gives one the idea of a man of thought rather than a man of action; there is a speculative air in his face, mingled with melancholy, which would mark him for a visionary or theoretical enthusiast rather than a great leader or a soldier. He was very plainly attired in a dark green frock coat, with a little silk braid at the back and edges, and wore a common low-crowned square felt hat. Madam Kossuth, who seems in delicate health, stood beside her children, Francis and Louis, boys, and Wilhelmine, a girl, the eldest about 11, the youngest 7, and was dressed as simply as her husband. Some fine looking fellows, bearded like the pard, in braided military frocks, longed about the decks, a few of whom, as indeed possibly their leader might have done, had suffered, no doubt, a good deal from sea sickness.

Physiological Facts.

The average height of man and woman, at birth, is generally sixteen inches. In each of the twelve years after birth, one-twelfth is added to the stature each year. Between the ages of twelve and twenty, the growth of the body is slower; and it is still further diminished after this, up to twenty-five, the period of a maximum growth.

"In old age, the height of the body diminishes on an average of about three inches. The height of woman varies less than that of man in the different countries. The average weight of a male infant is about seven pounds; of a female, about six and a half pounds. The weight of an infant decreases for a few days after its birth, and it does not sensibly commence gaining until it is a week old. At the end of the first year, the child is three times as heavy as when it was born. At the age of seven years, it is twice as heavy as when a year old. The average weight of both sexes at twelve is nearly the same; after that period, females will be fonnd to weigh less than males. The average weight of men is one hundred and thirty pounds, and of women one hundred and twelve pounds. In the case of individuals of both sexes, under four feet four inches, females are somewhat heavier than men, and vice versa. Men attain their maximum weight at about forty, and women at or near fifty. At sixty both sexes usually commence losing weight, so that the average weight of all persons, men or women, is nearly the same as at nineteen."

The Great Steamer.—The following sketch of the mammoth Hudson River steamer, to which we alluded some days since, is given by a correspondent of The Boston Atlas:—

"There is a drawing in the Navy Department, of a new steamboat, which is about to be built in New-York for the Hudson River, and which is to make the trip from New York to Albany in five hours. She is intended to compete with the New York and Albany Railroad. By the kindness of Commodore Skinner, we obtained her proportions, which are as follows: Length of keel 500 feet; length of deck, 350 feet. She looks like a sword fish. There is 75 feet of keel at each end, extending out from the deck, which shows itself above water, and which is sharp and pointed like the sword of a sword-fish. Both ends of the boat are alike, and her engines are to work both ways. She is not intended to turn round, but to work like a ferry boat. She is to be called the George Washington, and to have accomodations for three thousand passengers. She will make the passage of 150 miles in five hours. She has been designed and modeled by Mr. Davidson, of New York.

Great Telegraphic Feat.—Mr. Bulkley, the Superintendent of the New-Orleans Telegraph Line, has lately invented what he calls a "Connector," by means of which, placed at each station on the line, the operators are enabled to "turn the current of electricity from their offices, and thus connect the most extreme points." The "Connectors," by some ingenious mechanism, only fully understood by the inventor, have the effect to renew the magnetic force wherever applied, by which means the great difficulty of writing in long circuits is wholly overcome. This invention, therefore, would seem destined to become one of the most important aids in the annihilation of space. The New-Orleans line, under Mr. B.'s superintendence, has been supplied with these "Connectors," and their practical utility, for the purpose desired, was very satisfactorily tested the other day, by enabling Mr. Long and his assistants, in the office in New York to hold a direct and instantaneous chit-chat with their fellow operators in the office at New-Orleans, a distance by the wires of 2,300 miles. Business messages were also sent with the same rapidity.

Steamers in California and Oregon.—Some idea of the traffic between San Francisco and the southern mines may be formed from the fact that at this moment ten steamers are plying between San Francisco and Stockton. There are ten also plying between San Francisco and Sacramento. The latter for the most part are of a larger size than those of the San Joaquin river, and make the trip of about 120 miles in from seven to eight hours. In the elegance of their accommodations and the luxuries of their larder, they might compare favorably with any passenger vessels in the world.

There are ten other steamers plying from Sacramento to different places about that city. One year ago there was one steamboat in Oregon, the Columbia; now there are eleven steamboats, of different kinds, running in the Columbia and Willimette rivers, not including the Pacific steamers Sea Gull and Columbia, running between Oregon and California.

Variety.

Those who first thought of putting tobacco-dust upon their noses were first laughed at, and then persecuted more or less. James I., of England, wrote a book against snuff-takers. Some years later Pope Urban VIII. excommunicated all persons who took snuff in churches. The Empress Elizabeth thought it necessary to add something to the penalty of excommunication, and authorized the beadles to confiscate the snuff-boxes to their own use. Amurath IV. forbade the use of snuff under the pain of having the nose cut off.

The new ship Tyendenaga, Capt. Rudolf, cleared at Quebec on the 8th Nov. for London. She sailed from the Brandy Pots on the the 19th, with a fresh, westerly breeze. On the 22d, at 2 A. M., she went ashore on Island, on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, during a violent snow-storm, and seventeen of her crew perished—twelve having been thrown overboard by the falling of the mainmast, and the other five either killed or drowned by the falling of the foretopmast.

The Nicaragua Transit Co. have made a contract for constructing the plank road between Lake Nicaragua and the head of navigation on the Pacific side, with Elizur Clark, of Syracuse, at $11,000 per mile. The road will be twelve and a half miles in length, and is to be finished in nine months. Mr. Clarke will erect a steam saw-mill to furnish the plank, which will be cedar, and will carry out his workmen from Syracuse.

By the returns of the last census it appears there are about 2,800 papers in the United States, of which 2,000 are published in the Free and 800 in the Slave States. About 850 are Whig, 750 Democratic, 70 Free-Soil or Anti-Slavery, 20 Agricultural, 40 Temperance, 200 Religious, and 870 neutral and miscellaneous. New York has 443 papers, Pennsylvania 328, Massachusetts 212, Ohio 300.

Dogs are not property in the District of Columbia, at least so the Courts there have decided. A constable in Washington, arguing that if a dog be not property, he cannot be seized for debt, advertised that, under a writ of fieri facias, he would sell at Center Market, "a dog's collar, with a Newfoundland dog attached to the end of it."

A man was recently convicted of murder in the second degree in Cuyahoga county, Ohio, for placing an obstruction on the track of the Cleveland and Pittsburg Railroad, by the means of which an engineer lost his life. The evidence against him, though purely circumstantial, was conclusive, and left no reasonable doubt of his guilt. He was sentenced to the penitentiary for life.

To insure a uniform and even application of lime, a field may be laid off in squares of twenty feet, or any other size that may suit the wishes of the owner, and equal quantities of lime applied to each square. A half bushel of air-slacked lime to each square of twenty feet will give fifty bushels to the acre, which is a liberal application to begin with.

King Eyo, an African chief on the banks of the Niger, near its mouth, was lately received on board a British war steamer with royal honors. When the engines were showed him, he expressed his admiration, and said that the man who invented them must have had very much of "that," significantly placing his finger on his forehead.

After the 31st of March next, every British steamboat, those plying upon rivers as well as those going to sea, will be required to have a safety valve to each boiler, out of the control of interference of the engineer, such safety valve to be reported upon by the Government surveyor as a part of the machinery of the boat.

Rev. R. D. Turner was adjudged guilty of seduction in a civil suit at Milwaukie week before last, and condemned to pay the father of the victim $1,000. His counsel have moved for a new trial. William Morris was convicted for the same offense at Albany, on Wednesday of last week, and setenced to serve a year in the Penitentiary.

The Wyoming County Bank will commence operations in Warsaw, N. Y., about the 1st of January next. The capital of the Bank will be $50,000, secured by State Stocks, Bonds and Mortgages. Joshua H. Darling, of that village, will be President, and E. Maynard, of Springfield, Mass., the Cashier.

The City Hotel, on Front-street, Sacramento, which once rented for $5,000 per month, has recently been let for as many hundreds.

Union Academy.

THE Academic Year of this Institution (located at Shiloh, N. J.) for 1851 and '52 commenced the first Wednesday in September, and continues forty-four weeks, including two vacations, of one week each, between terms.

The year is divided into three terms:

The First commencing Wednesday, September 3d, and ending Tuesday, December 9th.

The Second commencing Wednesday, December 17th, and ending Tuesday, March 23d.

The Third commencing Wednesday, March 31st, and ending Tuesday, July 6th.

Board of Instruction.

WM. C. WHITFORD, Principal,
And Teacher of the Classics, Natural Sciences, and higher Mathematics.
Miss RUTH R. HEMPHILL, Preceptress,
And Teacher of French, Painting, Drawing, and assistant in Mathematics.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year commences the last Wednesday in August, and closes the last Tuesday in June of each year.

Board of Instruction.

Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress
Rev. J. W. MORTON, } Assistants.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, }

The Terms for 1851 and 1852 are as follows:—

The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.
" Second " " Dec. 3 " " March 16.
" Third " " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one of two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term, Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.

Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS.

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00
Drawing,	1 00
Monochromatic Painting	3 00
Oil Painting,	5 00
Writing and Stationery,	0 50
Vocal Music, Elementary,	1 00
Advanced Class,	2 00
Instrumental Music,	8 00

Use of Organ or Piano, $2 00 per quarter.

Board, in private families, per week, from $1 25 to $1 50; in clubs, from 60 to 90 cents.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall Term, and at the middle of the Winter Term, and continue seven weeks. The course will embrace a thorough review of the common school branches, with daily lectures on "The Art of Teaching," Chemistry, Physiology, Laws of Health, School Laws, &c., &c. Tuition $2 50.

Students should not be furnished with unnecessary pocket-money, neither should minors be allowed to contract debts in the village. Either member of the Faculty will superintend the financial affairs of pupils placed under their care, by special direction from parents and guardians, if funds are furnished in advance.

THE SABBATH & THE RESURRECTION.

From "An Examination of the Authority for a Change of the Weekly Sabbath at the Resurrection of Christ; proving that the Practice of the Church in substituting the First Day of the Week for the appointed Seventh Day, is unsanctioned by the New Testament Scriptures. By JAMES A. BEGG, Author of a Connected View of the Scripture Evidence of Christ's Speedy Return, &c." [Continued.

Careful attention to the Scripture arrangements of the entire solemnity, and of the respective parts of which it was composed, as these have been now exhibited, enables us to advance with more discrimination of instructive particulars, while examining the inspired narrative of the circumstances connected with our Lord's resurrection. Already, at this stage, it is evident, we have an exact type of what, if truly transacted by the Antitype, would fulfill, with most absolute truth, His own prediction, that He should be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth. For, as in type, the slaying of the lamb in Egypt was followed, immediately, by the night in which it was eaten, (Exod. xii. 8—12,) and succeeded by the ensuing day, (pertaining, according to Divine reckoning, to that night,) which formed the fourteenth day; and as the night and day following were those of the Passover Sabbath, the fifteenth, we have thus two entire days and two entire nights; the third night, (also entire,) pertaining to the sixteenth, immediately followed, succeeded by the morning of the third day, (accounted for the whole,) the appointed day of first fruits, the offering of which took place in the morning.

According to the statements of the Saviour and His Apostles, Moses, in the Law, foretold the Resurrection of the Great Lamb of God, on the third day. In this presentation of the sheaf of first fruits, we have absolutely the verification of those statements, if the ordinances with which it is connected are allowed to retain their place, in all their entireness. The truth of this, may be made more apparent to the eye, by adopting again our former arrangement. We thus have

MOSES SHOWING CHRIST'S RESURRECTION ON THE THIRD DAY.

Nights.

1. 14th, When the lamb was eaten.
2. 15th, Pertaining to the Passover Sabbath.
3. 16th, Pertaining to the day of First Fruits.

Days.

1. 14th, The Passover of the Lord.
2. 15th, Holy Convocation or Sabbath.
3. 16th, Morning of First Fruits.

Being, in the full sense of the words, "three days and three nights."

Any subtraction from the time, or alteration in the arrangement, would, therefore, impair the significancy of these types, designed to show the work of Christ, and in themselves perfect for that purpose. This, it is obvious, would be the result if either, with Horne, and others, we should withdraw the fourteenth day from its true place as really following the fourteenth evening; or, by supposing that our Lord was laid in the tomb on the afternoon of the day on which He was crucified. As the type was slain between the evenings, and eaten only after sunset; so, our Lord having been crucified between the evenings, was laid in the tomb when the evening was come, after sunset, at the commencement, therefore, of the 14th day?

Whatever our difficulties, therefore, may be, we may not doubt that in the circumstances of our Lord's death, His duration in the tomb, and the period of His resurrection, the accordance with the prefiguring circumstances of the respective types must have been equally perfect. The symbol, as expressive of Christ's duration in the tomb, exhibits three entire nights, with two entire days, and the morning as part of a third. This, however, in Scripture reckoning, is equivalent to three days and three nights.

It is certain, and is admitted by all, that in His death, Christ perfectly fulfilled what the accomplishment of the entire type demanded. We have seen, farther, that He was laid in the tomb after sunset of the night following—the time of day, thus, corresponding with the time of eating the Paschal lamb. It is also certain, and admitted by all, (for the statements of the different Evangelists are, in regard to this, quite explicit,) that very early in the morning, the tomb had lost its tenant; though, probably, the emptiness of that tomb was discovered nearly as soon as it had been made so. Yet, between these two events, there obviously lies a space to be accounted for, which the ordinary view in nowise fills up. There could not be the lapse of three days and three nights between the burial and the resurrection of Christ, (which symbol and prophecy absolutely requires,) if it were true that He died on Friday, whether the interment took place, as is usually assumed, that afternoon, or, as testified by the Evangelists, after the even was come, if, as farther assumed, it were also true, that he rose again on Sunday morning.

Had our Lord, who gave to the Jews "the sign of the prophet Jonas," that "as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth," (Matt. xii. 40; Luke xi. 29, 30,) said nothing at any other time, calculated to interpret for us the statement, we should have been necessitated to understand the inclusion of at least two entire days and two entire nights, while a part of either one night or of one day, or even part of both a night and a day, might yet have been designed. We should still have had the type to aid us with the knowledge that the lamb was eaten early in the night, and that the sheaf was offered early in the morning of the third day; and that, consequently, the incompleteness was only in regard to the third day. And, subsequent to the event, the fact itself of His having been laid in the tomb at the very commencement of a night, absolutely fixes it that any incompleteness must have been with regard to a day.

But we have, even in other predictions of Christ, relative to the same event, intimation of the same fact. For, in reference to the period of the resurrection, we need not to seek to strain His language to accommodate ourselves to circumstances after the event. We have referred to "the sign of Jonas," as given by Christ to His enemies, as the sign of His Messiahship; but on another occasion, we read that, in answer to a similar demand for a sign, "Jesus answered, and said nnto them, Destroy this temple, and IN three days I will raise it up." John ii. 19. Here, then, in a corresponding sign, the raising of Christ's body, He foretells, will be "in three days;" for although, at the time, the Jews did not perceive the Saviour's meaning, it is added, "He spake of the temple of His body. When, therefore, He was risen from the dead, His disciples remembered that He said this unto them; and they believed the Scripture, and the word which Jesus had said." Ver. 20—22. Yet again we find, on another occasion, that, addressing His disciples, "He began to teach them that the Son of man must suffer many things, and be rejected of the elders, and of the chief priests, and scribes, and be killed, and after three days rise again." Mark. viii. 31.

That these forms of expression were distinctly understood, is evident from the fact, that after the crucifixion, upon the Passover Sabbath, while the Saviour lay in the tomb, "the next day that followed the day of the preparation, the chief priests and Pharisees came together unto Pilate, saying, Sir, we remember that that deceiver said, while he was yet alive, After three days I will rise again." Matt. xxvii. 62, 63. They not only remember, and quote correctly, his words, but they also interpret them correctly; for, they add, "Command, therefore, that the sepulchre be made sure until the third day." Ver. 64. "After three days," therefore, they must have regarded as equivalent with the third day, else they would have asked that the sepulchre be made sure till after three days, instead of "until" the third day.

That our Lord, by His expressions "after three days" and being "three days and three nights" in the grave, meant his being raised on the third day, is farther evident, from the fact that He repeatedly foretold that he must "be killed, and be raised again the third day." Matt. xvi. 21. "They shall kill Him, and the third day He shall be raised again." Matt. xvii. 23. "And the third day He shall rise again." Matt. xx. 19. (See also Mark ix. 31; x. 34; Luke xviii. 33.) The harmony of these statements is obvious from the fact that they could be and were appealed to, after the event, as having been truly fulfilled. On the morning of the Resurrection, the angels at the tomb called the female disciples to remember that Jesus had foretold that He would "be crucified, and the third day rise again. Luke xxiv. 7. The exact fulfillment must, therefore, have been manifest. These disciples saw it to be so; for then they remembered His words, and returned from the sepulchre." Ver. 8, 9. And, farther, when the two disciples who had met Him on the way to Emmaus were rehearsing to their brethren at Jerusalem what had occurred, the risen Redeemer Himself having appeared in the midst of them, and having eaten of a piece of a broiled fish, and of an honey comb, "He said unto them, These are the words which I spake unto you while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled which were written in the Law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning me. Then opened He their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures, and said unto them, Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day." Luke xxiv. 42—46.

Confident appeal made thus to Moses, the Phrophets, and the Psalms, proves abundantly, not only that the resurrection of Christ on the third day was not only contained in these, but also that these were all understood, and were in perfect harmony with the words of the Lord Himself. While then he was to be in the tomb three days and three nights, He was yet to rise from the dead on "the third day." This form of statement seems plainly to imply that the third day should not be completed. If, however, the incompleteness of the day is admitted or demanded, the proportional incompleteness affects not its truth. The type is here our guide; the sheaf was offered very early in the morning. Moses, there, shows Christ's resurrection to have been on the morning of the third day.

But this principle of computation avails not to account for days or nights absolutely awanting in the necessary enumeration; while also, no analogy, in prophecy or symbol, leads us to expect that such imperfection would be discovered. And we never find it to have been asserted, even by his bitterest enemies, in the days of the Apostles, that these predictions had not truly been accomplished, or the symbols realized in their full force and perfect meaning, although we do find that decided objections were urged against the scheme of fulfillment, which, in later ages, at least, the church had adopted. Isidore, who died about 440, accordingly, felt it necessary to essay "to answer their silly enquiries, as he terms them, who would search into the cause of Christ's resurrection, before He had remained three whole days in the grave." History of the Apostles' Creed, (1711.) The church taught that Christ rose earlier than He declared He would. It is no new thing for those who tremble at God's word to be reviled on that account; and therefore we wonder the less when we read that the church's champions for her apostacy, sneer at those as "silly," who, instead of utterly rejecting her traditionary falsehoods, ventured only to inquire "into the cause" of the discrepancy which thus men had been led to suppose actually existed between Christ's prediction and its fulfillment. This was evidently the progress of perversion. We find no trace of such doubts, nor room for them, in the inspired narrative. The Apostles, themselves, must have distinctly seen the fulfillment of both the types and predictions of this important truth, concerning the period of their Lord's resurrection; for they did not hesitate to make direct appeal unto it, as that which was not only true, but well known to be so. Paul, writing to the Corinthians, equally refers to the time of the resurrection as to the fact of the death of Christ, as the gospel or good news which he had preached unto them, and which they had received: "For I delivered unto you, first of all, that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins, according to the Scriptures; and that He was buried, and that He rose again THE THIRD DAY, according to the Scriptures." 1 Cor. xv. 3, 4. ACROSS THE RIVER.

About six years ago, says a clergyman of New York city, I was traveling on the borders of the Hudson, and on the most beautiful portion of that noble stream, where its waters seem to rest against the Highlands of Fishkill, and form the Newburgh Bay. I was riding on the western shore, dotted with elegant country seats, and so elevated as to command a fine view of the opposite county of Dutchess. Passing a substantial mansion, I observed carriages standing around the entrance, and a hearse, that plainly indicated the occasion of the gathering. It was something more than curiosity; it was the dictate of natural sympathy, that induced me to stop and mingle with the multitude.

It was easy to learn from the first whom I addressed, that a young man, the son of parents now advanced in life, was to be buried. The clergyman in attendance was just closing his remarks when I stopped at the door; and after a short but eloquent pause in the services—for silence is always eloquent in the house of mourning—the afflicted father rose, and overcoming the emotion with which he struggled, spoke a few words to the friends that surrounded him. Said he: "A few months ago, one of my sons removed to the other side of the river, and resides on the shore in view of the spot where we are assembled. And now I find that my thoughts are over there far more frequently than they were before. I have long had friends there whom I loved, and I had an interest in the people, but I had no son there: but since that child has been a resident beyond the river, my heart is there often, and I love to be there. So it has been with me during the few days that I have passed since this other son has crossed the river of death, and, as I trust, has entered heaven. My thoughts are often there now. True, I had friends there before—a father there—but I had no child. Now I have an interest in heaven such as I never felt till one of my children went there to live!"

THE WAY TO FORTUNE,

OR, "IT IS BETTER TO WORK THAN TO BEG."

Let no poor boy, after reading the following interesting fact, ever despair of making a respectable living.

A gentleman was once walking down one of the streets of P———, when a beggar loudly craved for a "few coppers for a night's lodging." The gentleman looked earnestly at the poor man and inquired, "Why do you not work? you should be ashamed of begging." "Oh, sir, I do not know where to get employment." "Nonsense!" replied the gentleman, "you can work if you will."

"Now listen to me. I was once a beggar like you. A gentleman gave me a crown piece, and said to me, 'Work, and don't beg; God helps those who help themselves.' I immediately left P———, and got out of the way of my old companions. I remembered the advice given me by my mother before she died, and I began to pray to God to keep me from sin, and to give me his help day by day. I went round to the houses in the country places, and with part of my five shillings, bought old rags. These I took to the paper mills and sold them at a profit. I was always willing to give a fair price for the things I bought, and did not try to sell them for more than I believed they were worth. I determined to be honest, and God prospered me. My purchases and profit became larger, and now I have got more than ten thousand crown pieces that I can call my own. One great thing that has contributed to my success is this, I have kept from drink or tobacco."

As the gentleman spoke, he took out his purse, and drew from it a five shilling piece, and handing it to the astonished beggar, he said, "Now you have the same chance of getting on in the world as I had. Go and work, and never let me see you begging again. If I do, I will hand you over to the police."

Years passed away. The gentleman had forgotten the circumstance, until one day, when traveling through P———, he entered a respectable looking bookseller's shop in order to purchase some books that he wanted.

He had not been many minutes in conversation with the bookseller, before the latter, eagerly looking into the face of his customer, inquired, "Sir, are you not the gentleman who, several years ago, gave a five shilling piece to a poor beggar at the end of this street?"

"Yes! I remember it well."

"Then, sir, this house, this well-stocked shop, is the fruit of that five shilling piece."

Tears of gratitude trickled down his cheeks as he introduced the gentleman to his happy wife and children. He was regarded as their benefactor. When gathered round the table to partake of a cup of tea, the bookseller recounted his history from the above eventful day. It was very similar to that of the welcome visitor. By industry, honesty, and dependence upon God's help, he had risen step by step from buying rags to selling papers and tracts in the street, then to keeping an old book shop, and ultimately to be owner of one of the best circulating libraries in the place. Before the happy party separated, the large old family Bible was brought, out of which a Psalm of thanksgiving was read, and then all bent around the family altar. Words could not express the feelings of those who formed that group. For some moments, silence, intermingled by subdued sobs, evidenced the gratitude to the Almighty Disposer of all events, which was ascending to heaven.

When they rose, and bid each other farewell, the bookseller said, "Thank God, I have found your words to be true—'God helps those who help themselves.'—It is better to work than to beg.'"

THE DUMB CHILD.

She is my only girl
I asked for her as some most precious thing,
For all unfinished was Love's jewelled ring,
Till set with this soft pearl;
The shade that Time brought forth I could not see;
How pure, how perfect seemed the gift to me!

Oh! many a soft old tune
I used to sing unto that deadened ear,
And suffered not the slightest footstep near,
Lest she might wake too soon;
And hushed her brothers' laughter while she lay—
Ah, needless care! I might have let them play!

'Twas long ere I believed
That this one daughter might not speak to me;
Waited and watched—God knows how patiently,
How willingly deceived!
Vain Love was long the untiring nurse of Faith,
And tended Hope until it starved to death.

Oh! if she should but hear,
For one short hour, till I her tongue might teach
To call me MOTHER, in the broken speech
That thrills the mother's ear!
Alas! those sealed lips never may be stirred
To the deep music of that lovely word.

My heart it sorely tries
To see her kneel, with such a reverent air,
Beside her brothers at their evening prayer,
Or lift those earnest eyes
To watch our lips, as though our words she knew,
Then move her own, as she were speaking too.

I've watched her looking up
To the bright wonder of a sunset sky,
With such a depth of meaning in her eye,
That I could almost hope
The struggling soul would burst its binding cords,
And the long-pent-up thoughts flow forth in words.

The song of bird and bee,
The chorus of the breeze, the streams, and groves,
All the grand music to which Future moves,
Are wasted melody
To her; the world of sound a tuneless void:
While even silence hath its charm destroyed.

Her face is very fair;
Her blue eye beautiful; of finest mould
The soft white brow, o'er which, in waves of gold,
Ripples her shining hair.
Alas! this lovely temple closed must be,
For He who made it keeps the master-key.

Wills He the mind within
Should from earth's Babel-clamor be kept free,
E'en that His still small voice and step might be Heard at its inner shrine,
Through that deep hush of soul, with clearer thrill?
Then should I grieve?—O, murmuring heart, be still!

She seems to have a sense
Of quiet gladness in her noiseless play;
She hath a pleasant smile, a gentle way,
Whose voiceless eloquence
Touches all hearts—though I had once the fear
That e'en her father would not care for her.

Thank God, it is not so!
And when his sons are playing merrily,
She comes and leans her head upon his knee,
Oh! at such times I know—
By his full eye and tones subdued and mild—
How his heart yearns over his silent child.

Not of ALL gifts bereft,
E'en now. How could I say she did not speak?
What real language lights her eye and cheek,
And renders thanks to Him who left
Unto her soul yet open avenues
For joy to enter, and for love to use!

And God in love doth give
To her defect a beauty of its own,
And we a deeper tenderness have known
Through that for which we grieve.
Yet shall the seal be melted from her ear,
Yea, and MY VOICE shall fill it—but NOT HERE.

When that new sense is given,
What rapture will its first experience be,
That never woke to meaner melody
Than the rich songs of heaven,
To HEAR the full-toned anthem swelling round,
While angels teach the ectasies of sound!

KOSSUTH'S FAREWELL TO HUNGARY.

The following touching farewell to his country, is said to have been pronounced by Kossuth at Orsona, in October 1849, just when, betrayed by a sworn friend, and pursued by the minions of despotism, he was leaving his fatherland for the Turkish dominions:—

Farewell, my beloved country! Farewell, land of the Magyar! Farewell, thou land of sorrow! I shall never more behold the summit of thy mountains. I shall never again give the name of my country to that cherished soil where I drank from my mother's bosom the milk of justice and liberty. Pardon, oh! pardon him who is henceforth condemned to wander far from thee, because he combated for thy happiness. Pardon one who can only call free that spot of thy soil where he now kneels with a few of the faithful children of conquered Hungary. My last looks are fixed on my country, and I see thee overwhelmed with anguish. I look into the future, but that future is overshadowed. Thy plains are covered with blood, the redness of which pitiless destruction will change to black, the emblem of mourning for the victories thy sons have gained over the sacrilegious enemies of thy sacred soil.

How many grateful hearts have sent their prayers to the throne of the Almighty! How many tears have gushed from their very depth to implore pity! How much blood has been shed to testify that the Magyar idolizes his country, and that he knows how to die for it. And yet, land of my love, thou art in slavery. From thy very bosom will be forged the chain to bind all that is sacred, and to aid all that is sacrilegious. O, Almighty Creator, if thou lovest thy people to whom thou didst give victory under our heroic ancestor, Arpad, I implore thee not to sink them into degradation. I speak to thee, my country, thus from the abyss of my despair, and whilst yet lingering on the threshold of thy soil. Pardon me that a great number of thy sons have shed their blood for thee on my account. I pleaded for thee, I hoped for thee, even in the dark moment when on thy brow was written the withering word "Despair." I lifted my voice in thy behalf when men said, "Be thou a slave." I girt the sword about my loins, and I grasped the bloody plume, even when they said, "Thou art no longer a nation on the soil of the Magyar."

Time has written thy destiny on the pages of thy story in yellow and black letters—Death. The Colossus of the North has set his seal to the sentence. But the glowing iron of the East shall melt that seal.

For thee, my country, that has shed so much blood, there is no pity; for does not the tyrant eat his bread on the hills formed of the bones of thy children?

The ingrate whom thou hadst fattened with thy abundance, he rose against thee; he rose against thee, the traitor to his mother, and destroyed thee utterly. Thou hast endured all; thou hast not cursed thine existence, for in thy bosom, and far above all sorrow, hope has built her nest.

Magyars! turn not aside your looks from me, for at this moment mine eyes flow with tears for you, for the soil on which my tottering steps still wander is named Hungary.

My country, it is not the iron of the stranger that hath dug thy grave; it is not the thunder of fourteen nations, all arrayed against thee, that hath destroyed thee; and it is not the fifteenth nation, traversing the Carpathians, that has forced thee to drop thy arms. No! Thou hast been betrayed; thou hast been sold, my country; thy death sentence hath been written, beloved of my heart, by him whose virtue, whose love for thee I never dared to doubt. Yes! in the fervor of my boldest thoughts, I should have almost as soon doubted of the existence of the Omnipotent as have believed that he could ever be a traitor to his country. Thou hast been betrayed by him in whose hands I had but a little space before deposited the power of our great country, which he swore to defend, even to the last drop of his heart's blood. He hath done treason to his mother; for the glitter of gold hath been for him more seductive than that of the blood shed to save his country, and his God has abandoned him, as he had abandoned his God, for his allies of hell.

Magyars! Beloved companions, blame me not for having cast mine eyes on this man, and for having given to him my place. It was necessary, for the people had bestowed on him their confidence; the army loved him, and he obtained a power of which I myself would have been proud. And, nevertheless, this man belied the confidence of the nation, and has repaid the love of the army with hatred. Curse him, people of the Magyars! Curse the breast which did not first dry up before it first gave him its milk. I idolize thee, O thou most faithful of the nations of Europe, as I idolize the liberty for which thou hast proudly and bravely combated. The God of liberty will never efface thee from his memory. Mayest thou be for ever blest!

My principles have not been those of Washington, nor yet my acts those of Tell. I desired a free nation—free as man can be made but by God. And thou art fallen; faded as the lilly, but which in another season puts forth its flowers still more lovely than before. Thou art dead—for hath not thy winter come on? but it wilt not endure so long as that of thy companion under the frozen sky of Siberia. No! Fifteen nations have dug thy tomb. But the hosts of the sixteenth will come to save thee. Be faithful, as thou hast been even to the present. Conform to the holy counsels of the Bible. Lift up thy heart in prayer for the departed; but do not raise thine own hymn until thou hearest the thunders of the liberating people echo along thy mountains, and bellow in the depths of thy valleys.

Farewell, beloved companions! Farewell comrades! countrymen! May the thought of God, and may the angels of liberty for ever be with you! Do not curse me. You may well be proud, for have not the lions of Europe risen from their lairs to destroy the "rebels?" I will proclaim you to the civilized world as heroes, and the cause of an heroic people will be cherished by the freest nations of the earth—the freest of all free people.

Farewell, thou land dyed with the blood of the brave! Guard those red marks; they will one day bear testimony on thy behalf.

And thou, farewell, O youthful Monarch of the Hungarians! Forget not that my nation is not destined for thee. Heaven inspires me with the confidence that the day will dawn when it shall be proved to thee, even on the ruined walls of Buda.

May the Almighty bless thee, my beloved country! Believe, Hope, and Love!

FATHER MATHEW ON TEMPERANCE.

From his Farewell Sermon in New York.

Fourteen years have elapsed since I first erected the pure and spotless banner of Temperance in my own beloved country. My countrymen, always ready to follow virtuous impulses, flocked around the standard, and the highways were literally crowded with multitudes coming to my residence to enroll themselves in the Temperance Association; so that, in the course of six years, upwards of five millions of my countrymen had taken at my hands the all-saving Temperance Pledge. Glorious was the change that followed—crime and vice disappeared, and the change in their manners was as remarkable as their change from the use of intoxicating drinks. The Jails were all empty, and even the great Richmond in Dublin was entirely closed. This happy state of things continued for several years, and Ireland once more might be entitled the 'Island of Saints.' Oh, happy state of things, which should never have been interrupted, and which should have lasted forever! But the devil began to exert his hellish power, and some had fallen.

I am happy in being able to assert, that millions may still be found faithful to their solemn engagement. The principal falling off has been among emigrants, who abandoned Ireland for this great republic; deluded by Satan, they believed that they would not be able to endure the hardships of the voyage without strong drink, and receiving permission from weak and too indulgent persons to make use of it, continued to avail themselves of the opportunity thus afforded after their arrival. Many pledge-breakers attribute their present poverty and degradation to this fatal cause. Before I commenced this great Temperance movement, Intemperance swept all before it, and young and old, high and low, were borne along by the rushing tide of evil. I had many difficulties to encounter—the existing customs and habits—the opposition of interested persons, ready to pour upon me a flood of calumny. I felt a mighty pressure from without to prevent my commencing, but I felt a mighty pressure from within. I do not say that taking wine is a sin, but this I assert from this sacred chair, that such an indulgence is always attended with danger. No one is born a drunkard, yet we see them everywhere; from whence do they come? Not from heaven, for St. Paul says, 'No drunkard shall enter the kingdom of heaven,'—not from hell, for its adamantine gates once closed will never again open to permit the drunkard's egress; oh, no, virtue shall never again be cantaminated by his presence. 'Let him that standeth take care lest he fall.' I have invited many to take the Temperance pledge, and their reply was, 'I have no occasion, I am sober enough, and no drunkard;' ah, these words, 'I have no occasion,' have brought many to a miserable end—the greatest drunkard that ever lived might once say the same. Men have been reduced to the lowest state of debasement, and have reduced their wives and children to misery unutterable, who were once as temperate as any one here, and might also declare, 'I am sober enough.'"

RELIGION IN POLITICS.

We cut the following from a political paper in New York. If every religious man would, without making himself a politician, in the common sense of the word, make himself enough of one to do his whole duty as a citizen, the grogshop influence would soon be of but slight account in our elections.

"While there is very much to deplore in the politics of the day, there begins to be manifested a spirit, from which we confidently expect the most beneficent results. Within the last month, we have met a number of sedate, unambitious citizens, of that class hitherto inclined to boast that they were 'no politicians,' or had 'nothing to do with politics,' who have each been led, by calm observation and their own solitary reflections, to conclued that such a nugatory attitude is consistent neither with their positions as citizens of a republic, nor with their professions as disciples of Christ, or as moralists and well-wishers of their race, no matter how designated. These, without concert, or any external impulse, have been led to the conviction that they cannot hereafter keep away from the polls, nor even from the primary meetings and other initial proceedings, of whichever party they may severally deem most deserving of their support, without a consciousness of guilt. They realize that the practical direction and control of our political affairs has been too long surrendered by the church to the grogshop; and they have rosolved that henceforth such surrender must be effected, if at all, in defiance of their most earnest and concerted resistance."

KOSSUTH AND GORGEY.

While Kossuth is receiving the enthusiastic sympathy, admiration and assistance of the people of England and America, Gorgey, the other great leader of the Hungarian War of Independence, drags on a lonely and monotonous existence at Klagenfurth, in Carinthia, a city much resorted to by pensioned officers of the Austrian army. There he lives with his family, consisting of his wife, a single child, now but three months old, a woman servant, and a soldier, who was his attendant through the war. He sees little society, hardly a family of the city having sought his acquaintance. He has but one intimate friend, and that is an Englishman. His time is passed in studying chemistry and physics, and his chief amusement is lecturing upon physical chemistry to a few persons. Of money he has plenty; from the Austrian Government he receives a yearly pension of 3,000 florins; and from that of Russia he has received 60,000 silver rubles. He is very rarely seen in public; about once a month his wife prevails on him to take a walk for the sake of his health, but in general he avoids appearing abroad. The common people regard him with aversion.

The contrast in the present condition of these two leaders of Hungary is no greater than the contrast in their characters and conduct. Each is endowed with eminent abilities, and each had opportunities seldom alloted to man. Kossuth was faithful to his country and to liberty; Gorgey betrayed both. The one never filled so large a place in the esteem or the affections of the civilized world as now; the other is despised and detested. The patriot as well as the traitor has his reward. [N. Y. BUDDHISM AND ROMANISM.

The Roman Catholics obtained a footing in China, in the sixteenth century, and through the zeal of the Jesuits many professed converts were made. In the northern provinces of the empire, there are now many thousands of professed Romanists. But Romanism there, as elsewhere, has always accommodated itself to the feelings and prejudices of corrupt human nature. The rites of Romish worship are so analogous to those practiced by the Buddhists of China, that a conversion from one system to the other involves little more than the substitution of the saints of the Romish calendar, as objects of worship, for the images of departed ancestors. In their houses and chapels they have all kinds of pictures and images, including the persons of the Trinity, represented by an old man, Jesus on the cross, and a dove. So striking is the similarity in the two systems, that a Romish missionary once declared that Buddhism must have been the rival system and master plot of Satan, to hinder the progress of the Christian faith.

Mr. Geo. Wright, the ingenious inventor of the beautiful machine for making percussion caps, which was exhibited at the Capitol last year, has just returned from Constantinople, to which city he took one of his machines some months ago to submit it to the Ottoman Government. The Sultan not only ordered it to be purchased, but bestowed on the worthy inventor a complimentary present of much intrinsic value as well as beauty. It consists of what the Turks call a Zarf, or coffee cup holder, finely enameled, and ornamented with some thirty diamonds.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New-York, January 1, 1852.

THE NEW YEAR.

The date of our present issue suggests the propriety of wishing our readers a happy New Year. In extending this congratulation to some thousands of readers, with many of whom we have not the pleasure to be personally acquainted, we are not unmindful of the probability that we address, in some instances, those to whose anguished hearts such congratulation seems like mockery. Perhaps we address her, whose home has just been made desolate by the prostration of her devotedly-loved husband in death. Perhaps we congratulate parents, who are weeping over the remains of some promising child snatched from their embrace. Perhaps we give our good wishes to some, who have just experienced a sudden reduction from affluence to poverty. Perhaps to some, who are the subjects of gnawing disease and torturing pains. Perhaps to some, who are forsaken of friends, slandered and abused by those who ought to care for their welfare, and hopeless of any betterment of their condition here on earth. Perhaps to some, whose sense of guilt, as sinners against God, renders the opening year a day of darkness bordering on despair. Is it indeed mockery, to wish all such a happy New Year?

If our congratulation regarded only the happiness created by earthly things—the festivities of a celebration, the cheer of good company, or the possession of wealth—it might indeed seem like heartless mockery. But not so do we congratulate our readers. We wish them happiness of a more substantial kind. We wish them "the peace of God which passeth all understanding." We wish them that which it is possible for them to enjoy, notwithstanding the accumulated sorrows to which the opening year finds them subjected.

If death has invaded your circle, dear reader, and rendered your once happy home a scene of desolation; or if some demon has stalked into your sanctuary, and created a waste which no earthly comfort can repair; we will not mock your anguish by wishing you those enjoyments for wich your sorrows have disqualified you. But it is no mockery, under such circumstances, to say, "The Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace." For however desolate home or heart may have been made by the sorrows of this world, it is not a desolation which God cannot banish by his soul-cheering presence. The great mass of community will, this day, aim to find their happiness in the mirth and hilarity, the company and good cheer, of a New Year Festival. They may accomplish their object, yet have no solid, soul-satisfying reflections after all. But while the many are saying, "Who will show us any good?" it is your wisdom to say, "Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us." Then you will find, that He "has put gladness in your hearts, more than in the time that their corn and their wine increased." Ps. 4 : 6, 7.

But let us look forward to the future. Who can tell what the year may bring forth? Past years have been eventful; and a few of the last past, particularly so. Nations have been convulsed; kings have been dethroned; peoples have asserted their natural and God-given rights; and again arbitrary power has reasserted its sway, and the people's rights, for the time being, are crushed under foot. The political horizon gives ominous signs, however, that other disturbances are at hand. We shall not undertake to prognosticate the precise nature of these disturbances, nor the immediate results of them. But it is wisdom in God's people to be on the watch, to pray constantly, and be ready for whatever developments may take place. The time of trial will, must come, sooner or later; and it may be near at hand.

Who can tell what important results may grow out of the present extraordinary excitement regarding Hungarian Independence? Judging from present indications, the people of our country are ready to demand of their government some departure from what has heretofore been supposed to be its true policy. Should the demand be heeded—and perhaps it ought to be—who can calculate the consequences? Who can confidently say, that it will not eventuate in a general war of nations? We pretend to no political sagacity, and would not be understood as predicting that such will be the result. We merely contemplate it as among the possible fruits of the proposed departure from our policy. And should this be the result, what will be the condition of Christ's Church, till the struggle is over? Will it not be a day of trial for her? Is she ready for it? Reader, are you ready for it? It may be, that the day of trial will commence ere the present year shall close.

But granting that no such portentous result shall spring immediately from the present excitement, is it reasonable to suppose that the hour of trial to the Church is past, never to return again? God's people have always been a tried people, and it is hardly to be expected that their present respit from affliction will continue a great while. We look for some change. As in ages past God has led his Church through severity of discipline, so we expect it will be again; that of the whole ransomed host it may be said, "These are they who have come out of great tribulation."

Leaving these questions, however, as questions in which the present generation have no immediate practical interest, there is one in which every one of our readers is deeply and practically concerned. Your individual probation may be nearly finished. How momentous the inquiry, Shall I live to see the first day of another year? And if I should, will it be a year fruitful in labors performed for the cause of God? Or will it be like the past—a year of opportunities afforded, but neglected—a year of mercies enjoyed, but not gratefully acknowledged? "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave whither thou goest." Eccles. 9 : 10.

JEWISH MISSIONS---AGAIN.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

In my article last week on the subject of a mission to the Jews, and the interest formerly felt by Seventh-day Baptists, I alluded to the fact that Christian efforts are being made to advance the cause of Christ in Jerusalem, by some persons converted from Judaism, together with Christian friends who are Baptists and observers of the Sabbath; and I promised some further notice of them in a subsequent article.

John Meshullam was a European by birth and education. His parents, who were Jews, died when he was young, and left him to make his own arrangements for life. He adhered to his Jewish faith till somewhat advanced, when, through the instrumentality of the Rev. Mr. Wolff, the Jewish convert and missionary, he became interested in the Christian religion. Opposition and persecution from Jews followed him wherever he attempted to settle himself, till, reduced in property, and discouraged in business pursuits, he at length established himself at Jerusalem, as the keeper of a hotel for travelers, and became a popular host, especially for those from Europe. In connection with this pursuit, he commenced the cultivation of the soil, with a view of aiding the oppressed Israelites in becoming agriculturists, and especially to encourage those who should be disposed to favor the Christian faith. While thus employed, he has been greatly encouraged by some Christian friends, who became his guests, and who were interested for the Jews, and confidently expected that God would soon reveal himself in their behalf. These Christian friends were from the United States, were Baptists and Sabbath observers, though ignorant of us as a people, as was Meshullam. In belief that God would work by means, and in view of the promises that the sterility of the soil should give place to a high state of cultivation and fruitfulness, they conceived the plan of commencing a colony of Christian agriculturists, and of artists necessary for the wants of agriculture; and although comparatively without means, they have, by soliciting aid of such as favored their object, made a beginning. Several have gone from the United States to join the colony, and others are going, and only waiting aid to enable them to leave with some prospect of success. Those who go are Baptists, and keep the Sabbath, and it is supposed that none will join this settlement but such as are. It appears that their efforts are appreciated by Christian missionaries in that place, and aid is offered them by Episcopalians and Baptists, if they will but conform to their creed and fellowship. But they have declined, as the Sabbath is with them a matter of principle, and they had rather trust in God to open the hearts of Christians to aid them as they are, than to compromise truth for the purpose of securing the means required. Friends have been made in unexpected ways, and timely means furnished in extraordinary seasons of want. Contributions have been made to them of agricultural implements and valuable articles of every kind for the furtherance of their object; and money, the indispensable in traveling, has been furnished; and all these articles are still wanted, to aid others that are now waiting means to leave this country. The courage of this little company has been greatly increased by a small acquaintance formed with a few Seventh-day Baptists in New York, who have contributed to their enterprise, and they without doubt anticipate that Seventh-day Baptists will be disposed to sympathize deeply with them. Still, they make no formal request to any denomination, and hope for aid only from individuals who appreciate their object. I understand that Mr. and Mrs. T. B. Stillman will with pleasure receive any aid intended for them, and I am assured that nothing valuable that can be converted to family use, or agricultural purposes, or that encourages the useful and necessary trades, will come amiss, but be gladly received.

There is one consideration which now presses itself on our attention; that is, Have we any duty to do in this case? and, if so, what is that duty? Is it not evident that we have committed an error in neglecting this ground, when its occupation can be more advantageous to the community by Sabbath-keepers than by others? And if God has disposed others to enter into this work, are we not in duty bound to contribute to them of our substance, so to relieve their necessities that they may not be constrained to form entangling alliances with other denominations? We ask for information.

It may be, that such as are well informed may be able to make such statements as will secure a contribution of such funds as are needed for the immediate relief of those who are detained on this side of the waters by want of means to embark for their labors of love in Palestine. Could this be accomplished, then we might, as a denomination, inquire into the whole matter, and be satisfied whether we have a work to do as a people in aiding these Christian efforts for the conversion of the Jews.

CHRISTIAN BENEVOLENCE.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

I want to say a few words to your readers upon a subject about which I have been exercised for a long time, viz. Christian Benevolence. There are doubtless brethren or sisters in each of our churches who are well enough off in the world to spend a portion of their time exclusively in the work of Christian benevolence. Oh, how much the cause of God suffers for the want of such laborers! The minister cannot do all the visiting that is necessary to be done. Professors of religion have become too much attached to the world, and manifest too little interest in the religion of Jesus. It does seem that we need to be frequently urged up to duty. The standard of vital piety must be raised among us, or the candle-stick will be removed out of its place. Who knows how much good a warm-hearted brother or sister might do in visiting the brethren (with a few religious tracts to distribute) for the express purpose of stirring up their pure minds by way of remembrance, conversation, reading the Scriptures, and prayer? Who knows how many family altars they might be the means of erecting? And here a great many subjects open to one's mind, in making a strictly religious visit. God by his Holy Spirit would find a great work for such to do. Besides watering their own souls, God's name would be glorified in the upbuilding of the cause of truth. If a few in each of our Seventh-day Baptist churches would engage in this benevolent enterprise, I will venture to predict, that it would be but a few weeks before our churches would begin to come up to the work; backsliders would be reclaimed, and sinners would be converted. And our benevolent operations should not be forgotten in such visits—such as obtaining subscribers for the Sabbath Recorder, and contributions for the Tract and Missionary Societies. Who will engage? May the Lord give to his children grace and moral courage to labor in his vineyard.

DOMESTICUS.

MARLBORO, N. J., December 21, 1851.

A COLONY TO OREGON.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

It is well known, that for many years there has been an almost constant emigration from our New England Churches westward. The Yankee spirit of enterprise, a desire to better one's pecuniary circumstances, together with the flattering prospects which the WEST has seemed to hold out, have induced many a one to forsake the land of his fathers, the home of his childhood, and seek his fortune in the Far West. New York, Ohio, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Iowa, have thus received their quota of Sabbatarians. In numerous instances, those who at different times have in this manner stood as the representatives of our denomination, have been men of sterling worth, and that constant and persevering piety which has so fitly qualified them for becoming pioneers in establishing Christian Societies—men whose sole object has not been to make money, but who, with a laudable desire to provide for those of their own households, have sought, principally, to extend their usefulness in the world, and promote the interests of the Redeemer's Kingdom.

Such men have been the founders of the New York and Western Churches. Time has developed—time will long continue to develop—the fruits of their labors. A history of those churches, should such a work ever make its appearance, will enroll the names of many of these pioneers high upon the list of those whose example is worthy of careful imitation. While this has been the case with such, it is to be regretted, that others have exhibited far different results. Brethren who were regarded, and perhaps justly, as worthy members of our churches, led by a desire to better their fortunes, maybe compelled by the increasing demands of a family to change their locality, have also sought the West. With different interests, without plan or organization, they have scattered like sheep without a shepherd. Far from one another, subjected to numerous inconveniences on account of their peculiar religious belief, deprived of church privileges, and, in many instances, of christian society, what wonder if, under such circumstances, some have made shipwreck of their faith?

It is not our present intention to enumerate the inconveniences to which allusion has been made, nor to canvass the extent to which our brethren have thus been scattered and eventually lost to the denomination, and by which our Eastern Churches have been constantly weakened and reduced, without any commensurate fruits from many of those who have been induced to separate from them. Doubtless there are hundreds now in the West, (we speak advisedly,) who have either left our churches, or have descended from those who were once members with us, but who are now connected with other religious denominations, or are reckoned among the irreligious. That much of this great evil has arisen from want of plan or organization on the part of those who have settled in the western country, is too evident to be overlooked. According to his knowledge of the facilities offered by a particular locality, each one, ignorant of a similar desire and movement on the part of others, has selected his home and settled his family, perhaps hundreds of miles distant from other brethren, who would have been glad of his society had there been a mutual understanding. But we have already extended these remarks quite far enough. It would be well if we could "let the dead Past bury its dead," and learn by an unhappy experience to avoid like mistakes in the future.

The spirit of emigration never prevailed more extensively than it does at the present time. Our brethren are migrating from all quarters, some to Illinois, some to Wisconsin and Iowa, others to California, and still others to Oregon. Now, to sit down and object to all this, and call it wicked to go to California, and pronounce our anathemas and croak our forebodings against those who have determined to take advantage of fortuitous circumstances, seems the very acme of folly. The rising generation have learned, that it will not do in this age to carry a stone in one end of the bag and the corn in the other, and it will take a great many lessons to teach one class, that while others may better their fortunes every day, it will be wicked for them to do likewise. It would be far wiser in us, then, to devise some means by which all these movements may contribute to the welfare and advancement of the cause of Christ. In union there is strength. Half a dozen faithful disciples, mutually and jointly laboring for the cause of God, will frequently do more than a score, equally zealous and devoted, but who have to work single-handed and alone. Let those desirous of moving West, or elsewhere, understand one another. Let well-compacted organizations be formed, with the great object of sustaining and advancing the fundamental principles of the denomination. Let these purchase and settle neighborhoods, and take the lead of their civil and religious interests, grow with their growth, and strengthen with their strength. It is almost incredible, that while others have long made use of this kind of colonization with such astonishing success, in permanently planting their religious sentiments, we seem to have profited scarcely at all by their example. But we hope the time has come when our brethren will awaken to their interests, and no more scatter their strength, but join hands in the cause of God. Our religious and pecuniary interests ought to be ultimately united. In the Providence of God they are united, and woe to that man who will deliberately sacrifice his religious principles to the love of gain. If we had room, it would be interesting to illustrate what we have said, by tracing the history of some of those colonies which have done so much in fixing religious belief in the Mississippi Valley, and in various other sections of our country. But we forbear.

We shall close the present article by the following proposition. It is contemplated by several friends of the cause, to organize a Society similar to those under consideration, for the purpose of establishing a self-supporting Missionary Colony in Oregon, the object of which shall be, to preach the gospel, and labor to establish a community upon the principles of the Bible—to judiciously employ all the lawful facilities which that country offers for acquiring wealth, and in the mean time to consecrate every thing to the service of God and the advancement of Christ's kingdom in the world—to establish, as soon as men and means will warrant, a College of Learning, and, if practicable, a Theological Seminary, for the purpose of ministering to the intellectual and moral wants of the colony, and of that increasing population. It is proposed to take up a tract of land suitable for farming and mechanical and manufacturing operations, and, as the interest of the colony may demand, to engage in one or all of these pursuits. The above outline has been given for the purpose of advertising all who desire to remove to the Western Country, to California, or to Oregon, and who can unite in the general object stated, that such an enterprise is contemplated. Several persons in and near New York have expressed themselves ready to engage in it. With a view of ascertaining how many and who cherish such feelings, it is requested that all such communicate their views. Letters addressed to "Oregon," care of the Sabbath Recorder, will be handed to the writer of this article, and will receive proper attention.

"THE PEOPLE'S COLLEGE."

For some time past, (says the N. Y. Tribune,) an association of mechanics in this State has been agitating and digesting plans for a COLLEGE FOR THE PEOPLE, at which the sons of farmers, mechanics, and day-laborers, as well as others, may find instruction suited to their various wants, on terms consistent with their means. To this end the combination of manual labor with mental instruction is of course essential. Each pupil, male or female, in the proposed college, will study such sciences mainly as will be directly useful to him in his proposed course of life, and will at the same time make himself master of at least one trade or calling. The avails of his labor will be passed to his credit, so that, after the first year or two, he will be able nearly or quite to pay his way, and after his third year he may, perhaps, more than pay his way. The ends aimed at are the bringing of thorough education within the reach of the poorest, and the qualifying of the educated class to earn their living by their hands whenever they are not required in some more intellectual vocation.

A meeting of this Association was held at Lockport, on the 25th of November, and another meeting is to be held at the Mansion House, in Buffalo, on the 15th day of January inst. A Prospectus of the People's College has been issued, which we copy.

Prospectus.

Each age has its peculiar wants, impulses, and necessities. Man, being by nature progressive, the institutions, usages and means of culture which sufficed for, or at least satisfied, one generation, are found inadequate or unsuited by another; and especially in regard to Education, which, in its larger, higher and truer sense, may well be deemed the chief end of our mortal being, it is manifest that perpetual progress is essential to the full and healthful satisfaction of the just demands of the ever-expanding human soul. Within the last fifty years, an immense improvement has been made in the character of our elementary or Common Schools. Has a corresponding improvement been exhibited in the character of our higher seminaries? Is there a like contrast between the colleges of 1851 and those of 1801, as between the Common Schools of those two periods respectively? We think few, or none, will answer this affirmatively.

That our present Colleges satisfy certain educational wants of the community, we do not deny. That other educational wants, equally vital, and even more general, are left unsatisfied by them, we think no candid observer will dispute. These wants ought to be, must be, provided for. We have associated ourselves, and invite others to unite with us, to subserve this end. The principles by which we mean to abide—the objects we shall endeavor to accomplish—are briefly as follows:—

First: The institution we seek to establish shall be known as the "PEOPLE'S COLLEGE." It shall be located in the State of New York, and shall endeavor preeminently to minister to the educational wants of the Youth of the whole People.

Second: It shall in no case apply for or accept pecuniary aid from the State Treasury: Provided, that no appropriation from said Treasury is hereafter made in aid of any College whatsoever.

Third: Its distinctive aim shall be the dissemination of Practical Science, including Chemistry, Geology, Mineralogy, and those sciences most immediately and vitally essential to Agriculture and the Useful Arts, though instruction in the Classics shall be amply provided.

Fourth: It shall afford suitable facilities for the Education of Young Women, as well as Young Men; all the sciences taught in the College being as freely imparted to the former as the latter.

Fifth: Every pupil and every teacher shall be required to devote some hours of each five days in each week, (excluding Sunday for worship and Saturday for recreation,) to bona-fide Useful Labor in some branch of productive industry.

Sixth: Agriculture, with various branches of Manufactures and the Mechanic Arts, shall be systematically prosecuted within the bounds of the College and its grounds, and as a part of its regular course. And no student shall be permitted to graduate with honor, until he shall have passed a searching examination with regard to his proficiency in Agriculture, or some branch of Manufacturing or Mechanical Industry,—either of which he shall be at liberty to choose on entering the institution,—or he may be allowed to pursue both Agriculture and Mechanics.

Seventh: Each student shall be credited with and ultimately paid for the product of his or her labor, less the cost of instruction and qualifying him or her to perform it effectively. The number of hours which each student shall be required to labor, shall in no case exceed twenty nor fall below ten in each week.

Eighth: Besides housewifery in all its branches, the female student shall be instructed in dress-making, fine needle-work, and such branches of manufacture as may be deemed most desirable—the general aim being to qualify every pupil, without exception, for independence and usefulness in life, whatever his or her physical or mental capacities.

Ninth: Students are to be allowed (with the advice and consent of their parents or guardians and the Faculty) to have a free choice with regard to the branches of learning to be pursued by them severally—but the Faculty shall implicitly require from each student a thorough mastery of those he or she may decide to follow. The diploma shall expressly specify the branches the recipient has mastered, and those only; and any student under this condition may prosecute his or her studies for as many terms only as may be deemed expedient.

Tenth: The property of The People's College shall be held and managed by Trustees chosen by subscribers to its stock, which shall be held in one dollar shares, each stockholder entitled to one vote in the choice of Trustees, creating the College, &c., &c.

Eleventh: These Propositions are to be regarded as subject to amendment at all times by a majority vote of the stockholders, save that the fundamental principles of finding work for and requiring of each pupil and teacher at least ten hours bona-fide useful labor per week, and an earnest effort to master some industrial pursuit, are to be held irrevocable except by a vote of all the stockholders, taken by ayes and noes, and the names of those voting duly recorded.

Resolved, That petitions to the Legislature of this State be presented at the coming session for a charter for a Stock Company, with one dollar shares, for the purpose contemplated in the above prospectus.

LIBRARY OF BROWN UNIVERSITY.—In a notice of the condition and prospects of Harvard and Brown Universities, the New York Christian Inquirer speaks of the Library of the latter institutions a follows:—

"We find the Brown Library well cared for, and its guardians are looking carefully after the interests of classical and Christian learning. The Librarian has been in the city during the sale of the Jarvis Library, and has purchased a large amount of the best books, especially in the department of Christian antiquities and patristics. In this department, especially the Christian literature of the first six centuries, Brown University equals, if it does not surpass, any Library in the land. It is pleasant to see this enterprising institution pursuing so liberal a policy, and having an eye upon the practical business of the age, without slighting the lore of ancient times. We were amused by the wonder of the book-buyers at the large purchases made by Mr. Guild; and the magnates of the New York Episcopacy were surprised to learn, that the city of that unruly Roger Williams has a better patristical library than this stronghold of American prelacy."

EDUCATION IN AFRICA.—The late Mr. Bloomfield, of Rome, N. Y., left a residuary legacy for the purpose of educating in Africa young colored persons for the pulpit. The amount, it is thought, will be about twenty thousand dollars.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

In looking over the minutes of our denomination, I find that there are a number of our churches destitute of pastors. I would say, for the benefit of such, that Eld. Geo. R. Wheeler, residing in Salem, N. J., embraced the Sabbath of the Lord some five years ago, is a regularly-ordained minister, and a sound, orthodox, and sterling preacher of righteousness. His family consists of himself, wife, and one child. He is a silversmith by trade, and doing a good business in the village of Salem; but I think he ought to be about his Master's business. Doubtless the Lord has a work for him to do somewhere.

A FREE PRESS IN ENGLAND.—An Association has been formed in England for the purpose of agitating the abolition of stamp duties They say that the penny stamp makes it impossible for a daily paper to exist (in competition with The Times) which has no other resources than the support of the public. According to a table which has been published, it appears that the circulation of the daily press, exclusive of the Times, in 1850, was less than in 1837 by a million and a half; while the circulation of the Times, which in 1837 was less than one quarter of the whole, is, now more than one half. "Should the stamp continue ten years longer, (says the Address,) we may expect to lose all our morning papers but the Times and Advertiser; by taking off the stamp, a field will be opened which will enable us to have a daily press dependent only on the public." In view of this state of things, the people are called upon, by their desire for the freedom of the press, to demand of Parliament a repeal of the penny stamp, and of all taxes on knowledge.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY IN BELGIUM.—In an account of the present condition of Belgium, and the encouragements for Protestant effort in that country, Dr. Baird states, that when he first visited the kingdom, fifteen years ago, no Home Missionary Society existed in it; now the Belgium Evangelical Society has twenty-six stations, twelve ordained ministers preaching to organized churches, besides three or four colporteurs, and eleven pious school teachers. 300,000 copies of the Scriptures, and many thousand tracts, have been distributed, chiefly since 1835. The four millions and a half of the population are believed to be more thoroughly Roman Catholic than any other people in the whole world; but the Constitution, made twenty years ago, places Catholics and Protestants on the same footing, and the government, unlike that of France, faithfully carries into effect the provisions of the Constitution, guaranteeing religious liberty to all.

FREE MISSIONS.—The American Baptist, the organ of the Baptist Free Mission Society, publishes letters from Mr. Judd, missionary in Hayti, representing the field of effort there as widening, and calling for an increase of appropriations to meet the demands upon the mission. The same paper states that the Treasury of the Society is overdrawn—that the receipts this year, as compared with those of last year, show a decided diminution—and that if the work of the Society is to be efficiently prosecuted, its friends must come to its aid with a liberality not measured by the contributions of former years.

PROGRESS OF MISSIONS IN NEW ZEALAND.—The Rev. John Mason reached Wanganui, New-Zealand, in June, 1840. On the second anniversary of his arrival, a congregation of 800 natives, from various parts of the district, assembled, to be present at the opening of his church; and during the two years and a half of his ministry he baptized no fewer than 300 adults. On Christmas day, 1849, the congregation consisted of 4,000 natives, 776 individuals having partaken of the Lord's Supper on that day and the preceding Sunday—eleven years only having elapsed since the commencement of missionary work in the district.

LOUIS KOSSUTH, Governor of Hungary, proceeded last week to Philadelphia, where he was very cordially received, and where, in addition to brief addresses to several delegations, he delivered a lengthy address at a Citizens' Banquet on the evening of Sixth-day. On the Sabbath he went to Baltimore, and in the evening of that day he addressed a large assembly at the Hall of the Maryland Institute. In these addresses he has spoken freely of the recent movements in France, which he regards as confirming his oft-expressed opinion, that Europe is ready for Revolution, and that the year 1852 will witness great overturns there.

THE FIRE ANNIHILATORS, so called, have been annihilated. A New York Committee, consisting of the President and Chief Engineer of the Fire Department, and several distinguished citizens, have given to Mr. Phillips, the inventor, an opportunity to show what his machines could do. His first effort proved a failure, and he refuses to make a second. If the annihilators are really what they pretend to be, why does not the inventor go to some of the fires which are occurring almost daily, and show their power upon them?

JENNY LIND'S Farewell Series of Concerts in America commenced at Metropolitan Hall, New York, on Tuesday evening, Dec. 30. She is to give some half a dozen in the first two weeks of January, and then bid adieu to this country, probably for ever. The price of tickets has been fixed at one, two, and three dollars, according to the part of the Hall occupied.

THE SABBATH-SCHOOL VISITOR for January, issued this week, is the first number of the second volume. As the work advances, considerable improvements will be made, particularly in the number and quality of engravings and in the amount of music furnished. The terms will remain as heretofore. As they require payment in advance, measures should be taken immediately to collect and forward the money necessary to renew subscriptions. In no place should the number circulated be diminished; in most places it should be increased; and subscriptions should be obtained in many places where the paper is not now taken. To secure this, we solicit the aid of the friends of Sabbath-Schools and of the Sabbath-School Visitor.

TERMS PER ANNUM—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

One copy	$ 25
Five copies to one address	1 00
Twelve copies to one address	2 00
Twenty copies to one address	3 00
Twenty-eight copies to one address	4 00
Forty copies to one address	[illegible]

☞ These terms are invariably in advance; hence money should in all cases accompany the order. Letters should be addressed to GEO. B. UTTER, No. 9 Spruce-street, New York.

SECOND-DAY, DEC. 22.

In the SENATE, a bill for the improvement of certain Rivers and Harbors was introduced by Mr. Miller of N. J., and referred to the Committee on Commerce. The resolution of Mr. Hale, calling for information in relation to flogging in the Navy, was adopted. By a vote of 20 to 19, Sixth-day of each week was set apart to the consideration of Private Bills. Mr. Foote's Compromise Resolution was then taken up, and spoken upon by several Senators, among them Mr. Houston of Texas.

The HOUSE refused to suspend the rules to allow of the introduction of a resolution for the appointment of a Committee of Five to wait on Louis Kossuth, on his arrival at the Capitol, to introduce him to the House of Representatives. Some time was spent in considering how the different parts of the President's Message should be referred. This subject was finally laid aside to consider the bill explanatory of the Bounty Land Law of September, 1850, making warrants assignable prior to location. Several amendments were offered and debated. No question taken. The Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

THIRD-DAY, DEC. 23.

In the SENATE, a communication was received from the Navy Department, and ordered printed, in relation to flogging in the Navy. Mr. Clemens, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported favorably the joint resolution creating the brevet rank of Lieutenant-General, and authorizing the President to confer that rank by brevet, for meritorious services. Mr. Shields gave notice of a bill to increase the efficiency of the army, by providing a retired list for disabled officers. The Compromise Resolutions were then taken up, and Mr. Cass made a long speech in favor of them. Mr. Clemens also addressed the Senate on the same side; after which their farther consideration was postponed until the first Second-day in January. Adjourned to Sixth-day.

In the HOUSE, after considerable discussion, the bill to make land warrants assignable, and provide additional compensation to land officers, and for soldiers not heretofore provided for, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and subsequently referred to a select Committee of five. Communications from the Departments were received; one to the effect that the State Department has no information or knowledge of the conclusion of a treaty between Spain, France, and Great Britain, in respect to the island of Cuba, on the contrary, there is good reason to suppose that no such treaty has been entered into; another from the Secretary of the Navy, stating that the squadron of the United States, at present employed on our coast, and in the West India seas, consists of the steam-frigate Saranac, sloops Albany, Cyane, Decatur, and steamer Vixen—in all, five vessels, carrying sixty-five guns. The Speaker also laid before the House a communication from the State Department in reply to a resolution for information, stating that there is no doubt that John S. Thrasher is a citizen of the United States by birth, nor is there any doubt that he has resided in Cuba for a considerable number of years engaged in business, although the precise period and duration of such residence is not known. Thrasher has made no communication to the Department, although he has through the press addressed a general letter and remonstrance to the Government and people of the United States. These communications were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the House adjourned over to Sixth-day.

SIXTH-DAY, DEC. 26.

A few members of the SENATE got together, and after waiting a while in vain for a quorum, adjourned.

The HOUSE held a brief session, in which a Committee on the Land Bill was appointed. The Speaker laid before the House a communication from the Librarian of Congress, stating the loss of the Library and its contents by fire, in a manner unaccountable to him, as no fire had been in the apartment for a long period, nor fire nor lights during the time it has been in his charge. The loss of books is about 35,000 volumes; 20,000 were saved in an adjoining room. The Joint Committee on Public Buildings were instructed to inquire into the origin of the fire. Mr. Stanton of Ky. introduced a bill, which was passed, making an appropriation of $5,000 for the discharge of expenses incurred in extinguishing the fire in the Library of Congress—the removal of rubbish—the preservation of the books saved, and the construction of a temporary building for this purpose. The House then adjourned till Second-day.

SABBATH-DAY, DEC. 27.

Eleven members of the SENATE met and adjourned.

Fire at Washington—Congressional Library Burned.

There was a fire in the Capitol at Washington, on Fourth-day, the 24th of December, which destroyed a large part of the Congressional Library, including Jefferson's Library, (many volumes of which were rendered more valuable by his autograph notes and marginal references,) Manuscripts, Public Documents, Maps, Portraits of distinguished men, Marble Busts, Medals struck by order of Congress, &c. The Library rooms extended along the West front of the Capitol, looking toward the White House, projecting and separated from the Capitol proper by a substantial wall, which has saved the main building. The Historical Paintings of Trumbull, (including the original "Signing of the Declaration," filling the panels of the Rotunda, under the Central Dome, are uninjured. Some of the more valuable Paintings (portraits of the Presidents, &c.) and the original draft of the Declaration of Independence were saved. There were several other libraries in the Capitol. The Law Library, the House and Senate Libraries, containing large collections of Documents, and the collection in a separate room of the Library Hall, consisting of Law and Statistical Books, were preserved from the general ruin.

The fire was discovered by a watchman at half past 7 in the morning—the flames were first seen at the center table, sweeping round to the north-west shelving—a few buckets of water would then have suppressed the fire, but before they could be procured the entire library was in flames. It contained 55,000 volumes; about 20,000, which were in an adjoining room, were saved. All the fixtures were destroyed, and the loss is estimated at over $200,000; but some of the works can never be replaced. The roof of the library is all burned, and the exterior of the building on the west is blackened. The dome at one time was in imminent danger, but this and the two Chambers of Congress are uninjured. The flames were subdued by 12 o'clock. It has not been ascertained whether the fire was caused by the flues, or was the work of an incendiary.

The National Intelligencer of Thursday, says, besides the books, a number of superior paintings, hanging around the Library walls and between the alcoves, were included in the destruction. Of these we can call to mind Stuart's paintings of the first five Presidents; an original portrait of Peyton Randolph; a portrait of Bolivar; a portrait of Baron Steuben by Pyne, an English artist of merit; one of Baron De Kalb; one of Cortez; and one of Judge Hanson, of Maryland, presented to the Library by his family. Between eleven and twelve hundred bronze medals of the Vattemare exchange, some of them more than ten centuries old, and exceedingly perfect, are among the valuables destroyed. Of the statuary burnt and rendered worthless, we recollect a statue of Jefferson; an Apollo in bronze by Mills; a very superior bronze likeness of Washington; a bust of Gen. Taylor, by an Italian artist; and a bust of La Fayette by David. We have only heard of three books saved from the principal Library, namely, Librarian's Register, an account book, and an odd volume of Lord Kingsbury's magnificent work on the Antiquities of Mexico.

The Republic of the same day says: The library, situated in the center of the west front, was constructed with great taste and beauty. The room, 92 feet in length, 34 in width, and 36 in height, having alcoves over which were two galleries extending throughout the apartment. The room was handsomely ornamented, and the light was admitted both from ample windows and from three skylights above. Paintings, marble busts, and cabinets were a part of the attractions, in addition to the elegant folios of colored prints, and a choice collection of books, gathered from all civilized countries, and from international exchanges. One of the cabinets had recently been placed in the library. The frame-work was of mahogony, and in the maple panels, covered with glass, were inserted choice bronze medals, commemorative of events in ancient times, and which were deposited through the agency of M. Vattemare. Mr. Jefferson's library, embracing about 7,000 volumes, was purchased in 1815, for $23,000; and this, we believe, formed the nucleus of the 55,000 volumes which have since accumulated. Congress has, for a series of years, annually appropriated $5,000 or $6,000 for the purchase of books and papers; and it is estimated that these have cost the Government, in addition to the Jefferson purchase, about $200,000.

A dispatch from Washington, dated Dec. 26, says that the origin of the fire at the Capitol has been ascertained beyond a doubt. On the removal of the rubbish one of the timbers of an alcove, entering the wall on the east side of the library, exactly where the fire was first observed, it was found to extend into a defective flue leading from the Committee Room, where a wood fire was kept. This timber was mostly consumed, while other timbers in parts of the wall were but slightly burned. The chimney connecting with this flue was also ascertained to have been on fire. It is considered satisfactory proof that this was the cause of the fire.

European News.

By the steamer Baltic, arrived since our last, four days later news from Europe was received.

The accounts of revolution in France—the President dissolving the National Asssembly, reëstablishing universal suffrage, and calling upon the people to elect a chief for ten years—are confirmed. We copy several paragraphs from Paris letters:—

Generals Changarnier, Cavaignac, Bedeau, Lamoricire, Leflo, Colonel Charras, MM. Baze, Thiers, Brun, the Commissary of Police of the Assembly, and, it is said, 22 or 23 others, have been arrested. The first named are committed to Vincennes, and were to be transferred to the fortress of Ham. General Changarnier attempted to harangue the soldiers sent to aid the police agents who arrested him; but it is said they refused to listen to him. Colonel Charras is said to have wounded one of the agents who arrested him.

A large number of arrests were made on Friday and Saturday. Not of men of political prominence, but of dangerous persons, among them several members of the Left. The generals who were sent to Ham, are reported to have arrived there safe and sound. Theirs, who was ill in prison, has been brought to his own house again. He is watched. Nearly all the representatives, who were taken prisoners at the Maine, of the Tenth Aorrndissement, have been released. The Assembly had sunk itself so low, by its discords, and the political corruption of most of the leaders in the Orleanist and Legitimist factions, that there is little mourning for its dispersion, and less probability, that were all its members at liberty they could make head against Napoleon.

The number of persons killed in the streets, at the barricades, and in houses is not yet known. I had heard it rated all along from five to fifteen hundred. The last figure is an exaggeration.

The troops appear to be well satisfied with the change, and the people not very much discontented; and, what is a great point, the Money Market has entire confidence in the movement.

Louis Blanc is said to have been taken just as he landed in France. The inlets to the country are guarded against the entrance of persons thought to be dangerous.

It is a curious fact, in connection with the important events of this day, that the 2d December is the anniversary of the coronation of the Emperor Napoleon in 1804, and of the battle of Austerlitz in 1805.

The news from other parts of Europe is not important.

Priessnitz, the celebrated founder of hydropathy, died at Grafenberg on the the 26th of Nov., at the age of 52. In the morning of that day Priessnitz was up and stirring at an early hour, but complained of the cold, and had wood brought in to make a large fire. His friends had for some time believed him to be suffering from dropsy of the chest, and at their earnest entreaty he consented to take a little medicine, exclaiming all the while, "It is of no use." He would see no physician, but remained to the last true to his profession. About 4 o'clock in the afternoon of the 26th he asked to be carried to bed, and upon being laid down he expired.

Three Days Later.

By the steamer Canada, we have European news to Dec. 13. French affairs continued to be the engrossing subject of interest, but there have been no fresh incidents of striking importance.

Several additional Departments have been placed in a state of siege, and the Minister of War has sent a circular to the Generals throughout France to cause the immediate execution of all persons taken, for the commission of acts of murder and pillage.

Several distinguished members of the Legitimist and Orleans party have sent in their adhesion to the Government.

Several legions of National Guards have been disarmed for exhibiting disaffection.

So far as the vote of the army furnishes any index of public sentiment in France, it is almost unanimous in favor of the President. The vote of the army, as far as reported, stands 65,000 in favor of Louis Napoleon, to 3,000 against him.

It is said that the President has suppressed the publication of 73 newspapers.

The total number of arrests, thus far, is stated at 1,800.

M. Thiers, having imprudently declared against the Government, immediately after his liberation from prison, is said to have been a second time arrested, by order of the President. Certain it is that he left Paris in haste, and has passed the Prussian frontiers.

Many of the leading members of the Mountain party have fled the country, and many others, for whose arrest warrants have been issued, are believed to be be still in Paris. Among the latter is said to be Victor Hugo.

Emile de Girardin has resigned the editorial management of La Presse, and it was understood that he would shortly take his departure for the United States.

In the Nievre, the Socialists, during a short ascendancy, had burned the archives of the department, and destroyed a large amount of property.

MOVEMENTS ON THE RIO GRANDE.—A dispatch from New Orleans, dated Dec. 23, says: We are in receipt of Brownsville papers to the 3d inst., which state that Gen. Carvajal attacked the Mexican General Jarregui, who had fortified himself strongly in Ceralvo, and after two days' hard fighting took nearly the whole town, driving the Mexicans into a fortified house, where they were completely penned up—all their provisions, ammunition, &c., being taken by Carvajal. The latter had ten killed, including Lieut. Graham and Capt. Chiul. Capt. Wheut was severely wounded. The Mexican loss was very great, including nearly all the Seminole Indians and their leader. The latest accounts say that Carvajal was about to attack the Mexicans in their last position. If successful, he will enter Monterey without opposition.

SUMMARY.

In Philadelphia, last Sabbath morning, there was a fire which destroyed several valuable buildings with their contents; loss $200,000. During its progress the walls of a building fell into the street, instantly killing two colored men, and severely injuring several firemen and police. There is also reason to fear that several other persons were killed, as the streets were crowded at the time the walls fell.

On the same morning there was a fire at Buffalo, the loss by which is roughly estimated at $200,000. It broke out in Spalding's Exchange Block. Spalding's Exchange, Erie Hall, the Bank of Utica, several spacious stores, and the Bank of Lake Erie, were entirely consumed. Four men were injured by the falling of a wall; one belonging to the Fire Department, seriously.

On the same morning a fire broke out in a building near the corner of Bowery and Division st., New York, which destroyed sixteen buildings, causing a loss of about $150,000. So intensely cold was the weather, that the water froze in the hose, rendering many of them entirely useless. Several of the engines became clogged up with the ice, and were broken by the firemen in attempting to use them. Several of the hydrants were so frozen up that it became necessary to kindle fires around them. Many of the firemen were severely frozen, and were obliged to leave the ground.

A serious collision occurred on the Norwich and Worcester Railroad on Thursday last, between a passenger train and the express freight train from Norwich, 2 miles from Jewett City. Both engines were smashed to pieces, and the cars badly broken. There were but a few persons in the train, and no one was killed. William E. Safford, of Norwich, had his shoulder dislocated, and Joseph Eaton, of Wilsonville, was injured internally. Several others were bruised. The collision was caused by the recklessness of the freight engineer.

Advices from the Cape of Good Hope to November 4th, state that a severe chastisement had been inflicted upon the enemy by the force under the command of Gen. Somerset. The Kaffirs, on Fish river, Bush District, have been repulsed in several skirmishes. In the Water Kloof the enemy was beaten back, after several hours hard fighting, and their camp destroyed. The British loss, amounted to forty killed and wounded. The number of Kaffirs killed is estimated at from 400 to 500.

The Savannah Republican of Dec. 18 says: The weather, for the past two days, has been the severest we have had since the year 1835. At 7 o'clock this morning the mercury, in the open air, stood only 16° above zero. The ground all the day was covered with a sheet of snow and sleet, with a sharp biting wind from the north-west. We observed several persons out skating, cutting all sorts of figures in the ice and snow, as well as any number of snow-balling parties. On Wednesday there was an alternate fall of sleet, snow, and rain—or, as a facetious old writer has it, "first it blew, then it snew, then it thew, and then it friz."

On Saturday, Dec. 20, as the train was coming to Buffalo, on the Falls Road, just after passing Tonawanda, a man employed on the road, in attempting to get on the cars, while in motion, fell and was killed by the train passing over him.

On Wednesday of last week two men, and probably three, were killed while walking on the Harlem Railroad track at Melrose, by the up train. It appears that five men were returning from work, and were walking on the track. Seeing a train approaching, they stepped upon the other track, when a train came up behind and struck them all. Two were killed outright, and one was so seriously injured that he cannot live. Another was slightly injured, and the fifth had not been found when the 7 o'clock train came in. The men lived at Morrisania and were mechanics.

We have intelligence from Montevideo to the 12th of October, in the London Morning Chronicle, from which it appears that the war is at last ended, and the siege of the city raised. There is not, it is boasted, a single man who obeys the orders of Rosas in the whole State of Uruguay. The victorious forces of Urquiza are now to be directed against the President of Buenos Ayres.

At the last meeting of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, a letter was referred to a Committee, from the citizens of Easton, asking the Board to take measures to obtain from Congress an appropriation for the improvement of the river Delaware, so as to render it navigable for sloops to Station Point, where the States of New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania unite.

In Wolfboro, N. H., the house of Wm. Tebbets was burned, and Mr. Tebbets senior perished in the flames. His wife and two sons were rescued from suffocation in a state of insensibility. A daughter and infant were badly frozen, having escaped from the fire in their night clothes.

The final and inevitable fate of all men is fast encompassing Mr. Clay. Inexorable Death moves apace toward his distinguished victim. The lion is at last driven to his lair, and he hopelessly awaits the shaft which is to terminate his career. There is hardly the shadow of a hope left.

The severity of the season has interfered sadly with travel in all parts of the northern and middle States. Besides the Delaware, the Susquehanna, the Potomac, and other streams to the south of that parallel, are either entirely closed or greatly obstructed with ice.

Col. Daniel Kilgore, formerly a Member of Congress from the State of Ohio, died Dec. 11, at Butts' Hotel, in Murray-st., New York, where he had been sick for ten days. The deceased was a man of great moral worth, and respected and highly esteemed by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance.

A dispatch from Louisville Ky., Dec. 22, says: It is reported here that four flat-boats loaded with coal, flour, produce and lumber, sank in the ice near Brandersburg. A trading boat was also smashed. The steamer John Swasey and Warren are ice-bound, and in a critical position; the latter is reported as sinking.

By a dispatch from Flint, Michigan, we learn that a very disastrous fire occurred in that place on Saturday night. An entire block, occupied by stores, was destroyed, together with a large stock of fall goods. The Post-Office was burned, but the letters and mails were saved. The loss is estimated at over $60,000.

On or about the 1st of January, 1852, W. L. Crandall proposes to issue from Syracuse, N. Y., the first number of a weekly journal, to portray the Fugitive Slave Act, and to record its past current history—in a form convenient for preservation—to be entitled the Slave-Law Examiner.

Hon. William C. Preston, of South Carolina, an eloquent member of the U. States Senate during the brilliant sessions of 1835 and 1836, and more recently President of South Carolina College, has been compelled from ill-health, (a paralytic stroke, we believe,) to give up all public employment.

DIED,

In Alfred, Dec. 21st, of consumption, ARTHUR CALLEN, in the twenty-third year of his age.

In Alfred, Dec. 22d, Mrs. SALLY MAIN, in the 69th year of her age. Sister Main was a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hebron, Potter County, Pa. She had been the subject of great bodily suffering for twelve years past, in which she enjoyed the support of the Christian faith. Sister Main had just removed to our town with her husband, proposing to take up her residence with us; but her stay was short, and she has gone, we trust, to join the saints in a happier clime. N. V. In New Market, N. J., at the house of Isaac H. Dunn, Dec. 20, ANN SKILLMAN, a colored woman, aged near 70 years. She had been all her days, until within two years, a slave. About ten years ago she professed religion, and united with the Dutch Reformed Church. She was a woman of more than ordinary intelligence in the principles and doctrines of the Bible. She was always dissatisfied with the practices of that Church, saying that she had never been baptized; but it was the only place of worship she could attend, as she was then situated. Being released from slavery by the death of her owner, she came to this place about two years since; and, after due acquaintance, was baptized and received as a member with us. She had never seen the ordinance performed until it was administered to herself. Since that time, her deportment has been an admonition and an example to us all. She was one that feared God, and loved her duty. For a long time she had been impressed that her end was near. Her house was set in order, and her end was peace. W. B. G.

Notice—Debate at Greenmanville, Ct.

THE Debate at Greenmanville, Ct., which was adjourned in June last, will be resumed again on the evening following the first Seventh-day in January, 1852, and thence be continued day and evening during a week at least.

Having been requested by many to inform them of the time, I take this opportunity of complying with their wishes. S. S. GRISWOLD.

Western Association—Executive Committee.

THE Executive Committee of the Western Association will hold its next Quarterly Session at Independence on Fourth-day evening, Jan. 7, 1852. All ministers employed by the Committee are expected to make their reports by that time. The Committee is doing whatever it can for the building up of the feeble churches, and the extension of Bible doctrine beyond our denominational limits. Relying upon the benevolence of the churches, appointments have been made involving considerable expense; and the Committee would be glad to extend their operations if men and means could be obtained.

The past operations of the Committee have been successful, adding to the number of the lovers of the Lord Jesus Christ and God's holy Sabbath. Some of the small churches, that have always depended on others for the preaching of the Gospel, have made arrangements to locate a minister, doing most for his support, and asking the Committee kindly to aid them. Others are anxious to do the same. The Committee are desirous to aid them, and could fondly wish and devoutly pray that the "brotherly kindness" of the churches would enable us to meet the earnest calls of the destitute. We ask in the name of the needy a generous contribution from all the churches and brethren in the Association. Upon the reading of this, let every one of you lay by him in store as God has prospered him, so that there shall be abundance to aid the Committee in their efforts to build up the feeble and help the destitute. Two Living Aztec Children.

A NEW AND ABSOLUTELY UNIQUE RACE OF MANKIND—The most extraordinary and inexplicable phenomena that the history of the human race has yet produced, can be seen for a few weeks at the large Exhibition Room of the Society Library, corner of Broadway and Leonard-street. They were recently taken from a newly-discovered and idolatrous people in Central America, by whom they were kept with superstitious veneration, distinct and secluded as a caste of their priesthood, and employed as Mimes and Bacchanals in their Pagan ceremonies and worship.

They are male and female. The latter measuring 29½ inches in height, weighing 17 lbs.; the former is 33 inches high, and weighs 20 lbs.

From repeated and careful examination, the best Physiologists state the older to be 12 or 13 years of age; the younger about 10 years.

They differ altogether from examples of the dwarf kind, and from children; affording complete and undeniable illustration of a Piamean variety of the Human Race!

Tickets of Admission 25 cents. Children under 10 years, half price. Season Tickets, $1 00. Doors open each day, from 11 until 1, and from 7 until 9 o'clock. dec18 4t

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co. have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

New York Type Foundry and Printers' Warehouse.

Established in 1810.

JOHN T. WHITE, No. 53 Cliff-st, corner of Beekman-st., New York, would call the attention of Editors and Printers to his varied and extensive assortment of Types, Flowers, and Ornaments, all cast of the very best metal, and finished with the greatest care, and now offered at reduced prices, on a credit of six months, and a liberal discount made for cash.

Also, Presses of the different kinds, Chases, Cases, Brass Rules, Composing Sticks, Ink, and every article required in a Printing Office, constantly on hand, at the lowest market prices.

Spanish and French orders accurately executed, with all the necessary accents, &c. This being one of the oldest and most extensive foundries in America, with a very large stock and unsurpassed assortment, orders of any magnitude can be executed without delay.

A supplement to his last Specimen Book will be issued about the 1st of November, (copies will be furnished on application,) which will contain new series of Book and News Type, of the favorite Scotch Cut, embracing light, medium, and heavy faces, the latter particularly designed for Machine Printing, surpassing any thing ever offered in this country; to which are added Metal Rule, Fancy Borders, and a great variety of new and handsome Ornamental Type.

Old Type taken in exchange for new at nine cents per pound.

Editors or Printers wishing to establish a Newspaper, Book, or Job Printing Office, will be furnished with an estimate in detail for the same by stating the size of the paper, or the particular style and quantity of the work to be executed.

_ Editors of Newspapers who will insert this advertisement three times previous to the 1st of January, 1852, and will send one copy of the paper containing the same to the Foundry, will be allowed the amount of their charge on purchasing four times its amount.

Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet.

New Series—Enlarged—January Number Ready.

WOODWORTH, determined that his Magazine shall excel all its rivals in the quantity as well as the quality of its contents, has enlarged it, so that it will hereafter contain a greater amount of reading matter for one dollar, than any other illustrated Magazine of the kind in the world. With the January number, now ready, commences an entirely new series. Each number will hereafter contain 48 pages, and will be embellished even more elegantly than before. The January number, with its handsome vignette title-page, got up with express reference to the holidays, is the most charming number we have ever issued.

The Cabinet will still be under the entire editorial control of FRANCIS C. WOODWORTH, who designs to spend a considerable portion of the year 1852, traveling in Europe. To secure all his letters from over sea, it will be necessary for new subscribers to commence with the January number, as hereafter all subscriptions must commence either in January or July; and no subscriptions will be received for less than a year.

It is unnecessary, at this late day, to tell the public what the Cabinet is. It has long had the reputation of being the "best juvenile Magazine in America—ever readable, entertaining, instructive, without any sectarianism, and free from every thing which can do harm."

Terms.

For a single copy, $1 a year; 4 copies, $3; 7 copies, $5. Cash in advance in all cases. Those who form a club of 7 copies, shall receive an extra copy for their trouble. A specimen of the January or holiday number will be sent (postage prepaid) to any part of the Union, on the receipt, in postage stamps or otherwise, of 12 cents, without expense to us.

Traveling and Local Agents Wanted.

The new series is just the thing for traveling agents and local dealers. Twenty or more agents are wanted to travel in different States, to solicit subscribers for the new series, and to sell the bound volumes of the old series or "Cabinet Library." Full particulars will be given, and specimens sent on application (post paid) with good references. Agents ought to be in the field as soon as possible. Those who are out of employment, and who wish to engage in lucrative business, and at the same time to circulate useful reading for the family circle, are particularly invited to give this agency a trial. To good agents, who will devote their time wholly or mainly to this work, the publisher will make very liberal terms.

Postmasters, Clergymen, and School Teachers, are authorized to obtain subscribers, and are allowed to retain 25 per cent on all new subscriptions, when the full price (one dollar) is paid.

Miscellaneous.

Address to Kossuth from the Novelty Works.

A large meeting of the workmen of the Novelty Iron Works, and others, was held on the evening of Dec. 11th, at which a series of resolutions were passed unanimously. Dr. Stillman, on behalf of the delegation, presented them to the illustrious Guest, with the following remarks:

SIR: I take occasion to state, that the resolutions which I have the honor to present to you emanate from a class who are chiefly engaged in the manufacture of steam machinery. They are distinguished for their intelligence and patriotism. There is no prouder class of machanics in the Empire City, and none more justly praised. They have given to their country the supremacy of the seas, through their matchless steamers, over her who boasts that she "rules the waves." We represent more particularly the workmen of the Novelty Works, about 1,000 strong, the employees of an establishment which subscribed the first stock to the first line of American ocean mail steamers, and within five years has added twenty first class ocean steamers to our steam navigation.

Whereas, There has come to America, Louis Kossuth, Governor of Hungary, representing that nation in an appeal to the United States for assistance against the armed and unwarrantable interference of despotic Governments in their domestic affairs; and as we firmly believe that the representations of Louis Kossuth are true and correct, and that the question involves the interests of civil liberty every where; and as we recognize the great truth, that only by such liberty can the full development of national greatness, and thereby the perfect standard of humanity, be attained; therefore—

Resolved, That we saw with exultation the beacon fires of freedom lit up by Louis Kossuth and his associates in the far interior of Europe's Continent, and amid the surrounding gloom of despotism; we witnessed with hope their heroic efforts against "leagued oppression," and with pain and indignation that their betrayed but noble cause found no generous friend; but, while we grieve for Hungary, we rejoice that her Kossuth is free, and that her cause has become the cause of Europe's oppressed nations, the cause of humanity, and therefore the cause of God.

Resolved, That while we cordially welcome to our shores and homes the heroes who have dared to follow the example of our forefathers, we would not be unmindful of the invaluable boon granted to us in the hour of our need by a brother's helping hand; and while we reverence the name of Washington, we believe that the great American nation has passed the age of its minority and is able to look the future boldly in the face, unembarrassed by formulas of the past. Every age must be the arbiter of its own duties, and God forbid that while we are in the full enjoyment of all the blessings of freedom, and the confidence of invulnerable strength which that freedom inspires, we should refuse to hear the cry of our brothers in Hungary. We have no sympathy with the selfish and cowardly spirit that tells us we must not jeopardize our slothful ease by aiding our brethren struggling for national existence, and which fears a war if we dare to be just. Having no intercourse with the representatives of despots, we have no fear of or sympathy for their masters; as we owe to civil liberty all our present national greatness, we have incurred a debt that we can only repay by giving our strongest influence to the extension of that liberty to other nations situated as we once were; and as we stand indebted to the past for blood and treasure expended in securing the blessings we enjoy, we should be ready to repay, if necessary, that debt to the future.

Resolved, That in the doctrine of non-intervention, by which we understand the non-interference by one nation in the internal affairs of another, we recognize a policy that is as necessary to our own domestic peace and undisturbed relations with our neighbors, as to the peace of the world and the cause of human rights. Having become fully convinced, by reflection and argument, that this doctrine is true and just, we do solemly pledge ourselves to use all legal means to make this doctrine the policy of the nation.

Resolved, That we will petition Congress to declare the adherence of the United States to the doctrine of non-intervention in the internal affairs of other nations, and that they will endeavor to make respected this doctrine by other Governments.

Sir, allow the Committee, in conculsion, to express their high admiration for you, Hungary's chief, as a statesman, a patriot, and a hero, and whether it shall be your fortune to see your country free, to fall in the front of her battles, or to hang where they did hang your honored name, we say to you—Onward in your glorious mission! The eyes of the myriads of all lands are upon you—the spirits of your country's martyrs are over you—your immortal Bathyani, Bem, Aulich, Damianich, and a mighty host of your country's unnamed demi-gods, have preceded you, and your fate will be no less glorious than theirs. We firmly believe that the day of man's restoration to his natural and inalienable rights is not far off—that your country has not a very distant future.

"Yes, thy proud lord's unpitying band shall see
That man hath yet a soul and dare be free.
A little while along thy saddening plains
The starless night of desolation reigns;
Truth shall restore the light by nature given,
And, like Prometheus, bring the fire from heaven.
Prone to the dust oppression shall be hurled;
Her name, her nature, withered from the world."

Governor Kossuth replied: Gentlemen, I have listened with great interest to the principles and sentiments in your resolutions. I beg leave to assure you that from no class of people in the United States do I more dearly prize sympathy than from that of the working men. I thank you for these resolutions which you have offered, and the great interest you manifest in Hungary's cause. I hope when you present your resolutions to Congress—which you give me the hope that you will—you will petition Congress not only to endeavor to do something, but not to admit foreign interference with the domestic concerns of whatever country. Because, happily, the United States are in a condition to be such a mighty, such a powerful people, that, in a just cause, she stands not only in a position to endeavor to do something, but in a position to demand non-inteference. It is a great calling—a noble, proud calling of such a great nation as yours to check such interference. It is no word for the United States to endeavor. They must not endeavor—they must do. [Applause.] Because, animated by such principles and such feelings as you have expressed, they should elevate their will to the level of their principles; and then there is no longer such a word as endeavor.

M. Kossuth then shook hands with the delegation. On receiving his hand, one of the delegation said, "We do not intend that our sympathy shall be shown only by words; we have among us some of the sinews of war, which we shall bestow when your Bank is open to receive it." M. Kossuth received this remark with a smile, and a most hearty shake of the hand, saying that he hoped that the last remark would prove true. One of the delegation was then introduced to Kossuth with the remark, that he was one of his country-man, whom they had taken under their protection, and hoped to keep until he wanted him to fight, when they would send him to Hungary. The great Magyar then held a short conversation in his native tongue with the delegate; and the delegation withdrew.

Seventh Census of the United States.

The following facts in relation to the population of the United States are from a report resently furnished by the Cencus Office:—

The seventh enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States exhibits results which every citizen of the country may contemplate with gratification and pride. Since the census of 1840 there have been added to the territory of the Republic, by annexation, conquest, and purchase, 635,988 square miles, and our title to regions covering 341,463 square miles, which before properly belonged to us, but was claimed, and partially occupied by a foreign power, has been established by negotiation, and it has been brought within our acknowledged boundaries. By such means, the area of the United States has been extended during the past ten years from 2,055,163 to 3,221,595 square miles, without including the great Lakes which lie upon our Northern border, or the Bays, which indentate our Atlantic and Pacific shores; all which has come within the scope of the seventh census.

In the endeavor to ascertain the progress of our population since 1840, it will be proper to deduct from the aggregate number of inhabitants shown by the present Census, the population of Texas in 1840, and the number embraced within the limits of California, and the new Territories at the time of their acquisition. From the best information which has come to hand, it is believed that Texas contained, in 1840, 75,000 inhabitants, and that when California, New Mexico, and Oregon came into our possession in 1846, they had a population of 97,000. It thus appears that we have received by additions of Territory since 1840, an accession of 172,000 to the number of our people.

The increase which has taken place in those extended regions since they came under the authority of our Government should obviously be received as a part of the development and progress of our population; nor is it necessary to complicate the comparison by taking ito account the probable natural increase of this acquired population, because we have not the means of dstermining the rate of its advancement nor the law which governed its progress while yet beyond the influence of our political system. The year 1840, rather than he date of our enumeration of Texas, has been taken for estimating her population in connection with that of the Union, because it may be safely assumed that whatever the increase during the five intervening years may have been, it was mainly, if not altogether, derived from the United States.

Owing to delays and difficulties mentioned in completing the work, which no action on the part of this office could obviate, some of the returns from California have not yet been received.

Assuming the population of California to be 165,000, (which we do partly by estimate), and omitting that of Utah, estimated at 15,000, the total number of inhabitants in the United States was, on the 1st of June, 1850, 23,246,301.

The absolute increase from the 1st of June, 1840, has been 6,176,848, and the actual increase per cent. is 36.18. But it has been shown that the probable amount of population acquired by additions to territory should be deducted in making a comparison between the results of the present and the last census. These deductions reduce the total population of the country as a basis of comparison, to 23,074,301, and the increase to 6,004,848. The relative increase after this allowance, is found to be 35.17 per cent. The aggregate number of whites in 1850, was 19,619,366, exhibiting again upon the number of the same class in 1840, of 5,423,371, and a relative increase of 38.20 per cent. But excluding the 153,000 free population supposed to have been acquired by the addition of territory since 1840, the gain is 5,270,371, and the increased per cent. 37.14. The number of slaves by the present census is 3,198,298, which shows an increase of 711,085, equal to 28.58 per cent. If we deduct 19,000 for the prolable slave population in Texas in 1840, the result of the comparison will be slightly different. The absolute increase will be 692,085, and the rate per cent. 27.83.

The number of free colored in 1850 was 428,637, in 1840, 386,245. The increase of this class has been 42,392, or 10.95 per cent.

From 1830 to 1840 the increase of the whole population was, at the rate of 32.67 per cent. At the same rate of advancement, the absolute gain for the ten years last past would have been 5,578,333 or 426,510 less than it has been, without including the increase consequent upon additions of Territory.

The aggregate increase of population from all sources, shows a relative advance greater than that of any other decimal term, except that from the second to the third census, during which time the country received an accession of inhabitants by the purchase of Louisiana, considerably greater than one per cent. of the whole number. Rejecting from the Census of 1810, 1.45 per cent, for the population of Louisiana, and from the Census of 1850, 1 per cent. for that of Texas, California, &c., the result is in favor of the last ten years by about one-fourteenth of one per cent.; the gain from 1800 to 1810 being 35.05 per cent., and from 1840 to 1850, 35.12 per cent. But without going behind the sum of the returns, it appears that the increase from the second to the third Census was thirty-two hundreths of one per cent. greater than from the sixth to the seventh.

Packing Pork.

BY A PORK INSPECTOR.

This being about the time that the farmers kill and prepare their pork for market, and as a great deal of it is reduced in value by being improperly bled and cut up, I think it would be a great advantage, both to themselves and the buyers, were they to attend to the following rules:—

1st. They must not kill the pigs by striking them on the heads, as is too often done, thereby rendering the pork unsaleable, but cut their throats and allow them to bleed freely.

2d. With regard to cutting up the pig into pieces fit for barreling, it should be laid on a block with its back to the person who is to cut it, who will first cut off the nose in a line with the back part of the mouth, then the head in a line with the ears; make a cut of the neck immediately before the shoulders; the head to be split into four pieces and the neck into two. Make a cut of the shoulders about five inches wide; split the cut through the backbone and across. Cut off the feet above the knee-joint, and nick the bone close by the body. The whole pig is to be cut into strips about five inches wide, which again are to be cut across into pieces, of at least four pounds weight; the hams to be done with in the same manner as the shoulders.

3d. The barrel to be of good seasoned oak, well hooped, with a bung-hole in the centre of a stave. The size of the barrel to be eighteen and a half inches in diameter (outside measure) at the head, and the full length of the staves twenty-nine inches.

4th. In packing, spread a layer of salt, about an inch deep, over the bottom of the barrel, then a layer of pork set upon edge, again a layer of salt and pork alternately, till the whole is packed, leaving out the rib-pieces for the top layer; leaving out the feet, tongue, brains, head, tail, and nose. When packed, head the barrel tightly, which turn on its side, and pour into the bung-hole, till the barrel is full, a strong pickle made be dissolving salt in cold water, till it is strong enough to float a potato, then plug up the bung-hole.

5th. Be careful to choose St. Ubes or Turk's Island salt, of which there is a large quantity in market; and it will enhance the value of your pork at least from 3s. 9d to 5s. per barrel. The pork of this country already stands first in the market, and commands a higher price and a readier sale than other which attempts to compete with it; but it may itself improve by attending to the above rules; and were they adhered to, a great deal of the pork that is now obliged to be sold for prime, might be branded prime mess, which would command a cash market at an advance of at least two dollars on the barrel, (the difference between the price of the two qualities;) and it is as easy to kill, cut up, and pack a barrel in a proper manner as otherwise, when the operator knows how.

Bird Music Extraordinary.

A curious circumstance, quite aside from the ordinary dictates of instinct, occurred in the case of a young bobolink, in the family of the Rev. J. W. Turner, of Great Barrington, Massachusetts. He was caged, at first, apart from a pair of canaries, which were in another cage in the same room. The bobolink never sang at all from June to December, until he was permitted to share in the same cage the civilities and sympathies of his neighbors, the canaries, who had been so long entertaining him with their sweet and unwearied strains. When admitted to the same cage with them, he tried most assiduously to learn their song, at first, however, for a long time, with miserable success enough. He would stand and watch them in an agony of attention, and then try to imitate their notes. He would swell out his throat, and stretch up his neck as they did, and then, with a violent effort, try to sound one note, which, in spite of all his zeal and labor, proved to be a mere rough scream. At this humiliating failure, he would be so provoked and enraged, that he would fly at his inoffensive and well-meaning mates and teachers, and peck them most unmercifully, and drive them from their perch. So he did for three or four weeks, before any apparent progress was made in his studies. But his perseverance was equal to the difficulties he had to overcome. At length he could sound one note well, and one only. And so he continued for six weeks longer; learning one note at a time, till he finally completed the whole canary song, and could sing it to perfection. Then he would sing with them in perfect harmony and perfect time, always closing at the exact note with them.

It is also a little singular, that although, through all this training, he was never known to begin to make a sound till the canaries had first struck the key-note, yet, after he had acquired the skill to sing their song, he must always himself now give the signal by a significant cluck, when, instantly, the canaries, generously forgetting or forgiving his former incivilities, would strike in with him, and perform the piece with the greatest perfection, and with the highest delight to themselves and the listening family, who enjoyed this singular concert through the early part of every day for the whole summer.

It is also worthy of remark, that this successful essayist in foreign music was never known to utter a note, or to attempt to utter a note in his native tongue, till he had mastered the canary. Then, after a few weeks, when he found himself something of an independent singer, and capable, as he thought, of leading the choir, he at last ventured to go without the chorus, and attempt his own native melody. In his first attempts at the solo, it was most diverting to hear him in confused notes, part in his native bobolink, and part in canary, till at length he was able to expel all foreign element from his style, and sing only the pure bobolink.

Having now succeeded in this, he proposed to the canaries to try the chorus again, and gave the "cluck," when the canaries, instant to the sign, started off singing their own native song. But not so the bobolink; he threw himself on his "reserved rights" and sang bobolink; and so they have continued to the present time, he singing bobolink, and they canary. And as he is the chorister, they begin when he does, and end when he ends, precisely at the same instant.

When this bobolink was first caught, his colors were a bright, beautiful black and white. After moulting, he, for some reason not stated, never resumed his original spring dress, but has continued the plain brown, like the female, now for two years; and sings in the winter as well as in the summer, especially when the sun shines brightly, and the winds whistle in the trees around the dwelling; and now, since his character is matured, he is a sprightly, happy, gentlemanly sort of bird.

[Boston Traveler.

THE CHEROKEE INDIANS.—The St. Louis Daily Union gives the following account of the progress of this tribe in practical civilization:—

The attempt to civilize and improve hss been more successful among the Cherokees than any of the other nations. They have gone on steadily improving, until they can compare favorably with many of the civilized nations. Their progress in all that pertains to intellectual improvement, as well as in all that concerns their government and business transactions, is truly surprising. But a few years ago they were wild and ignorant as any of the other tribes, and now they have made considerable advance in learning—print their own paper—invented their own alphabet by which to print—conduct all the different branches of commerce, agriculture, &c., on the plan adopted among us—have their advertisements, schools, societies, &c., formed after the model set them by the people to whom they look for example. But in strict honesty they afford and example worthy of imitation by those who consider themselves as belonging to a superior race. As an example of the honesty of this people, we may state that when the payment was made to the "old settlers," the first use they made of any part of it was to pay every cent they owed, even though this payment should absorb every cent to their "per capita."

A CENTENNIAL FAMILY PARTY.—On last Thanksgiving day most of the descendants of Capt. Lawrence, one of the first settlers of the town of Canada, assembled together in the house built by him just 100 years ago. The stepping-stone at the door bears the date of his arrival, with the names of his family, and the date of the building inscribed upon it. The house, it is said, is yet substantial, and likely to stand the test of another century. Seventy-five of the family met. They read family prayers, compared family records, and inserted their names on a record to be presented at the next centenary. A pamphlet embracing all the details of the meeting, and other facts connected with the family history, is shortly to be published, and the present representative of the family, Frederick Lawrence, requests all the descendants of Capt. Lawrence, in any part of the Union, to furnish him with their names and histories, in order that this pamphlet may be as full as possible.

CHINESE COMPASS.—Capt. Lee, of the schooner Elizabeth, which arrived recently at New York from San Francisco, brought a curiosity of the most rare and interesting character. This was the compass that was taken by the Captain of the bark Auckland from the Japanese junk, the crew of which vessel, with some of its effects, were taken and conveyed into San Francisco, as before reported. Capt. Jennings, of the Auckland, having been a school-fellow of Capt. Lee, presented him with this singular piece of mechanism, as a token of esteem and memento of former times. Instead of a floating card like that of the mariner's compass, it has a needle similar to our surveyor's little pocket compass needles. It has the different points marked on the top of the box in Japanese characters—these being 16 in number. Capt. Lee designs sending it to Washington, to be placed in the cabinet of curiosities in the Patent Office.

THE DOGS OF KAMSCHATKA.—A late book says of them:—

"These docile and intelligent animals are used by the natives to perform all the labor of cattle and horses. Indeed, no other domestic animal could live in that bleak and cold region. The dogs are companions and bed-fellows of their masters, and are more intelligent even than the most knowing dogs among us Christians. To protect their feet from snow and ice, socks of fur skins are made for these dogs; and it seems they appreciate this attention; for a dog always whines out his joy at having a new set of socks, as a child would rejoice at a new suit of clothes."

DEFERRED SUMMARY.

Among the incidents attending the consummation of the late treaty between the United States and the wild Indians of Mexico, was the release of 27 Mexican captives, who had been held in savage servitude for periods ranging from six weeks to ten years. These captives consist of two women, two little girls, and twenty-three boys. The ages of the latter vary from nine years up to seventeen, and they are spoken of as a sprightly and intellectual set of little fellows. They are now in the possession of Col. Rodgers, ready to be transferred to the Mexican authorities, or restored to their parents.

Late accounts from Jamaica represent that the cholera, instead of being on the decline, was extending its ravages in many parts of the Island. The Morning Journal says: "From all parts of the country our accounts are lamentable; the peasantry are again being swept off, and the disease is spreading fearfully, while the violence with which it acts leaves but little time for the beneficial application of medicine. At Montenegro Bay, the town is infected in all quarters. At Leith Estate, the mortality has been very great—death carrying off its 30 or 40 victims daily from that property and neighboring estates.

The telegraph announces the decease of Hon. Joel R. Poinsett, formerly Secretary of War, under the Presidency of Mr. Van Buren, and at an earlier period Minister Plenipotentiary to Mexico, during the administration of John Quincy Adams. His death took place at his residence in Statesburg, South Carolina, on Friday, December 12, at the venerable age of seventy-three years.

The St. Louis papers state that the Pacific Railroad is being prosecuted with more regularity and vigor than at any former time since its commencement. The Company has now in its employ 950 workmen, which number it is intended to increase.

The mortgages which were deposited by the James Bank as security for its notes, were for an aggregate amount of $50,536, and sold at Albany on Wednesday for $29,475, a loss of 40 per cent. Those for the New Rochelle Bank were for $66,043, and sold for $37,400, a loss of 45 per cent., showing that with all the caution of the Controller in taking mortgages, they are not a sufficient security. The Bank Law should be amended, entirely excluding mortgages from the Bank Superintendent's office.

The Legislature of Vermont, at its recent session, enacted a law forbidding the employment of conductors, engineers, brakemen, or switchmen, "who shall make or use intoxicating liquors as a beverage." The employment of such a person, with the knowledge of the President, Superintendent, or any of the Directors, exposes the company to prosecution, and a fine of $300 to $3,000, besides being liable for all damages that may result.

The Fort Smith Herald of the 21st ult. announces the death of Brigadier-General William G. Belknap, of the Fifth Infantry. He was on his way to Fort Gibson, on sick leave, when he became prostrated by disease, and died before he could reach that point, where his family was awaiting him.

Mr. Charles Cheney, of Newburyport, has a tankard presented to Mrs. Hannah Dunstin, of Haverhill, by King William, in 1696, for her courageous conduct in the massacre of ten indians, by whom she was taken captive. The tankard bears the portrait of King William, supported by the lion and the unicorn.

C. M. Sanderson, Postmaster at West Randolph, Vermont, has been detected in committing depredations upon the mails, and has been arrested. This will explain the loss of several valuable letters from that quarter, addressed to citizens of Boston and other places.

The Commonwealth newspaper, Boston, has been sold to Mr. Elizur Wright and two other gentlemen, and it is announced that it "will no longer be responsible for the Free Soil party, nor the Free Soil party for it." Mr. Charles List is to be associated in the editorial management.

In the United States Circuit Court, in New York, last week, the case of Messrs. Beardsley vs. Lewis Tappan, a case which had occupied the attention of the Court upward of twenty days, was brought to a close by the Jury rendering a unanimous verdict for the Plaintiffs. Damages $10,000.

A son of D. A. Loomis, of Adrian, about 17 years of age, fell from a pole above the top of the new Union School House in Adrian. He fell over 40 feet, and then struck upon the joists above the second story. Save some severe bruises, he escaped without material injury.

The last year 109,210 copies of the Scriptures were circulated in France, chiefly through the agency of the British and Foreign Bible Society. In this work 75 colporteurs were employed at an average charge, including wages and expences, of a little less than $150.

The weight of a barrel of flour should be at least 214 pounds. Flour barrels, to be servicable, generally weigh 20 and even 22 pounds, to which must always be added 196 pounds of flour, which would make the gross weight of a barrel of flour 216 or 218 pounds.

At the late term of the United States District Court, held at Iowa city, Isaac Sloan was convicted of using post office stamps a second time, and sentenced to pay fifty dollars and three cents damages. This is the first instance of the kind under the new law.

In Boston, on Friday afternoon last, Mr. Ellis, a broker, occupying an office at No. 16 State st., was robbed of $4,000 in bills and gold. The thief snatched it from the counter and fled, while Mr. E. was preparing to close the office. The robber has been arrested.

Daguerrean Gallery.
GURNEY'S Daguerrean Gallery, No. 189 Broadway, has been known for years as one of the first establishments of the kind in the United States, and the oldest in the city of New York. He has recently greatly enlarged his Gallery by the addition of more rooms and large skylights, and other improvements, rendering it one of the most extensive establishments in this country. Mr. G. attends personally to his sitters, and from his great experience in the art he is enabled, at all times, to give perfect satisfaction. The large-sized pictures recently taken by his new process are universally acknowledged superior to any heretofore taken in this country. A large collection can be seen at all hours of the day. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to examine them.

The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.
" Second " Dec. 3 " " March 16.
" Third " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one of two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term. Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.
Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS.

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00
Drawing,	1 00
Monochromatic Painting	3 00
Oil Painting,	5 00
Writing and Stationery,	0 50
Vocal Music, Elementary,	1 00
Advanced Class,	2 00
Instrumental Music,	8 00

Use of Organ or Piano, $2 00 per quarter.
BOARD, in private families, per week, from $1 25 to $1 50; in clubs, from 60 to 90 cents.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall Term, and at the middle of the Winter Term, and continue seven weeks. The course will embrace a thorough review of the common school branches, with daily lectures on "The Art of Teaching," Chemistry, Physiology, Laws of Health, School Laws, &c., &c. Tuition $2 50.

Students should not be furnished with unnecessary pocket-money, neither should minors be allowed to contract debts in the village. Either member of the Faculty will superintend the financial affairs of pupils placed under their care, by special direction from parents and guardians, if funds are furnished in advance.

KOSSUTH ON RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

One evening during Kossuth's stay in New York, the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher's church in Brooklyn was opened for a speech from the great Hungarian. Tickets for admission had been sold at $5 each, and the large edifice was nearly filled. The speech related in part to the question of religious liberty, and in part to the practical purposes of the orator's mission. It was received with great enthusiasm.

Dr. Bethune prayed at the opening of the meeting. Mr. Beecher then, in a brief speech, introduced Kossuth to the audience. Kossuth rose amid great applause, and spoke for over an hour. We give below extracts from the speech, relating to the matter of religious liberty, believing that our readers will be glad to know the views entertained on this subject by the Hungarian leader, and to understand how the religious liberties of Europe are connected with the Hungarian question:—

I consider it a truth, that the Christian religion is for everlasting the true source of liberty for mankind upon this earth. The great principle which our Saviour taught is a principle of equality before God. He who said that his Kingdom was not of earth, not only taught us the means of salvation, but by proclaiming this great principle, He provided for mankind's being free and equal in their earthly existence—to be all free—equally free here to enjoy the benefits of nature, for they are equally called by our Lord to share the greatest and the last destiny of mankind—bliss in heaven. I am fully convinced that the next great event of our period is to bring about a new reformation of Christianity—not in respect of doctrines, but in those great principles of Christianity which teach us to "love our neighbors as we love ourselves"—and that they may and will be exercised out of private life. That will be the new development of Christianity, giving not only the hope of bliss to man in heaven, but also giving them liberty here on earth. [Applause.]

The cause of Hungary is strongly connected with that principle, and it is also strongly connected with the principle of religious liberty on earth. You will permit me to cast some few glances back to the history of Hungary in that respect. In the first part of the sixteenth century, the battle of Mohacz was fought in Hungary, when the power of my nation was by the Moslems overthrown. Then the nation—the country being then an elective kingdom—divided into two parties, the one party electing to the kingly throne of Hungary a Hungarian by the name of Zapoly, who was in the high position of Governor of one part of Hungary, Transylvania; and the other party, influenced by Austrian interests, electing Ferdinand, one of the house of Hapsburgh to be King of Hungary. That was an unhappy act. Well, these two parties being thus divided, and being about of equal strength, a long struggle ensued, the result of which was that the princes, or, as they were called, maimodes of Translyvania invoked Turkish help for themselves against the House of Austria. It is a curious circumstance that religious liberty was so often oppressed by the House of Austria, that actually these princes of Transylvania, who were almost, if not subjects, vassals of the Turkish Emperors, rose several times and led on Hungary to fight against the House of Austria for religious liberty. Here there was entire religious liberty established in Transylvania under the supremacy of the Emperor of Turkey, while in the other part of Hungary, where the Austrians ruled, there were eternal prosecutions which several times went so far as to induce my people to take up arms. It is true, that in the hour of its need, the House of Austria, coupled at any time with the wishes of the nation, which was ever ready generously to lay down the sword in the moment of victory, where the aim of the struggle seemed to be attained. But as soon as the Hungarians laid down the sword, the House of Austria proved faithless to its word, and treacherous to its arrangements. So it was that in Transylvania religious liberty was established. Then the Catholic church, the Greek church, the Lutheran church, the Unitarian church, all were tolerated, whereas religious liberty in other parts of Hungary, which were under Austrian rule, although secured by several pacifications and treaties, on which the conferred power of Austria was based, continued to be oppressed whenever the slightest opportunity offered. So far was this carried that in the middle of the last century, under Maria Theresa, all who belonged not to the Catholic Confession in Hungary, were entirely excluded from almost all civil rights, unless they pronounced an oath, which according to their creed they could not pronounce. They were, therefore, almost entirely excluded, and this, too, notwithstanding by the terms of treaties, and by several victories and pacifications, religious liberty and equality of creeds had been secured. Again, when Joseph, who was in that respect a tolerant man, and who gave religious freedom to all in Hungary—succeeded Maria Theresa, scarcely was he in his grave, and the Emperor Francis elected King of Hungary, than the persecution of religious liberty was again commenced in Hungary. It was only in 1848, that religious liberty was entirely secured to whatever creed of whatever part of the people. It is, therefore, one peculiar fact of our past struggle, that we established, while it was going on, equality of rights, and equal liberty to every religious conviction throughout the country. Whenever the Austrian has taken up arms against those laws, they have taken up arms absolutely against religious liberty in Hungary.

That is the effect; the consequences I will show. I, for instance, belong by birth and conviction to the Lutheran Protestant church. That church is quite a democratical institution in Hungary. Every man who resided in a village or city, could have the right of participating in the election of Minister, and for a civil Inspector. Again, in a district which we call Seignories, every citizen had the right to participate in the election of a senior Minister, and for a senior civil Inspector. Again, several of these districts united form a superintendency, and every man who belonged to the church, and lived in the superintendency, participated in the election of a superintendency civil inspector. Again, there was elected a common civil Inspector, or rather a general civil Inspector—because we do not like the idea of having anything like a Pope—in whose election every man belonging to the church shared. And we had yearly one, and if the exigency required it, at two several times, a general meeting, in which meeting the general Inspector of the church was elected, on the basis of universal suffrage. Every one participated in these meetings who belonged to the church. That was truly a democratical institution. There we provided for the necessities of our civil and religious education, and there was full freedom. These things now are entirely unknown there; and it is the House of Austria which disposes now of the institutions of education, and of the condition of every church throughout the land. Therefore, I have full right to say, that the cause of Hungary is the cause of religious liberty, and that the existence of the House of Austria is the existence of persecutions to religious liberty throughout Europe. (Applause.)

My principles, and the principles which I consider to be the principles of the majority of my nation also, and which we, with the blessing of God and the aid of free nations, will yet carry out—my principles in respect of religious interest are two; one is, that the church shall not meddle with politics, and the other, that the government shall not meddle with religion. (Tremendous cheers.)

The following, to men of peace, from the latter part of Kossuth's speech, is a sample of the occasional outbursts with which he carries away his hearers. He had been showing how the props of Austria will fall, one after another, before the power of re-armed Hungary. He adds:

But I am told there are men of peace who say after all, "This is very true, or very fine, if you please; but we will have peace at any price." Now I say many things in the world depend upon a true definition. It is not true; they are men who would conserve at every price, the present condition. Is the present condition peace? Is the scaffold peace? the scaffold, on which in Lombardy the blood of 3,742 patriots was shed during three short years? Is that peace? Is the prison of Austria, filled with patriots, peace? the blunt murmurs of the discontented nations peace? I believe the Lord has not created the world to be in such a peaceful condition. (Great applause.) He has not created it to be a prison of humanity. No; the present condition is not peace. It is a condition of oppression on the European continent; and because it is the condition of oppression, it cannot be peace, because so long as men, as nations are oppressed, so long men and nations are discontented. And so long as men and nations are discontented, there cannot be tranquility. It can be but a volcano, boiling everlastingly, and at the slightest opportunity breaking out again and demolishing all artificial props of tranquility, and those interests which rely upon tranquility. Europe is continually a great battle-field; a great barrack. Such is the condition of Europe; and therefore let me not see those who, professing to be men of peace, will not help oppressed liberty, because they will have peace. Let me tell them, on the contrary, this condition is not the peace in which they are interested. The oppression of nations is what they are interested in, because the present condition is not peace, but is oppression. With me and my principles is peace, because I will faithfully conserve the principles of liberty; and it is only upon that principle that nations can be contented; and only with the contentment of nations can there be peace on earth. (Great applause.) With me and my principles is peace, lasting peace, consistent peace. With the tyrants of the world is only oppression, struggle, war, and continual boiling of volcanic fires. (Applause.)

ALWAYS HAPPY.

In France, not many years ago, there lived a young lad, who had arrived at that age at which it is necessary to make choice of some occupation by which to earn his living, and who was intensely desirous of choosing that which would most contribute to his happiness in the world. He was not an ambitious youth; he did not wish to be great, or wise, or rich, but only happy. His parents had chosen a trade for him, but it did not please him. He wished to be a chemist; the reason of his wish was, that in the neighborhood lived a chemist and druggist, a cheerful and amiable man, whose pleasant face and constant good humor inspired our young friend with the idea that the employment of a chemist must needs be a very happy one. The lad's choice was not agreeable to his parents; they did all they possibly could to dissuade him from it, but in vain; so he was placed with the chemist. Experience, however, soon taught him that which he would not learn from his friends, namely, "that it does not follow that a person must be happy because he is a chemist." He soon found that the cheerfulness and contentment of his master were not necessarily connected with his bottles and drugs. He himself was neither cheerful, nor contented, nor happy. So, after a time he gave up the idea of being a chemist, and consented to follow the employment his friends thought best for him, living the same sort of life that people usually do, neither better nor happier than they. Still, he never quite forgot the idea of his youth, and always longed for some sort of happiness above what he possessed.

One day he overtook a poor colporteur, (a man who carries about books for sale,) who was trudging gayly along, and singing by the way. He had a pack of things to sell. "Can you sell me," says our friend, "the secret of being happy?" "Why, yes, I can," said the man, letting down his pack; "and cheap, too," he continued, taking out a book and presenting it; "this will teach you how to be happy." It was the Bible. Our friend had asked the question much as Pilate asked our Lord, "What is truth;" he neither expected nor desired an answer. He, however, took the book. He read it. After some time spent in patient seeking, he found that it had, indeed, the power of communicating the secret of happiness; and he walked in the pleasant ways of the Lord. He afterwards became, what he still is, the pastor of a Protestant church in Switzerland.

THE BORDERERS.

Religion and the world used formerly to be considered as two different regions, situated separate and apart from each other. They seldom maintained much unnecessary intercourse. One party shuddered at the strictness and severity of the other; which, in its turn, kept aloof from a communication which it feared might contaminate its own purity. Between them lay a kind of neutral ground, which, though it divided them, was occasionally passed during any short interval of peace, for offices of necessity, business, or kindness; which nevertheless produced at no time entire reconciliation.

This neutral territory has lately been seized upon and occupied by a third party, (a kind of go-betweens,) who are civil, obliging, and accommodating people, who are so perfectly well bred, as to be desirous of keeping on friendly terms with their neighbors on both sides of the borders. They are invited to intimacy by the gratification held out by the one, and the reputation conferred by the other. Present indulgences tempt on the left—future hope on the right. The present good, however, is generally too powerful a competitor for the future. They not only struggle to maintain their own interests in both countries, but are kindly desirous of accommodating all differences between the belligerent powers. Their situation, as borderers, gives them great local advantages on both sides. Though they keep on good terms with both, they have the useful and engaging talent of seeming to belong exclusively to that party in which they happen to find themselves. Their chief difficulty arises, when they happen to meet the inhabitants of both countries together; yet they are so ingenious in the art of time-serving, that they manage so as to lose no ground with either. When alone with one party, they are careful never to speak warmly of the absent. With the world, they smile, and perhaps good-naturedly shake their heads at some little scruples, or some excess of strictness in the absent party; though they do not go the length of actual censure. When with the religious colony, they tenderly lament the necessity imposed on them of being obliged to associate so much with neighbors from whom, they confess, there is not much to be learned, while, they own, there is something to be feared. But as they are quite sure their inclinations are dissimilar to their neighbors, they trust there is no great danger. They regret, that as they must live on terms with the world, they cannot, without a singularity to which ridicule would be attached, avoid adopting some of their manners and customs. Thus they think it prudent to indulge in the same habits of luxury and expense—to conform to many of the same practices, doubtful at best—and to attend at some places of diversion, for which, indeed, they profess to feel no great relish, and which, for the sake of propriety, are rather submitted to than enjoyed. "One should not be too particular—one does no good by singularity." Thus, by an invariable discretion, they gain the confidence and regard of both parties. The old settlers on the fashionable side are afraid of losing them by opposition to their occasionally joining their enemies; while the religious colonists are desirous of retaining their confidence, by rendering them service and kindness, and charitably hoping that their intentions are good, and their compliance reluctant. Thus their borders are every day extending, and their population increasing. As they can speak the language of both countries, they have the advantage of appearing to be always at home with each; who never suspect that the same facility in the dialect of the other, equally secures there popularity there. In one respect, they carefully comply with the Apostle's injunction; they "let their moderation be known to all men." They scrupulously avoid extremes. They keep a kind of debtor and credit account with religion and the world—punctually paying themselves for some practice renounced, by adopting some other which is a shade or two lighter. Between these shades, they discriminate nicely; and the pride they feel in what they have given up, is more sincere than the gratification of what they retain. Thus, though hovering on the borders of both countries, they seldom penetrate into the depths of either. The latitude in which they happen to be cast, varies according to circumstances. An awakening sermon will drive them for a time beyond the usual geographical degree; an amusing novel, or new canto of Childe Harold, will seduce them to retreat. Their intentions, however, they flatter themselves, are generally on the right side, while their movements are too frequently on the opposite. Though their language can accommodate itself to both parties, their personal appearance is entirely under the direction of one of them. In their external decorations, they are not behind the foremost of their fashionable friends; and truth obliges us reluctantly to confess, that their dress is as little confined within the bounds of strict delicacy, as that of women the rest of whose conduct is more exceptionable. The consequence is not unnatural, for, to those who must do like others, it is also necessary to look like other people. It does, however, seem a little incongruous, to hear the language of one of the countries spoken with a strong accent, by ladies in the costume of the other.

These borderers are frequently disposed to be benevolent; partly from a warm temperament, and partly from a conviction that charity is a duty. They profess to give whatever they can spare; but of that proportion, they allow vanity, not piety, to be the arbiter. If personal ornament or habits of luxury did not swallow up their money, charity would have it; for that is the next best thing to self-gratification. Should they continue their present course, and their numbers increase—or, as is commonly the case, should continual motion accelerate progress, the landmarks of separation between the several countries will insensibly be lost, and it will be difficult to define the exact limitations of the invading neighbors. It has frequently been regretted, that an amicable accommodation between the adverse parties could not be accomplished by the interference of the inhabitants of this intermediate region; but when it has been attempted, it has not always been successful. The coalition, it has been found, could not readily be made. Prejudices on the one part, and rigorous demands on the other, have hitherto perpetuated the separation. Terms of peace, it is true, are not easily made, where one side expects so many sacrifices, and where the other has so much that must be parted with. The worldly territory having beyond all comparison the larger population, is of course the stronger, and therefore most likely to hold out. Although no flag of truce has yet been sent out for a general peace, yet alliances are frequently made by individuals of the hostile countries; but on very unequal terms; for it unfortunately happens, that the party from the more correct side, "who come out to visit the daughters of the land," have been seduced by the cheerful music, splendid banners, and gay attractions of the other, and have been prevailed upon to settle in the enemies' camp. To them it more frequently happens, that they gradually forget all they learned in their father's house, and insensibly adopt the manners of the strange country, than that they bring over the other party to their side. It may, therefore, perhaps, be safer not to contract these unholy alliances, until there is a conquest obtained by the small territory over the great one; an event which, if we may judge by the present state of the parties, seems at a very considerable distance. The borderers having the union of the colonists as their object—and finding that it was more easily accomplished by bringing the religionists, little by little, to the habits and customs of the world, have well-nigh accomplished their purpose. Different methods of communication between the countries are fast multiplying, and are found, even by the casual observer, to lessen the distinctions between the countries.

CHINESE CUSTOMS.

Copied for the Recorder from the North China Herald, published at Shanghae.

Asserting Innocence and Detecting Guilt.

A few days ago, five men were seen, for several evenings in succession, walking along some of the most frequented streets, in single file, and bareheaded, kneeling and bowing their heads to the pavement at every three steps. Each man carried a bunch of lighted incense sticks in one hand, and the foremost had on his back a large square piece of yellow cotton cloth, on which characters were inscribed, indicating their names, and setting forth that an individual, whose name was also given, had charged them with stealing a sum of money. These prostrations were performed by calling heaven and earth to witness that they were innocent of the crimes alledged against them. On inquiry, I learned that they went to the six gates of the city, going through the same ceremonies all the way, in order to give the greatest publicity possible to their protestation of innocence. The Chinese call this act Kaou-yin-chwang, which implies, making a statement of the facts in the case to the authorities of the invisible world, and imploring their interposition and aid. They have a superstition, that if the persons making this public and solemn avowal, are notwithstanding guilty of the crimes laid to their charge, they will soon die, or be visited with some other signal punishment as a mark of the displeasure of Heaven.

The sun is sometimes worshiped and invoked under similar circumstances, and with a similar intent. This is because he is supposed to see and know all that passes on earth. Often, too, heaven and the sun are both included in the same acts of worship and invocation.

The same ceremony, in substance and design, is often performed before the idols in temples. The accuser and accused present themselves before the images, and go through the usual forms of devotion to these imaginary deities—burning incense sticks, red wax candles, and gilt paper, at the same time reverently kneeling, and "knocking head." It is currently believed by the mass of the people, that in such cases also the guilty will be punished with death or sickness, or some other dire calamity, while the innocent will remain unharmed.

But it often occurs, as might be expected, that neither of the parties suffer any injury whatever, and, vice versa, that some misfortune happens to both. One might reasonably suppose, that the frequency of such a result would destroy the faith of the people in the value of this method of establishing innocence, and detecting and punishing guilt. But it does not. And how do you think they account for these failures in the administration of justice? They say of heaven, if the appeal was made to it, that it either has no eyes, or was not observing at the time. And with reference to the idols, that they are inefficient, or stupid, or lazy, or indifferent about the matter, and unwilling to interfere; or else, that the intelligent spirit of the idol was absent, having passed out through the hole in the back, which is made on purpose to allow its ingress and egress at pleasure!

Weighing Day.

The first day of summer, according to Chinese reckoning, fell this year on the sixth of May. It is a prevailing custom of the people to have themselves weighed on this day. They have a very silly superstition connected with this practice. Many profess to believe, that unless they get weighed on the first day of summer, they will lose flesh as the summer advances, from illness or some other cause; but that being weighed on this day will be a preventive of such a misfortune. It is quite surprising how they can really credit this idle fancy, for they must have thousands of testimonies to its falsity every year, in the fact, that many who have been weighed do, nevertheles, fall off in weight from various causes; while, on the other hand, many who do not get weighed, increase in flesh. But, as in the case of the superstition before described, innumerable demonstrations of its futility are not sufficient to induce the deluded people to renounce it. Long-established custom, let it involve whatever absurdities it may, evidently has far greater authority than the most palpable truth. The antiquity of any practice, if this be its only recommendation, is always a sufficient one to the Chinese, however opposed to the plainest dictates of reason, common-sense, and matter-of-fact.

The day is regarded as a sort of holiday, and there may be many who, without any very strong confidence in the act, as an insurance policy against becoming lighter, still get weighed, from the desire so common among ourselves, to know one's own weight. They often indulge in no little merriment on the occasion, by supposing themselves pigs—a supposition, by the way, quite consistent with truth, in many instances—and estimating their value as such, at the market price of pork.

OBSERVER.

MESHULLAM AND HIS COLONY.

Copied by request from the Presbyterian.

Mr. Kraus, the writer of the following letter, recently received by a gentleman in Philadelphia, is a German of considerable learning. Although not a Jew himself, his heart is full of zeal for the restoration of that interesting people, and he is willing and ready to devote his life to their service. His earnest desire was to reach Jerusalem, and there to spend his days in endeavors to awaken the depressed and broken spirits of the poor Jews there resident, and to stimulate them to exertion. Judea is, in a great measure, a waste; but by the application of proper means it might be restored to its primitive fertility and beauty. Meshullam has set the example; and his farm at Artos is, with very limited means, a fair specimen of what may be accomplished. This enterprise is certainly worth a trial. Every thing at present favors it. The present owners of the soil, although ignorant of the proper methods of cultivating it, are favorably disposed to foreigners, and to their settlement among them. They are willing to sell suitable spots for model farms; and there are now Christian men, who are willing to engage in the experiment, if means were furnished them. Mr. K. says:—

"On the first day of May I entered the Holy City, proceeding at once to the house of John Meshullam, where I was welcomed with demonstrations of joy, as an old acquaintance.

"Mr. S. H. gave me some valuable information. Among other things, I was informed that lately Mr. Rothschild from Paris had been here. Mr. Rothschild stayed sixteen days with Meshullam, whose hotel last winter was especially resorted to by the various travelers from America, England, and Germany, and likewise by a Princess from Holland, with a large retinue. Mr. M. has now given up his hotel in Jerusalem, intending to live in future in Artos, with his family, and to follow agriculture. Last week, in company with a Jew by the name of Mordecai, I paid a visit to Artos, where I was delighted with the scenery. The water is excellent and in great abundance, so much so that all the gardens there can be sufficiently watered. Now is just the time of harvest. Wheat looks very promising, and has grown in some places to the hight of a tall man. Never in my life, and in no other country, have I seen such beautiful grain. The fig-trees bear a rich crop, and the fruit is nearly ripe. Garden vegetables grow luxuriantly in this fertile soil. Artos is in the valley where David's well and Solomon's pools are situated, from which pools 'Solomon watered the grove of green trees!'

"Mr. M. is in the temporary possession of land sufficient to support comfortably a number of families, if they would only enter into his views, and assist him in his praiseworthy plan of colonization. The land he has not bought from the Arabs, but has taken it from them on a lease. He knows quite well how to treat the Arabs. They look upon him as a consul, and respect him as their friend. Mr. M. is a man of enterprise, but the work in which he is engaged is as arduous as it is great. It is his ardent desire that some pious families, who are humble and truly self-sacrificing, would come over and assist him in his colony, in which he has made so promising a beginning, and share with him also the blessings of the Lord. Without doubt it is a most useful work, and well worthy the prayers and assistance of all the lovers of Zion. He hopes to get the right kind of assistance from America—the right kind of men.

"The time is at hand, when the Lord shall favor Zion. The land is peculiarly blessed again; but as the Lord is pleased to act by means also, devoted people and pecuniary means are very much needed at present. The present inhabitants are exceedingly ignorant of agricultural employments. They are in want of the most necessary implements of husbandry, and in general they are very poor. The poor people there would be happy indeed if they could be favored with the old clothes, boots, and shoes, which in the United States are generally thrown away! as boots and shoes command here a very high price. Ask some of your numerous friends for some old clothing, shoes, muslins, calicoes, &c., for any of these things would be of great use to these poor people; such kindness and care from us, would often reach their hearts, (as I know from experience,) when a sermon would not. But above all, we cherish the hope that the Lord will bring devoted and efficient laborers over here, to help to colonize and Christianize this land, and preach Christ by works and conversation to the poor and ignorant."

For the Sabbath Recorder.

BEAUTY—PHYSICAL AND SPIRITUAL.

We are so created that we instinctively love the beautiful, let it appear in any one of its numberless forms. It is a noble impulse of our being, and one that every thing around us tends to cultivate and satisfy. There is "a general grace diffused over nature," that raises within us emotions of beauty. We love the woodland, the meadow, the hill-side, the plain, the meandering rivulet, the broad river, the rugged mountain peak, the foaming cataract, because they give to the ever changing landscape untold beauty. Go forth, if you please, when the gray mists of morning lie on each floret's cup and leaf, and breathe in air that is all life and sweetness, whilst feathery clouds are floating in the crimson light of the rising sun, and tire if you can at that feast of beauty. Go, paint the charm of the evening landscape, as "pale and paler still grows the changing cloud," till it leaves you gazing upon the glorious beauty of the moon and starlit earth. To what point of the heavens would you turn, where on this fair earth tread, and not find it sparkling with beauty? At one time, before you is the bursting bud of spring—now, the ripening blade of summer—again, the quivering light and mellow haze of autumn—anon, the frost-crested, the diamond-pointed landscape of winter.

The animal kingdom is also rich with beauty. Who does not admire the varied plumage of the feathered tribe—the purple and gold of the butterfly's wing—the royal robed ermine—the graceful, artless, and delicate limbs of the fleet-footed deer? There is still higher beauty that speaks in the "human face divine." The finely molded features, the ruby lip, the expansive forehead, the kindling eye, speak forth a beauty radiant with intellectual life.

This is spiritual beauty—the beauty of the soul gleaming through its "mortal coil." This beauty reaches still higher, taking in all of the delightful, noble, generous thoughts, words, actions, and aspirations of humanity. Who does not love the spiritual, beaming forth in the countenance, however rough the exterior? —the noble, high-toned thought, however much of rhetoric there may be wanting in its expression?—the generous deed, however uncouthly it may be performed. This beauty of course is increased when the outward manifestation corresponds. How do grace and song and eloquence captivate as the appropriate manifestations of spiritual beauty and sublimity! God has set the mark of high and divine beauty upon virtue. Mankind instinctively acknowledge it whenever seen. There is beauty in the quiet and unobtrusive deed of charity, in the kind word and cheerful smile, in the tear of pity. This kind of beauty is not confined to any one class or station. We thank our Maker that there are thousands of shining examples of the beauty of virtue in the humble and quiet vale of life, who are strewing bright gems all along the rugged pathway of poverty and sorrow—thousands that are thus true to themselves, true to others, true to God.

This appreciation, this love of the beautiful in all of its forms, can be cultivated. The faculty giving us this power can be improved. It is our duty to improve it. Our spirits should be so attuned in harmony with nature, that our hearts will ever vibrate in unison with her symphonies. Our spirits should be so cultivated, that every manifestation of beauty, whether physical or spiritual, should cause a corresponding emotion to gush up from the deep fountains of our souls. Not only this, but we should also strive to develop beauty, especially spiritual beauty, in our own natures. There is not a more delightful sight than to see a spirit harmoniously developing in intellectual and moral beauty.

IMMENSITY OF LONDON.

If the streets of London were put together, they would extend 3000 miles in length; the main thoroughfares are traveled by 3000 omnibuses and 3500 cabs, employing 40,000 horses. In 1849, the metropolis alone consumed 1,600,000 quarters of wheat, 250,000 bullocks, 1,700,000 sheep, 28,000 calves, 35,000 pigs, and one market alone supplied 4,024,400 head of game. London, the same year, ate, 3,000,000 salmon, which were washed down by 43,200,000 gallons of porter and ale, 2,000,000 gallons of spirits, and 65,000 pipes of wine. 13,000 cows are yearly required to furnish London with milk; and, reckoning two gallons a day from every cow, we have say 72,000 gallons of London peculiar consumed, if not enjoyed, by the London inhabitants. 360,000 gas lights fringe the streets; London's arterial or water system supplies the enormous quantity of 44,383,328 gallons per day. A thousand sails are employed in bringing annually to London 3,000,000 tons of coal; and to clothe and wait upon London people, we have no fewer than 23,517 tailors, 28,579 bootmakers, 40,000 milliners and dress-makers, 168,601 domestic servants.

POWER OF HABIT.

"I trust every thing, under God," says Lord Brougham, "to habit, upon which, in all ages, the law-giver as well as the schoolmaster, has mainly placed his reliance; habit, which makes every thing easy, and casts all difficulties upon the deviation from a wonted course. Make sobriety a habit, and intemperance will be hateful; make prudence a habit, and reckless profligacy will be as contrary to the nature of the child or adult, as the most atrocious crimes are to any of your lordships. Give a child the habit of secretly regarding the truth—of carefully respecting the property of others—of scrupulously abstaining from all acts of improvidence which can involve him in distress, and he will just as likely think of rushing into the element in which he cannot breathe, as of lying, or cheating, or stealing."

FOREKNOWLEDGE.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

If I understand your doctrine on the subject of "Foreknowledge," as set forth by you in your paper of Dec. 11th, it may be stated as follows:—

God from all eternity certainly foreknew all things or events which ever would take place:

But things (or the certainty of things) or events not established or decreed by Him, that is, things or events which are contingent, that is, things or events which possibly may or may not be, He can not certainly foreknow, either that they will or will not take place:

Therefore, there can be no things or events which are contingent, or which possibly may or may not take place, but all things or events were established or decreed by God from all eternity.

Now, if I have misunderstood, or misstated your doctrine, (which I wish not to do,) I shall be happy to be corrected thereupon. Or, if you do not clearly understand my views of your position on this subject, by my foregoing statement of it, I hope to be able to make myself understood at length.

If my statement of your doctrine be correct, you will, I suppose, agree with me, that, should either the first or second proposition there laid down prove not to be true, the third proposition, or conclusion, will, or at least may, be untrue likewise.

I must say, then, that I do respectfully, deliberately, and most solemnly dissent from the second proposition of the argument. In other words, I dissent from the doctrine that God can not certainly foreknow an event that is not established or decreed by Him, and which is contingent, or that may possibly not take place. The doctrine in question you affirm in the following words: "Now, if from all eternity He [God] certainly foreknow the event, the certainty of it must have been from all eternity established or decreed, otherwise it could not have been foreknown." Why, I ask, can not God certainly foreknow that an event will occur at any future period, without first establishing or decreeing it, or because it is contingent, and may or may not take place?(1.) I have long since met with this proposition, but I have never seen what I could regard as the proof of its truth. Is it indeed impossible for God to penetrate the future, and descry or ascertain the events of that future, without He decree those events? Does this strike the mind as self evident, or is it proved when you say, "To say He foreknew it [the event] as contingent, is the same as to say He foreknew it, although there was no evidence to Him that the event ever would take place, which is a clear contradiction?" Why so? Why must God be destitute of evidence of a future event, because it is contingent, or because He has not decreed it? Can nothing be evidence to God of a future event, but his decree? Where is the evidence of this? Supposing a future event to be really contingent, or not decreed, why can not God trace, and exactly ascertain the effect of each cause, as it contingently, or without being decreed, combines with each and all other causes, and brings round the result or event in question?(2.) Or, why can not God certainly foreknow that an event will in fact take place, and at the same time, as certainly foreknow, that the same event might be, and ought to be avoided?(3.) Take any human action—say, the murder of Dr. Parkman by Professor Webster, or the heart-breaking destruction of the lives of so many children in the Public School in New York the other day; why can not God be supposed to have foreseen, with unerring certainty, that those events would take place in fact, while he was absolutely, or (if you please) infinitely certain, at the same time, that He never did decree them—that they were contingent, and that they could be, and ought to be avoided or prevented, by those agents or individuals through whose mistakes, oversight, or designs, they were brought about? I certainly should be glad to learn how any man, or who, knows to the contrary.

Again, you reason thus, "To say that God certainly foreknows that a thing will infallibly take place, which at the same time He knows to be so contingent that it may possibly not take place, is the same as to say that He knows a proposition to be of certain truth, which He knows to be of contingent and uncertain truth, which is a contradiction." Why so? Does your statement mean any thing more than that some one might suppose that God might really know that some event would take place in future, which could be prevented by some certain agents or means? This is what I understand you to intend to represent. But what contradiction is there in all that? If I say, I believe God infallibly knew beforehand, that Benedict Arnold would turn traitor, and that He also infallibly knew, at the same time, that it was possible for Arnold to remain true to his trust, what contradiction is there in the statement? I can not see any, either in the statement, or in the nature of the thing.(4.)

Farther, you say, "God views things as they are. If an event is contingent, God views it so. If the event may possibly never take place, God knows it may possibly never take place." All this I believe; but you add, "And that is to know that the proposition which affirms that it will take place may possibly not be true." No, sirs, this is not to know that the proposition in question may possibly not be true, or, which I think you wish to signify, that it would make God's knowledge possibly mistaken. It is only to know that it is really possible for things to take place, which it is known will not take place, though they might.

Again, you say, "If there was no necessity whatever that the event should take place, then it would not argue perfection of knowledge in any being to determine peremptorily that it would take place." Why not? If God knows that an event will take place, suppose there is no necessity of its taking place, how does that affect God's knowledge, to make that imperfect? I think it does argue the perfection of God's knowledge, to allow that it is such, that it enables him peremptorily to determine that an event will, or will not take place, whether there is any necessity that it should take place or not. But if God can only peremptorily determine that an event will or will not take place, when there is a necessity of it, or when he has necessitated the event by his decree, I think the imperfection of his knowledge is clearly established, for it declares, if an event be contingent, or not necessary, God can not know certainly whether it will take place or not; and it proves also, that he does not possess the attribute of prescience at all; because it shows that all his certain foreknowledge must of necessity result from his decrees, by which all events were at once necessitated, and made known; and that is the same as to say, that God is destitute of any attribute of the nature of prescience by which he can certainly foreknow any thing which is not otherwise, that is, by some other attribute first certainly made known. (5.)

Of God's determining peremptorily that an event will take place, of which there is no necessity that it should take place, you say, "It would rather argue ignorance and mistake; because it would argue that He supposes a proposition to be certain, which, in its own nature, and all things considered, is uncertain and contingent." This, I think, is a mistake. Suppose the event in question to be of the most contingent or uncertain kind imaginable; if God be omniscient, I see no reason why He may not be just as certain of the result, or how the thing will eventuate, as He would be, if He had decreed the event, and pledged his entire omnipotence to insure its occurrence. Why not? But God must be just as certain that the event is contingent or uncertain in its nature, as He is that it will in fact take place; for the uncertain and contingent nature of the event is just as much a fact, or just as much a truth, as the event itself is when it comes to pass. And God is no more likely to be mistaken about the one, than he is about the other; for "God views things as they are. If an event be contingent, God views it so," you say. And I add, if an event be contingent, God knows it is contingent, and his positive or certain knowledge that it will take place can no more destroy the certain truth that the event is contingent, than one certain truth can annihilate another certain truth. So then, when God supposes a proposition to be certain, it is certain, beyond the possibility of mistake, though the proposition may relate to and peremptorily determine the occurrence of an event the contingency of which is as absolutely certain, an as unmistakably known to God, as the event itself is.

Remarks.

(1.) If Bro. C., instead of requiring us to tell "why God cannot certainly foreknow that an event will occur at any future period, without first establishing or decreeing it," would himself undertake the proof of the affirmative of the proposition, it would be a little more in keeping with the rules of logic. The burden of proof always rests upon him who needs as an argument the thing to be proved. It is essential to Bro. C.'s argument, that he show, by some unmistakable proof, the possibility of foreseeing an event which has not been decreed. In the mean time, it is sufficient for us to deny it. We maintain, that when God foreknows an event, he foreknows it certainly; not doubtfully. That is, in His mind, it is absolutely and infallibly certain that the event will take place. And if the event is, in His mind, absolutely and infallibly certain to take place, then the certainty of its occurrence is established in his mind; or—which is the same thing—it is decreed. For how a thing can be certain, and yet not established, we have yet to learn.

(2.) There are but two sorts of evidence, viz. self-evidence and proof. A thing which is evident, is either evident in itself, or evident in something else; that is, by connection with something else. But an event whose future existence is contingent—that is, whose future existence is not in any sense necessary—can have neither of these sorts of evidence. "It cannot be self-evident; for if it be, it may be now known by what is now to be seen in the thing itself—either its present existence, or the necessity of its nature. But both these are contrary to the supposition; for it is supposed, both that the thing has no present existence to be seen, and also that it is not of such a nature as to be necessarily existent for the future; so that its future existence is not self-evident. And, secondly, neither is there any proof or evidence in any thing else, or evidence of connection with something else that is evident; for this is also contrary to the supposition. It is supposed, that there is now nothing existent with which the future existence of the contingent event is connected. For such a connection destroys its contingence, and supposes necessity. Thus it is demonstrated, that there is in the nature of things absolutely no evidence at all of the future existence of that event which is contingent, without all necessity, (if any such event there be,) neither self-evidence nor proof. And therefore the thing in reality is not evident; and so cannot be seen to be evident, or, which is the same thing, cannot be known."

Thus reasons President Edwards. And as it furnishes precisely the answer that is needed to Bro. C.'s question, we could not forbear quoting it. Bro. C. supposes, that "God can trace and exactly ascertain the effect of each cause, as it contingently, or without being decreed, combines with each and all other causes, and brings round the result or event in question." If he will throw out the expression, "as it contingently, or without being decreed," we can subscribe to the sentiment very readily. We believe in the concurrence of second causes, and in causes combined with other causes to bring about any proposed result; but we are free to express our belief, that these second causes, and combining causes, are as much decreed as the final result. Our correspondent, however, supposes, that the combination of one cause with another in order to produce the result, is altogether contingent. But if it be absolutely contingent, without any concern of God, there is no reason why the combination should be effected in one manner or order, rather than in another; there is no reason why this cause should combine with that, rather than with some other; there is no reason, in short, why the final result or event should be brought about, rather than some other or none at all. And if so, the thing was absolutely unknowable, because, of the different things taken into consideration, there was nothing of such superior weight or value as to determine any understanding. And as Edwards justly remarks, "an increase of understanding, or of the capacity of discerning, has no tendency, and makes no advance, to a discerning any signs or evidences of it, let it be increased ever so much. The increase of the strength of sight may have a tendency to enable to discern the evidence which is far off, and very much hid, and deeply involved in clouds and darkness; but it has no tendency to enable to discern evidence where there is none. If the sight be infinitely strong, and the capacity of discerning infinitely great, it will enable to see all that there is, and to see it perfectly and with ease; yet it has no tendency at all to enable a being to discern that evidence which is not; but, on the contrary, it has a tendency to enable to discern with great certainty that there is none."

(3.) That certain decreed events or actions ought to be avoided, is not called in question by us. Man's duty is not affected by the decrees of God. When it is shown that a decree implies physical force to bring about the volitions and actions of men, it will be time enough to consider this point.

(4.) If "God infallibly knew beforehand that Benedict Arnold would turn traitor," he also knew that any proposition affirming that Benedict Arnold would not turn traitor, was not true, and could not possibly be true. The possibility of such a proposition being true, is inconsistent with the absolute certainty of the event. We contemplate events in prospect, and say that they may possibly not take place. But the proposition affirming that they will not take place, being predicated upon their uncertainty, may possibly be false. Not so with the Omniscient. All the events which he foresees are absolutely certain with Him. Hence any proposition affirming the possibility of their failure, must of necessity be false in His sight.

(5.) The reasoning of this paragraph proceeds on the supposition, that a future event may be contingent, and yet God have certain evidence that it will take place; which we have already shown to be impossible. If an event be strictly contingent, it can have neither self-evidence nor proof; it must be without evidence, and therefore unknowable; for no understanding, created or uncreated, finite or infinite, can see evidence where there is none.

DENYING SELF TO DO GOOD.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

In the Recorder of Dec. 11th, in a communication from J. R. Irish, I noticed the following statement: "If we love the Sabbath as we ought, we shall be willing to circumscribe our temporal pleasures to carry its claims to those who do not love it, and especially to make it known to those who are ignorant of what God commands in this matter." This I conceive to be true, not only with reference to the Sabbath cause, but also with reference to the cause of religion in general. The position I wish to sustain is this: Duty calls us to sacrifice comforts for the sake of promoting the cause of God and humanity.

1st. It is evident, that we ought always to prefer a greater to a less good. Every wise man does this, so far as his own interest is concerned. And there is no reason, except his own selfishness, why he does not prefer the higher good of his fellow men to his own less good. If it be duty to deprive ourselves of gratifications for the sake of getting useful knowledge ourselves, how much more so to extend the knowledge of Christ among the benighted nations of the earth. If that man is guilty, who, when his neighbor's house is on fire, and he might help put it out, and when there is a want of help, prefers to stay at home and read the news, or talk with a friend, or finish his supper, rather than help his suffering neighbor, how much more so he who, when millions are starving for the bread of life, lives in luxury, and enjoys every convenience, and circumscribes no temporal pleasure for the sake of imparting to them the needed gifts. If it is duty for persons in health to deprive themselves of sleep to watch over and attend upon the sick, it is unquestionably duty to make sacrifices, great ones too, to point sinners, diseased and perishing with the malady of sin, to the sovereign balm of grace, the remedy which alone can cure this fatal disease.

2d. We have express scripture to sustain this position. "Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus, who made himself of no reputation, and humbled himself to death, even the death of the cross." Here we have the example of Christ set before us, and this example we are commanded to imitate. The spirit which he possessed and exhibited was the spirit of self-denying benevolence. To instruct the ignorant, and save the lost, he became poor, suffered, and died. But in carrying forward his purposes of grace, the labors of his disciples are needed. The wants of the necessitous cannot be supplied without means. The gospel cannot be preached to all men without great and self-denying effort. "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." To secure our own salvation, it is duty to sacrifice every pleasure which would hinder us from its attainment; also, it is duty to put forth every needful effort for the same end. Well, if we love our neighbors as we ought, "as ourselves," we shall do these things, as far as possible, for their souls' good. Not only have we the example of Christ in this respect, but also of his early disciples, and of all the truly pious ever since. To propagate truth, and turn men from darkness to light, they have voluntarily deprived themselves of homes, kindred, ease, worldly reputation, lands, and every thing that men of the world hold dear. To do good to men, they have suffered reproach, hunger, thirst, cold, stripes, imprisonment, and death. And it is as true now as it ever was, "except a man deny himself daily, and take up his cross and follow Christ, he can not be his disciple."

In view of this truth, what evidence do multitudes of church members at the present time give of piety? Living in ceiled houses, riding in costly carriages, feeding on delicacies, ornamented with gold and jewels and fashionable attire, and thus defrauding God, violating the great law of love, and imitating the ungodly world, instead of the benevolent Saviour! Reader, are these following "the Lamb whithersoever he goeth?" Are these becoming meet for the inheritance of the saints in light? Can they wear the crown without running the race?

> "Can they be carried to the skies
> On downy b ds of ease,
> While others fought to win the prize,
> And sailed through bloody seas?"

O! reader, be not an idler in God's vineyard! Be not insensible to the wants and woes of suffering humanity! "Live not to thyself, but to him who died for thee, and rose again!" "Make no provision for the flesh, to fulfill the lust thereof!" And when you come to receive the reward of grace, you may associate with souls saved through your instrumentality, and unite with them, and all the holy throng of redeemed ones, to praise God and the Lamb forever!

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Sunday Scene in France—Popish Miracles, &c.

GLASGOW, December 12th, 1851.

Last number of the London Illustrated News gives a pictorial representation of a recent Sunday scene in France—"the launch of a frigate pierced for 40 guns." The journalist, while he furnishes us with the date, solicits no attention, as I now do, to the event as part of the illustration of the universal observance of the first day of the week, which ought, we are sometimes told, to silence the scruples of those who read the words of the Decalogue; "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God." "The spectacle took place on the 23d ult., when, for some hours before the time announced for the launch, every road leading to the spot was thronged with vehicles and foot passengers," being in the neighborhood of Paris. None will wonder that the President of the Republic was present; but with us it reads strangely, that "the clergy of the parish of Neuilly had gone through the usual ceremony of benediction." The week following, the announcement was, "The election begun on Sunday in Paris." But, on the Sunday following, preparations were being made for bearing down the liberties of the people, at whatever expense of human life. And the same priesthood that blessed formerly the banners of the Revolution, have already given their sanction and support to the despotic President; while he, on the other hand, has indicated the favor which Popery is to receive at his hands, by converting the Paris Pantheon into a Popish Chapel, dedicated to St. Genevieve. Under Presidential patronage, the accommodating apostate Church of Rome may be expected to become still more intolerant to all that protest against its iniquities; but it may also be anticipated, that her influence will be liberally exercised in favor of the despot who supports her. To what, then, has France to look if the present movement should succeed! Yet what does the condition of France require but the severest discipline! Having cast off the fear of God, and refusing to submit to His requirements, a heavy hand is needful to teach such a people the consequences of sin.

We chronicled in the columns of the Sabbath Recorder, the Popish miracle of the appearance of the Virgin Mary on the Salette Mountain in 1846, testifying the difficulty which she had in restraining the wrath of her Son, on account of Sunday desecration, and other evil deeds. We also recorded the repudiation of the miracle by the Bishop of Gap, "as a miserable fable;" but having been taken under the protection of the Bishop of Grenoble, in whose diocese the mountain is, it is now conclusively settled to have been a genuine miracle. The latter prelate, in an official mandate, certifies that the actual appearance of the Virgin on that day is proved by all the rules of human testimony, and confirmed by the many prodigies that have since occurred in the neighborhood. He therefore authorizes the worship of "Notre Dame de la Salette." Those, therefore, who put faith in the correctness of the Bishop's decision as to the value of the proof, will be permitted to resume possession of the miraculous evidence in favor of the Sunday, of which, even by a Bishop's hands, they had been so sacrilegiously despoiled.

But these Romish miracles are really difficult things to deal with. Rose Tamisier, who got up the miracle of the bleeding picture in the Church of St. Saturnia, has been condemned to six months imprisonment, with a fine of 500 francs and the costs, as an impostor. Her case had previously been before a different court, which could not come to a definitive conclusion upon her merits as a miracle-worker, or demerits as an impostor. The case was therefore referred to a court which does not seem to have had the same difficulty—or which, perhaps, was less disposed to defer to the deceptions and superstitions of their church. Another girl, who has been termed St. Catherine, (for these "saints" are easily made and multiplied,) has been attracting much attention in Rome by her predictions. The Cardinals, and even the Pope himself, have been stated to be consulting her as to their coming destinies. She is alarming all in the metropolis of Papal apostacy by "predictions of sanguinary disturbances, and popular fury." Some there are, however, who make no pretense to prophetic influence, and in whose favor no Papal Bull of canonization is ever likely to be issued, who have been prophesying the same. These, looking at the denunciations of sin in God's Word, and also studying the providential dealings, have come to the conclusion that Rome is ripening for judgment—even although she may still refuse through these to be instructed.

The British grant of £30,000 annually to the Papal College of Maynooth, is exciting much attention among Protestants—who see it only as salarying a seminary for the training of priests in superstition and sedition. Large meetings have been held in London, Edinburgh, and Glasgow, at which resolutions have been passed calling upon Government to withdraw the grant—but we have no expectation that this will be done. Petitions will, however, in all probability, be poured into Parliament, from all parts of the country, condemnatory of the policy, the morality, and the religion, which are exhibited in the endowment.

Dr. Achilli, whose liberation from the dungeons of Rome was effected under the influence, and I hope in answer also to the prayers of the Evangelical Alliance, is prosecuting Dr. Newman, one of the perverts to Rome from the English Episcopacy. In Lectures preached and published, Newman charged Achilli with a series of the foulest crimes while he was a Papist. Although his name is on the title page of the book, Newman at first refused to acknowledge the authorship, when this was required of him with a view to prosecution for libel. The publishers were then made responsible—on which Newman came forward and avowed the authorship. He is stated to be now procuring evidence from the records of the Inquisition, to be produced in this country at the forthcoming trial.

French Affairs—the Pope—Sir John Franklin.

GLASGOW, December 19th, 1851.

Sabbath and Sunday are both appointed by the President of the French Republic as the days for polling, and thus determining whether his tenure of office is to be renewed. He has, however, silenced all the organs of public feeling that have ventured to express an unfavorable opinion of his despotism and cruelty. The moral value of the decision recorded through the ballot-box will be small. With the politics of the struggle I intermeddle not here, but I tremble for the results to true religion, should Louis Napoleon be successful, and be able afterwards to keep his place. It must have been a strong leaning to Popery—from whatever motive—that led to the inconsistency of sending troops to Rome, forcing the Pope upon his reclaiming subjects, when they proposed to do just as France had done.

On the recent outburst, an early act of this man indicated a continuance of the same spirit, ostentatiously displayed; that the priests might understand for whom their influence should be exercised, the Pantheon was converted by Presidential ordinance, a Christian Church, having assigned unto it a saintly title. Accordingly, the Cardinals at Rome exult in the present state of matters; the Archbishop of Paris has withdrawn his hostility to the President; and the Bishop of Chartres has addressed a circular to the clergy of his diocese, urging them to give Napoleon their support at the polls. "Providence," he says, "gives us at this moment only this means of safety." And Count de Montalembert, the ultramontane leader, who proposed the enforcement of Sunday observance in the Assembly, has addressed a long letter to the Romish Universe newspaper, pressing the claims of the Prince to be reëlected, on the ground that he "has rendered for three years incomparable services to the cause of order and Catholicism." It is, however, stated in this day's telegraphic announcement, that opposition is being more distinctly expressed; and M. Larochejacquelin, the leader of one section of the French Legitimists, has been bold enough to issue a protest against the recent measures of the President. "The time for Cæsars," he says, "cannot have come for France." God may, however, be seeing a need, on the part of an unprincipled people, who reject His fatherly government, of a full measure of man's authority over them. It is by the troubles coming upon the earth, (and we have still to pass through a time of trouble "such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be,") that men will be led to desire the coming of the King who shall reign in righteousness, the Prince of Peace. The troubles predicted are various; the more prominent being God's "four sore judgments," war, famine, pestilence, and evil beasts. But the earth itself shall experience the power of Him who made it. "The Lord maketh the earth empty, and maketh it waste." "The earth also is defiled under the inhabitants thereof; because they have transgressed the laws, changed the ordinance, broken the everlasting covenant; therefore hath the curse devoured the earth, and they that dwell therein are desolate; therefore the inhabitants of the earth are burned, and few men left." Is. 24: 1—6. There shall even be signs in the sun, moon, and stars—the sea and the waves roaring. Earthquakes in divers places, hail, and furious storms, are all part of Jehovah's weapons of punishment. Of some of these there have recently been memorable examples; and this very month the Island of Sicily has been swept by two enormous water spouts, about a quarter of a mile apart, which drew up into their vortices, men, women, cattle, sheep, and horses, bearing them on to destruction, while houses were unroofed and trees uprooted. Their passage was accompanied with the fall of hail-stones of enormous size, and masses of ice. Five hundred lives have been lost, and an immense amount of property destroyed, numerous vessels in the harbor having been sunk with their crews. If such things be but "the beginning of sorrows," what will be the consequence when the full tide of divine wrath shall overtake the world? As it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be in the day of the Son of Man. Alas! who shall live when God doeth this!

The Pope, great man as he seems to think himself to be, has "resolved to open anew the celestial treasures of the church under the form of a Jubilee." This he announces most graciously in an Encyclical Letter dated Nov. 21st., in which he tells his Patriarchs, Primates, Archbishops, and Bishops, of the awful disregard prevailing to what he greatly desiderates, a reverence for Popery and its priesthood. "As an anticipatory pledge of every celestial gift," he sends them even now his "apostolic benediction." Were it not that the "indulgences," which are meant by this "Jubilee," yield a handsome revenue to this misnamed "Holiness," we might well wonder that "the anticipatory pledge," if it be of any value, or "the celestial treasures of the church," should be granted at such a time; for the same document which speaks of both, breathes out fury against opposers. Against all such, he asks prayers to God, to "the most tender of Mothers," next to the the Prince of the Apostles; "then," he adds, "pray to Paul," "then pray to the patron saint of each city and country." A legion of saints—such saints as some of the latter class were—are thus invoked against gainsayers. But we are really more afraid of some of the other weapons which this unscrupulous power has been wont to wield, than we are of its beaded prayers.

The purpose of seeking farther for Sir John Franklin has not been abandoned. Government has determined to send out another expedition to Wellington Channel, in the Spring. Three steamers are to be employed; and if sailing vessels are at all sent out with stores, the steamers on this occasion are to act independently of these, communicating only with each other. Another expedition, to be equipped by subscription, is also proposed to go to Behring Straits, although recent accounts from that quarter are unfavorable; and Lieut. Pim is now in Russia, on his way to Siberia, to endeavor to find his way across the ice to the Arctic Sea, which is supposed to be open, and in connection with the strait now discovered in Wellington Channel. We fear there is little ground to hope for the deliverance of those for whom these efforts are made; but it is right that all due means be employed for that purpose—with prayer.

PERSECUTION IN MADAGASCAR.—The Queen of Madagascar seems bent upon exterminating from her dominions all who favor Christianity, or "the new religion" as it is called. She has long been engaged in this work, and it is stated that in the last outburst of her fury, four persons were burnt alive; fourteen were precipitated from a high rock and crushed to death; a hundred and seventeen were condemned to work in chains as long as they live; twenty were cruelly flogged with rods, besides 1,748 others mulcted in heavy penalties, reduced to slavery, and compelled to buy themselves back, or be deprived of their wives and families. Persons of rank have been degraded, and sent as laborers to carry stone for twelve months together to build houses; and in an endless variety of other ways have the maddened passions of one wicked woman been permitted now for years past to plunge a large, populous, and beautiful country, into misery and ruin.

THE MOVEMENTS OF GOVERNOR KOSSUTH.—Governor Kossuth has been in Washington for a week past, where he has received numerous deputations from various parts of the country, and has been called upon by the leading members of Government. On Fourth-day he waited on the President in an official way; and on Sabbath evening, at six o'clock, he dined with the President, in company with Madam Kossuth and Count Pulsky and lady. A Public Dinner has been tendered him by the members of the two Houses of Congress, to take place on Fourth-day of the present week. Kossuth's reception at Washington has been less cordial, probably, than was expected by him, and desired by the people generally.

A BISHOPRIC DECLINED.—After a long struggle, the Episcopal Diocese of New York several weeks ago succeeded in electing as Bishop (in the place of the suspended Bishop Onderdonk) the Rev. Wm. Creighton, D. D. But long deliberation upon the question, has led him to decline the office.

THE NEW YORK STATE OFFICERS recently elected entered upon their duties with the beginning of the year. Many changes have already been made among the clerks, and others are expected. The Governor's Message to the Legislature was to be delivered at noon of Third-day Jan. 6.

JENNY LIND'S Farewell Concerts have been indefinitely postponed, if not entirely abandoned, in consequence of the death of her mother, news of which reached her in the beginning of last week. Miss Lind is still in New York, where it is supposed she will remain for some weeks.

THE HUTCHINSON FAMILY are giving a series of Musical Entertainments at Metropolitan Hall, New York. They have introduced many new songs, some of which are specially adapted to the present time, and promise to add to their already enviable popularity.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, DEC. 29.

The SENATE spent some time in talking about the fire in the Capitol, but voted nothing worth recording. The subject of printing the census, and who should do it, was talked upon, but no action taken, Mr. Shields made the following report, which was adopted by the Senate, viz: The Special Committee appointed to wait on Louis Kossuth on his arrival at the Capitol, and to introduce him to the Senate of the United States, have had the same under consideration, and recommend that the same proceedings be pursued as in the case of General La Fayette, to wit: That the Chairman of the Committee introduce him in these words—"We present Louis Kossuth to the Senate of the United States." Upon which the President of the Senate will invite him to be seated. The Senate then adjourned to Sixth-day.

The HOUSE was not in Session.

THIRD-DAY, DEC. 30.

The HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES spent the whole day in talking about a resolution that a Committee of Five be appointed by the Chair to wait on Louis Kossuth, on his arrival at the Capitol, and introduce him to the House. A great deal was said for and against the doctrine of intervention; but before the question was taken, the House adjourned.

FOURTH-DAY, DEC. 31.

The HOUSE spent all day upon the Kossuth reception resolution, and without reaching the end of the business adjourned over to Sixth-day.

SIXTH-DAY, JAN. 2.

In the SENATE, a short but animated discussion was evoked by the presentation of a memorial from the New York Industrial Congress, praying that all relations between the United States and France should be suspended. The Memorial was finally laid on the table by a vote of 21 to 14. Mr. Clarke gave notice of a joint resolution, declaratory of the principles of the United States Government upon the doctrine of intervention with international relations of other States, and reaffirming the well-known and settled policy of our country. Several unimportant items of busi- were brought up, and finally the Senate adjourned for want of a quorum.

In the House, the Kossuth resolution was again discussed; and after a protracted debate, the House adjourned to Second-day without final action.

California News.

The steamer Prometheus, from San Juan de Nicaragua, with two weeks later news from California, arrived at New York Dec. 30.

Capt. Waterman, of the ship Challenge, had surrendened himself to the civil authorities for trial, and Douglas, the mate, after examination, had been committed for the same purpose.

The U. S. brig Lawrence was wrecked on the night of Nov. 25, off San Francisco, but no lives were lost.

The discovery of a rich Gold Placer in Bear Valley, Mariposa County, has produced a great excitement among the miners. It is said that seven persons made no less than $217,000 in eight days.

The Indians have again committed frightful ravages among the American settlements on the Colorado.

Advices from Oregon inform us of difficulties with the Indians, which have compelled the interference of the U. S. troops. An engagement ensued, in which several Indians were killed.

From the Sandwich Islands, we learn that an attempt is on foot to establish an Episcopal Church in Honolulu.

In Nicaragua, the old Pichengo party has again taken the field, and will make a fight for the control of the State.

LATEST FROM CALIFORNIA.—The steamer Cherokee, from Chagres, with the California mails, four days later news, and $2,000,000 in gold dust, arrived at New York on the 1st inst.

This is the quickest passage ever made between San Francisco and New York, the whole time being only 26 days 11 hours. The Golden-Gate made the run from San Francisco to Panama, 3,500 miles, in 12 days, being an average of 292 miles a day, or 12⅓ miles an hour through the whole distance.

Very extensive limestone and marble formations have recently been discovered in California, on the American River, within thirty or thirty-five miles of Sacramento. It is said to be of excellent quality, and is so situated as to be easy of transportation. The value of this discovery to San Francisco, can hardly be appreciated by Atlantic citizens. Stone for building purposes is brought from the Atlantic ports, from Australia and China, and meets with ready sale.

Thomas Hogan, of Pittsburg, Pa., while engaged in a spree in a public house in Ophir, on the 14th ult, was shot dead by the landlord, who was acquitted by the authorities.

The subject of internal improvements is being agitated by the people of California, and they look with the greatest solicitude to the action of the next Congress, in hopes of suitable appropriations for our rivers.

Volcanoes have been discovered to exist in the Sierra Nevada mountains by a gentleman who was on an exploring expedition.

A company have secured from King Kamehameha, the exclusive right of steam navigation to and from the Sandwich Islands, under the name and style of the "North Pacific Steam Navigation Company."

Snow has fallen to a considerable depth in the mountains. In the neighborhood of Downieville, on the tops of the mountains, it was 16 to 17 inches deep, while in the valley it did not exceed four inches.

Numerous murders were committed in the interior during the fore part of last month, in consequence of which Vigilance Committees have been formed at Nevada, Grass Valley, and other places, which have apparently checked these outrages.

Much excitement has been caused by an outbreak among the Indians in the southern portion of the State. There appears to be a general uprising among them, and even the old native Californians are seeking protection at San Diego, Los Angelos, and other principal places. So far as heard from, nine persons have been killed by them. No treaty has yet been made by the Indian Commissioners with these Indians, who are very numerous, and have much property and many cattle.

The news from the mines continues to be of the most cheering character. Nearly every day we have accounts of new discoveries, both of quartz and placer mines. Recently, a discovery was made in Bear Valley, in Mariposa County, by four Mexicans, the reports from which nearly stagger credulity. In order to be more certain of protection, they took some Americans in with them; but before doing so, in the space of one week, they had taken out over $200,000 of gold. Within three weeks after the discovery, it is stated that over $400,000 were obtained!

European News.

By the Royal Mail Steamer Africa, which arrived at New York on the 2d inst., we have Liverpool dates to Dec. 20, and London and Paris dates to Dec. 19th.

From England, the news is not particularly important. The London journals publish President Fillmore's Message, and comment upon it in a pretty friendly tone.

The Daily News discusses the affair of the steamer Prometheus at length, and in a very frank spirit. It says the conduct of the English Commander who fired into the Prometheus is unwarranted and inexplicable.

The next expedition to the Arctic regions, in 1852, in search of Sir John Franklin and the missing officers and crews of the Erebus and Terror discovery ships, will be made as efficient as possible, and in addition to the Pioneer and Intrepid screw steamers employed in the recent expedition, the Phœnix, a much larger screw steamer, of 250 horse power, is ordered to be fitted and strengthened for service in the Polar seas.

The Queen of Spain has pardoned all such prisoners made in the late expedition against the Isle of Cuba as are citizens of the United States, whether they be already in Spain, undergoing the punishments they have incurred, or whether they be still in Cuba. The Spanish Ministry have dissolved the Cortes, and some apprehension of an attack (a la Napoleon) on the Constitution is entertained.

In Hungary, no papers speaking of Kossuth's doings and speeches in England and this country, are allowed to cross the frontiers.

In Austrian Italy, the judicial shedding of blood continues. Nine persons have just been shot at Malava, and twelve at Trecenta; seventeen individuals have had the sentence of death commuted into prolonged imprisonment. One person has been hanged at Mantua. All these have been tried and condemned for "robbery with armed hand," by military tribunals.

But France continues to be the center of attraction for Europe. We copy a variety of paragraphs showing the state of things in that country.

The course of the troops during the recent overturn seems to have been more sanguinary than was at first supposed. It is affirmed that the total number of Frenchmen killed in Paris and the Departments, in carrying out M. Bonaparte's coup d'état, is not less than 2,000.

Nearly all of the Journals opposed to the usurper have been suppressed, and it is difficult to obtain a true account of what is going on.

A serious engagement took place on the 8th, at Crest (Drome;) the rebels, in number about 1,600, stood their ground about four hours, and then retreated, carrying with them their dead and wounded. The insurgents in this department, as in that of the Var, placed their hostages in the front rank, with orders to fire on the troops.

Letters from Draguignan, dated Dec. 11, state that a decisive battle had taken place between the gendarmes, commanded by Captain Hourlez, and the insurgents, to the number of 5000; 60 or 70 of the latter were killed, and 80 taken prisoners. The troops lost only one man, but a captain and a lieutenant were severely wounded.

In Germany, Austria, and Italy, the Governments highly approve the conduct of Louis Napoleon.

Count Glazeneppe, one of the aids-de-camp of the Emperor of Russia, has arrived at Paris. It is said that he has been sent by the Autocrat of all the Russias to compliment the President on his recent exploit, and to present him, in the name of his master, with the grand cordon of the order of St. Andre, which is the first order in the Russian Empire.

It is said that the French garrison at Rome immediately deposited its adhesion to the policy of Louis Napoleon in the hands of General Gemeau. Rome was illuminated on the occasion, but it was not known whether at the expense of the Papal Government or the French.

A Paris correspondent of the New York Tribune says of Paris:—"The streets swarm with seargents de ville and mouchards, or police spies, in every sort of disguise. A day or two ago, a female was reading one of Louis Napoleon's decrees, posted against a dead wall. "Oh! the traitor!" she muttered between her teeth. "Is n't he?" said a man in a blouse, next to her. "Yes," she replied, unsuspiciously, "I think him a traitor to his country and his oath." The spy lifted his blouse and showed his black coat and brass buttons underneath, and arrested the woman for contempt and outrage of the President of the Republic. Gentlemen noted for their republican principles are watched by policemen wherever they go. Their every step, their goings-out and their comings-in are watched. Individuals visited by them become at once suspected, and thenceforth share the attentions of the police. Persons thus circumstanced live in the constant possibility of arrest, and sleep on the very threshold of a prison.

"In the midst of this disheartening spectacle there were two points of light. The Charge of Switzerland and the American Minister did not bow the knee to Baal. The former, however, was soon instructed by his government to acknowledge the new dynasty, and Mr. Rives stood alone. His position was certainly delicate and trying, but he has had the courage to remain aloof in this center of Europe, and who can doubt that he and our country are honored by this conduct, even in the eyes of those who may feel the independence and dignity of his position to be a reproach to their own baseness?

"The grounds of Mr. Rives's course I understand to be these: The conduct of Louis Napoleon is marked with a degree of duplicity almost without parallel. He has scattered an Assembly duly elected; he has imprisoned hundreds without law or justice; he has butchered other hundreds without excuse; he has violated his oath, and trampled under foot a constitution sanctioned by the people. Under such circumstances, any act on the part of the representative of the United States which might be interpreted into congratulation, would be reprehensible; and inasmuch as the President has called upon the people of France to ratify or reject his government, he deems it proper for him to await this decision, before appearing at court. When Louis Napoleon has been declared elected by the people, Mr. Rives will make his appearance at the Elysee, and not till then. To this line of conduct the President cannot object, for his own decrees and proclamations represent him as the provisional, not the constitutional ruler. Mr. Rives's course will, I feel persuaded, not only be regarded with approval at home, but will excite respect in the eyes of the world, as the truest policy to be pursued in France by the Minister of the United States."

FOUR DAYS LATER.—The steamer Atlantic, with four days later news from Europe, arrived at New York on Sunday afternoon last.

The election of Louis Napoleon seems to have passed off with tranquility, not only in Paris, but in other parts of France. It is not yet known what majority his creatures, who count the votes, will choose to attribute to him, but it will be a big one—it is supposed seven millions. The number of votes returned is larger than was expected; in Paris it is only 37,000 less than in 1848. The despotism put upon the French people by the usurper grows more severe; arrests are constant, and five steamers are prepared to carry off the "dangerous" political prisoners to Cayenne. Of course no form of trial is allowed them, and they are condemned only by the will of the tyrant. The censorship of the press is now extended to pamphlets. On the other hand, it is said that the new Emperor means to abolish the odious liquor tax; he gives money to washing and bathing houses, and otherwise, to ingratiate himself with the people. Gen. Cavaignac has left prison.

Turner, the great English landscape painter, died at his residence, No. 47 Queen Ann-st., London, on Friday, Dec. 19, aged 76. He was never married, and leaves a very large fortune made by his art; he was the son of a barber. His finished oil paintings have latterly ranged in price from $3,500 to $7,000.

A terrible colliery explosion took place at Rawmarsh, England, on the 20th; 50 lives were lost.

WATER SPOUTS IN SICILY.—Two enormous water spouts, accompanied by a terrific hurricane, have swept over the Island of Sicily. Those who saw, describe them as two immense spherical bodies of water, reaching from the clouds, their cones nearly touching the earth, and, as far as could be judged, at a quarter of a mile apart, traveling with immense velocity. They passed over the island near Marsala. In their progress houses were unroofed, trees uprooted, men and women, horses, cattle and sheep, were raised up, drawn into their vortex, and borne on to destruction. During their passage rain descended in cataracts, accompanied with hailstones of enormous size, and masses of ice. Going over Castellamare, near Stabia, it destroyed half the town, and washed 200 of the inhabitants into the sea, who all perished. Upward of 500 persons have been destroyed by this terrible visitation, and an immense amount of property, the country being laid waste for miles. The shipping in the harbor suffered severely, many vessels being destroyed, and their crews drowned. After the occurrence numbers of dead human bodies were picked up, all frightfully mutilated and swollen.

EARTHQUAKE IN TURKEY.—A shock of an earthquake was felt on the 12th of October, at Berat, in European Turkey. It threw down part of the fortress, and 400 soldiers perished in the ruins. About 800 houses, a Greek church, and two mosques, were greatly injured. When, after the disaster, the population was counted, 800 persons were missing; but many of them were supposed to have taken to flight. The upper part of a mountain near the town became detached, and was cast a considerable distance; a crater then opened in the center, and vomited black smoke and blocks of stone; this was followed by a sulphurous lava in a boiling state, which subsequently turned to powder. Fetid exhalations arose, which corrupted the air. The villages near Berat also suffered greatly from the earthquake. At Salonica, on the 30th and 31st October, shocks were felt. They came from the north to the south, and lasted several seconds. The sky was covered at the time. The first shocks were slight, the latters stronger, but it is not stated that they did any damage.

LATEST FROM CHINA.—The following is from The Overland Friend of China, dated Victoria, Oct. 30:—

China presents a troubled aspect. In Pekin treason lurks around the throne; the northern sea-board swarms with freebooters, who, not content with plundering every vessel that crosses their path, make continual ravage in the various towns where anything of value is to be obtained—and in the southern provinces rebellion rears its head, every report giving additional success on the side of the insurgents. With a knowledge that for months past there have been upward of a hundred thousand imperial troops in the field, who make no headway, the great masses of the people are now beginning to despise a government for which they have hitherto felt respectful terror. Two days prior to the date of our last monthly summary, the government forces were severely worsted in an engagement in the Yung-gan district, in which the combatants brought forth the elite on both sides. Following this battle, about the 20th or 30th ult., the rebels laid siege to the chief city of the district, called by one of our correspondents Hunmoo, which they took and sacked, mutilating, in a shocking manner, the district magistrate and his family, who, with a number of the principal inhabitants, refused to give in allegiance to the great King Tienteh. Of the inhabitants generally, great numbers were beheaded on refusal to forswear the Hienfung dynasty.

An extensive fire occurred at Canton on the 8th of October, which, it is said, destroyed some five hundred houses and a large quantity of property. The reports are very vague.

The Hong-Kong papers of the 30th of October state that severe typhoons had occurred in the China seas.

The Work of 1852.

Horace Greeley, Esq., delivered a Lecture in Brooklyn one evening last week, taking for his subject, "The Crystal Palace and its Lessons." The following is the concluding paragraph of the lecture:—

"But it is time the World's Fair were closed, or at least this meagre account of it. The year 1852 has sterner work in hand, in view of which this wondrous bazaar would be out of place and incongruous. Haul down, then, those myriad banners, now streaming peacefully in the common breeze, and flapping each other so lovingly; they shall full soon be confronted defiantly in the red field where the destinies of mankind must be decided, the liberties of nations lost and won. Roll out those lumbering cannon, sleeping side by side so torpidly, uncharged, unmounted, the playthings of idle boys and the gazing-stock of country clowns who wonder what they mean; their iron throats shall tell a fearful tale amid the steadfast ranks and charging columns of the Battle Summer before us. Grey veterans, from many lands, leaning on your rusty swords, and warming each other's recollections of Badajoz and Austerlitz, Leipsic and Quatre Bras, shake hands once more and part; for the skies are red with the gathering wrath of Nations, and air-borne whispers that Kossuth is free once more are troubling the sleep of tyrants. Royal butcher of Naples! you would not let your subjects visit or enjoy the Exhibition of 1851; rest assured that they will bear a part, and you with them, in that of 1852! False juggler of the Elysée Bourbon! beware the ides of May, and learn, while not too late, that Republican France has other uses for its armed sons than that of upholding sacerdotal despots on their detested thrones! Kingly perjurer of Prussia! you have sworn and broken the last oath to observe and maintain a liberal Constitution, to which your abused and betrayed People will ever harken from your lips! Grim Autocrat of the icy North! the coming summer has work in store for your relentless legions, not on the Danube alone, but on the Rhine, the Oder, the Vistula as well! Tear down, then, this fragile structure of glass and lath, too slight to breast the rugged shocks of the whirlwind year before us! Ere we meet again as Workers, to test the relative fineness of our rival fabrics, the strength and purity of our metals, the draft of our plows, we must vindicate by the mailed hand our Rights as Men to speak, and think, and be. Before us lowers the last, decisive struggle of the Millions of Europe for Justice, Opportunity and Freedom; let not its iron hail appall, its crimson torrents revolt us; for the Bow of Promise gleams through the lurid cloud, and the dove of Peace shall soon be seen hovering over she assuaging waters, fit harbinger of a new and more auspicious era for Freedom—enduring Concord—for Industry and Man!"

Cause of the Fire at the Capitol.

By the report of the architect, who has examined the Capitol with a view to ascertain the cause of the recent fire in the Library of Congress, it appears that the accident was caused by the timbers which formed the alcoves of the library having been inserted in the chimney-flues. The architect says:—

"On examining the holes in the brick wall, which have been exposed by the removal of the burnt timbers, I found an opening of about two inches by the thickness of a brick, into one of the flues, near where the fire was discovered. The chimneys from the lower rooms were then examined, and it was found that the flue from the room of the Committee of the Senate on Indian Affairs had been recently burnt out. A chimney-sweep was sent up this flue, and found the opening in the library alluded to. His voice was heard at the aperture in the chimney, and he brought down with him a portion of the burnt timber that had protruded into the flue.

"Large wood fires are made in the Committee-rooms very early every morning, and the rooms shut up until they are occupied by the Committees. This chimney must have taken fire while the room was thus closed, and burnt out without being observed, as mighty easily be the case with any of the chimneys in the building.

"After a careful examination of the subject, I am of opinion that the fate of the library depended on this chimney. If it had taken fire years ago, the result would have been the same. The timbers were too far above the fireplace to be set on fire in any other way than by the burning of the chimney, and such an event could not have occurred at any time without communicating fire to the library.

"The alcoves of the library were formed of timbers filled in with 'brick-nogging.' The horizontal pieces were let into the walls for the purpose of strengthening the structure, thus affording the means of communicating the fire to the vertical scantling, one of which was placed against the wall in each partition.

"The evidences of the fire having occurred in this way are too conclusive to admit of a doubt, and are sufficient to remove all censure from those who have charge of the building; no human forethought or vigilance could, under the ciscumstances, have prevented the catastrophe."

THE MOTHER AND SISTERS OF KOSSUTH.—We read in a letter from Pesth of Dec. 1st: "The house occupied by the mother and sisters of Kossuth, opposite the Karoly Palace, was surrounded in the night, and inquisitions were made in their apartments. Kossuth's sisters, Mesdames Rutthay and Messelengi, and the tutor of the latter's children, were afterwards removed to another part of the building. The mother of Kossuth obtained permission to remain in her apartment, but she was placed under the surveillance of the police. The tutor was subsequently put in irons."

The brig Globe, from Vera Cruz, arrived at New Orleans, reports a violent popular outbreak in the City of Mexico on the 16th inst., arising out of the passage of a law for the reduction of the tariff. The excitement was directed against foreigners, many of whose stores were destroyed, and several lives lost.

We have intelligence from all quarters of the country of sudden and menacing rising in the rivers, owing to the very rapid thawing of the ice. Much injury has resulted to bridges, piers, rafts and small craft.

The Democratic National Convention to nominate candidates for President and Vice President of the United States, is to assemble at Baltimore, on Tuesday, June 6th, 1852.

SUMMARY.

The demand of Government against J. Kelty Smith, formerly Navy Agent, in 1821, at New Orleans, now reaches, with the accumulated interest, $785,000. The funds of J. Kelty Smith and J. Chandler Smith, his son, in three Banks in New Orleans, and their stock in those Banks, have been enjoined. The son lives in Baltimore, and the father holds a power of attorney from him, for the transaction of business. Mr. Smith has made a large fortune as a money broker in New Orleans.

The Cleveland Plaindealer contains the particulars of the freezing to death of the driver of the stage between Buffalo and Erie, Pa., while on his seat driving. Another man was frozen to death in the town of Hamburgh, in a barn, whither he had sought refuge from the pitiless storm. We also hear of another death in the town of Evans, that of a lad who perished from cold while walking through the snow to school.

A woman by the name of Nosley was burned to death at Haverstraw, Rockland County, a few days ago, by her clothes taking fire. She was addicted to strong drink, and while standing near the stove with a bottle in her hand, some of the liquor fell on the stove, which instantly ignited and set fire to her dress, burning her almost to a crisp from her knees upward. She died the next morning, leaving a husband and three or four children.

The number of passengers conveyed over the New York and New Haven Railway during the months of July, August, September, October, and November, 1851, was 398,029. During the same months last year, the number was 352,853. Increase in five months this year, 46,076. The average number of passengers carried daily the present year is 2,400.

A number of German immigrants arrived at Latrobe, Pa., in the cars of the Pennsylvania Central Railroad, and were placed in a warehouse, without fire, until open wagons were got ready to convey them to Turtle Creek. On the way, horrible to relate, three women and an old man froze to death, and others of the party suffered severely.

At the sale of the Jarvis library, the Byzantine Historians sold for $475, to Prof. Ticknor; the Complutension Polyglott for $130, to Rochester University; the Paris Polygott for $100, to Geo. Livermore, of Boston; Muratori for $207, to the N. Y. Theological Seminary.

It is said there is an intention among the Arctic officers in England, to propose a national testimonial to Mr. Grinnell, for his noble and humane conduct in fitting out, at his own private expense, the Expedition to the Arctic Ocean in search of Sir John Franklin. The project will shortly be made public.

When Kossuth was in London he lodged at the house of Lieut. Massingberd, of the Blues. We learn that that officer has sold out his commission in the British Army, in order to put himself at the disposition of Kossuth for the approaching war. He is now in this country, having arrived by one of the last steamers.

There is almost a complete cessation in transactions in Land Warrants. The few outstanding Mexican Warrants are held at about $140, but the chances are so strong that the new warrants will be made assignable within a few weeks, that the demand is extremely limited.

An Indian paper, the Cherokee Advocate, says: Quite a fete came off in this place on Tuesday last. A jumping match between the Hon. Gen. Waddy Thompson, of South Carolina, and his Excellency John Ross, Principal Chief of the Cherokee Nation. The Principal Chief had the better of the contest by a few inches.

The extent to which gaming is carried at Hamburg, the German bathing place, may be understood from the fact that the cards used last season cost 6,000 florins, and the removal from the town of persons who had lost every thing by play, cost 36,000 florins.

The following is the weekly report of deaths in the City and County of New York from the 20th day of December to the 27th day of December, 1851: Men, 87; Women, 71; Boys, 136; Girls, 86. Total, 380.

A Temperance State Convention is called by Prof. Stowe, Neal Dow, and many other prominent temperance men, to meet at Augusta, Me., on the 21st of January inst.

Col. William Ward, Whig Representative elect from Worthington to the Massachusetts State Legislature, died on Saturday evening week. His wife died at Holyoke only the previous Sunday.

During the past year, there have been over 1,600,000 passengers carried over the City line of the Harlem Railroad, yielding a revenue of $96,060,18.

The Bank of Attica, which was burnt out at Buffalo, is reported to have saved all its assets excepting a keg of cents.

MARRIED.

Two Living Aztec Children.

A NEW AND ABSOLUTELY UNIQUE RACE OF MANKIND.—The most extraordinary and inexplicable phenomena that the history of the human race has yet produced, can be seen for a few weeks at the large Exhibition Room of the Society Library, corner of Broadway and Leonard-street. They were recently taken from a newly-discovered and idolatrous people in Central America, by whom they were kept with superstitious veneration, distinct and secluded as a caste of their priesthood, and employed as Mimes and Bacchanals in their Pagan ceremonies and worship.

They are male and female. The latter measuring 29½ inches in height, weighing 17 lbs.; the former is 33 inches high, and weighs 20 lbs.

From repeated and careful examination, the best Physiologists state the older to be 12 or 13 years of age; the younger about 10 years.

They differ altogether from examples of the dwarf kind, and from children; affording complete and undeniable illustration of a Piamean variety of the Human Race!

A Touching Story.

A few days since, a poor, yet decently clad female, presented herself at one of our police offices, and requested the magistrate to send her to the Alms-House. Her language and manner denoted that she had seen better days; and while she begged the officer to grant her last request, the tears in rapid course trickled down her furrowed cheeks, and her sobs checked her utterance, as she tried to tell her mournful story. The officer, as in duty bound, asked her name, when she replied in a manner that brought tears from the eyes of those sturdy minions of the law, whose hearts are necessarily steeled to pity and the finer feelings of the man.

"Ask me not my name," she said; "let me bear, in silence and unknown, the fate an inscrutable Providence has meted out to me; but let not aged parents, fond brothers, and loving sisters, hear that I have died the inmate of an alms-house, and the recipient of public charity."

"I will grant your desire," the magistrate replied, "but if I knew more of your history and circumstances, I might probably do something better for you."

"I will tell you what I dare tell you, if you will believe that I speak the truth, and use your influence to obtain for me some situation in which I can earn an honest living," was her impassioned reply.

The magistrate promised to do all he could for her, and alleviate her situation as much as possible.

"May Heaven bless you, sir!" she said, and told the following mournful and thrilling concatenation of suffering and perversity, commingled with sobs and the actual feelings of a woman:

"Two years ago, sir, I was happy, and knew not what it was to want; my parents were rich, and owned a large plantation in one of the Southern States; I was young, not twenty, but had my suitors, the sons of wealthy men; yet I loved them not. No one of the gaudy throng had as yet made an impression on my heart. There was in the neighborhood a poor but manly youth, the teacher of our district school; he visited our house, and was treated with all the respect and attention which other visitors received; and I—I, sir, fell in love with that man, and it was reciprocated. My father soon discovered our secret, and forbade him to cross his threshold again. Need I say more, sir? We met clandestinely, and were married—we fled, and took up our residence in this city. My husband—my William—taught an academy for a livelihood, and for eighteen months we were happy; but then my husband was taken sick, and he—he—died!—and I was left alone and among strangers. I wrote to my parents, asking their forgiveness—but—my—letters were returned unopened. My little means are exhausted, and I must starve, or—go to that refuge of poverty—the alms-house; but it will not last long; the sands of my life are nearly run out, and I look for a refuge for this world's miseries in—my grave!"

She ended, and every eye present was wet with sympathy for her unhappy situation. One gentleman, who was present, with that noble, generous and manly feeling, so characteristic of 'nature's noblemen,' came forward and offered her a home and asylum beneath his roof, which, we need not add, was cheerfully and thankfully received, and she left the office with the prospect of better if not happier days before her. Better Liquor.

One Paul Denton, a Methodist preacher in Texas, advertised a barbecue, with better liquor than is usually furnished. When the people were assembled, a desperado in the crowd cried out—"Mr. Paul Denton, your reverence has lied. You promised not only a good barbecue, but better liquor. Where's the liquor?"

"THERE!" answered the missionary, in tones of thunder, and pointing his motionless finger at the matchless double spring gushing up in two strong columns, with a sound like a shout of joy, from the bosom of the earth. "There!" he repeated with a look terrible as lightning, while his enemy actually trembled at his feet; "there is the liquor which God, the eternal, brews for his children. Not in the simmering still, over smoky fires, choked with poisonous gasses, surrounded with the stench of sickening odors and corruption, doth your Father in heaven prepare the precious essence of life—the pure cold water; but in the green glade and glassy dell, where the red deer wanders, and the child loves to play, there God brews it; and, down, low down in the deepest valleys, where the fountain murmurs and the rills sing; and high upon the mountain tops, where the naked granite glitters like gold in the sun, where the storm-cloud broods and the thunder storms crash, and away far out on the wide wild sea, where the hurricane howls music, and the big waves rolls the chorus, sweeping the march of God—there he brews it, that beverage of life, health-giving water. And everywhere it is a thing of life and beauty—gleaming in the dew-drop; singing in the summer rain; shining in the ice gem, till the trees all seemed turned to living jewels, spreading a golden veil over the setting sun, or a white gauze around the midnight moon; sporting in the cataract; dancing in the hail shower; sleeping in the glacier; folding its bright snow curtains softly about the wintry world, and weaving the many colored sky, that seraph's zone of the syren, whose warp is the rain drops of earth, whose woof is the sunbeam of heaven, all checked over with celestial flowers, by the mystic hand of refraction. Still always it is beautiful—that blessed life-water! no poisonous bubbles on its brink; its foam brings not madness and murder; no blood stains its liquid glass; pale widows and starving orphans weep not burning tears in its depths; no drunkard's shrinking ghost, from the grave, curses it in worlds of eternal despair! Speak out, my friends, would you exchange it for the demon's drink, alcohol?"

A shout, like the roar of a temptest, answered "No!"

The Indian's Reproof.

A Shoshone warrior possessed a beautiful mare; no horse in the prairie could outspeed her, and in the buffalo or bear hunt, she would enjoy the sport as much as her master, and run alongside the huge beast with great courage and spirit. Many propositions were made to the warrior to sell or exchange the animal, but he would not hear of it. The dumb brute was his friend, his sole companion; they had both shared the dangers of battle and the privations of prairie traveling; why should he part with her? The fame of that mare extended so far, that in a trip he made to San Francisco, several Mexicans offered him large sums of money; nothing, however, could shake him in his resolution. In those countries, though horses will often be purchased at the low price of one dollar, it often happens that a steed, well known as a hunter or rapid pacer, will bring sums equal to those paid in England for a fine race horse.

One of the Mexicans, a wild young man, resolved to obtain the mare, whether or no. One evening, when the Indian was returning from some neighboring plantation, the Mexican lay down in some bushes at a short distance from the road, and moaned as if in the greatest pain. The good and kind-hearted Indian having reached the spot, heard his cries of distress, dismounted from his mare and offered any assistance; it was nearly dark, and although he knew the sufferer to be a pale-face, yet he could not distinguish his features. The Mexican begged for a drop of water, and the Indian dashed into a neighboring thicket, to procure it for him. As soon as the Indian was sufficiently distant, the Mexican vaulted upon the mare, and apostrophized the Indian:

"You fool of a red-skin, not cunning enough for a Mexican; you refused my gold; now I have the mare for nothing, and I will make the trappers laugh, when I tell them how easily I have outwitted a Shoshone."

The Indian looked at the Mexican a few moments in silence, for his heart was big, and the shameful treachery wounded him to the very core. At last he spoke:

"Pale-face," said he, "for the sake of others, I may not kill thee. Keep the mare, since thou art dishonest enough to steal the only property of a poor man; keep her, but never say a word how thou camest by her; lest hereafter a Shoshone, having learned distrust, should not hearken to the voice of grief and woe. Away, away with her! let me never see her again, or in an evil hour the desire of vengeance may make a bad man of me."

The Mexican was wild, inconsiderate, and not over scrupulous, but not without feeling; he dismounted from the horse, and putting the bridle into the hand of the Shoshone, "Brother," said he, "I have done wrong, pardon me! from an Indian I learn virtue, and for the future, when I would commit any deed of injustice, I will think of thee."

The Working Card,

In the fall of my first year at ——, my church became anxious that we should have a protracted meeting, or some special effort for the salvation of sinners. For various reasons which I need not mention here, I was opposed to a protracted meeting at that time among my people.

In the course of the week, I prepared the following card:

"Resolutions adopted by the bearer of this card.

1. Resolved, That as I am a sinner, redeemed by the blood of Christ, I will do all that I can to save the souls for whom he died.

2. Resolved, That to prepare myself to do good to others, I will strive to have the same mind in me which was in Jesus Christ.

3. Resolved, That I will from time to time select from among my neighbors some one or more individuals with whom I will, in tenderness and affection, labor steadily, daily, if possible, or even many times a-day, until God shall either bring them to Christ or I shall be convinced that I should give them up.

4. Resolved, That I will carry those with whom I thus labor on my heart, and pray for them continually, and with them frequently, if they will permit me to do so.

5. Resolved, That while I labor, and pray for the salvation of sinners, I will depend alone on the Holy Ghost to make me successful in my work."

I had enough of these cards printed to supply every member of the church with a copy, and on the next Lord's day distributed them, with the understanding that so long as any individual should retain his card he should consider himself bound by the resolutions, and when he wished to be released from them he must return the card to me.

The next night after my distribution I was called from by bed to go and visit a distressed sinner, which was the commencement of a work of grace that continued with us all the fall and winter, and resulted, as I trust, in bringing many souls to a knowledge of the Saviour.

A reason that Christian labor with the impenitent is not more productive is, that it is so much scattered that the impression made by one visit is worn out before another is made, if made at all, and thus Satan has a fair opportunity of catching away the word out of the heart. But if the labor should be followed up every day, and the truth in this way kept burning upon the heart and conscience, the result would astonish the most sanguine laborer. He would find that God was not unfaithful to forget his work and labor of love, nor forgetful of the promise that he that should go forth weeping, bearing precious seed, should doubtless come again rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him. This is a kind of labor that we need at this day; it is one, too, that the weakest brother or sister in the church can perform, and one which will act upon those labored with, and re-act with power upon the heart and life of the laborer.

Let me entreat the Christian reader to try the experiment, and see if he will not water and be watered also himself.

Frst, Think much of your own obligation to Christ, and pray much to God to restore unto you the joys of his salvation, and uphold you by his free spirit, that you may be prepared to teach transgressors His ways, and that sinners may be converted unto him. Don't ask to have the joys of your salvation restored that you may be happy, but that you may be useful. Selfishness is the gangrenous part of the body of sin and death, and Christians should endeavor to keep it out of their hearts.

Secondly, Select from among your acquaintances one or more that you will be most likely to have an influence with, write their names in a book, and on your own heart, and in your labors and prayers with and for them, bear in mind that the redemption of their souls is precious, and that it will soon cease forever. This will keep you much at the throne of grace, and will increase and sweeten your communion with God, while it will elevate your Christian affections, and imbue your heart with the love of souls. [Rev. W. Wisner.

Commonsense versus Nonsense.

Dr. F. Tuthill delivered an address the other day before the Agricultural Society of Suffolk county, New York, and in the course of his remarks he touched upon "the false shame of labor" in the following manner:—

"The day has already come in our cities, that if a man, stout as Milo of old, has a load of wood brought to his door, and he really aches for the pleasure of handling it, yet he must hire a man to pitch it into the cellar, while he stands idly by, nor so much as touch a stick of it on pain of losing caste. If a stout and vigorous citizen, whose muscles swell with an excess of strength, has a load of wood lying on the sidewalk, he may as well hang himself up at once as be foolish enough to save a dollar and saw it up himself; yet if the man has pitched it in, and the grate is down, so that he shall not be seen, we are not sure but he may saw on till doomsday, and no one esteem him less a man and a gentleman. If he curry and tackle his own horse, or lead him to the stable when he has done with him, he is unpardonably vulgar. He would no sooner be caught carrying a trunk the length of a block to an omnibus, than stealing a body from the grave-yard; yet he will boast among his friends of the enormous weight he carries in the gymnasium, having paid the fee of thirty dollars a year for the privilege. And his friends applaud his gymnastic expenditure as wise and exceedingly judicious, 'for sure,' they say, 'how can a man live without exercise?' In short, labor, that promises the end of economy, is an abominable thing; that which advertises their imbecility is a source of pride. These soft-handed gentry may be our sons and brothers, but we fancy they must at times feel ashamed of our common father, old Adam, who farmed it in Paradise."

How Cattle Kill Trees.

It is a noticeable fact, that a tree ever so thrifty, and whatever kind, to which cattle gain access, and under which they become habituated to stand, will very soon die. In the case of a solitary shade tree in a pasture, or by the road side, this is of common occurrence. The query may have been suggested, to what this is owing. In the first place, rubbing a tree by the necks of cattle is highly pernicious, and if persisted in, it will commonly destroy them sooner or later; but if the body of the tree be cased so that their necks cannot touch it, death will ensue just as certainly if they are allowed to tramp the earth about it. But why should tramping the earth destroy the tree? The reason is one of wide and important application to the laws of vegetable growth. The roots of plants need air, if not as much, yet just as truly, as the leaves and branches. Their case is analogous to that of fishes, which though they must have water must have air also: viz. just about as much as permeates the water. If it be all shut off, so that none which is fresh can get to them, they will exhaust the supply on hand, and then die for want of more.

So the roots of trees and vegetables want air. When the earth is in a natural condition it is full of interstices and channels by which air gets at them. But if the cattle are allowed to tramp down the earth, and the sun aids their work by baking it at the same time, a crust like a brick is formed, wholly impervious to the atmosphere, and the tree yields to its fate. So a tree cannot live if its roots are covered with a close pavement. They will struggle for life by creeping to the surface and hoisting out a brick here and a stone there, or find a crack where their noses can snuff a little breath; but if fought down and covered over will finally give it up. So if a tree be thrust into a close clay, or its roots are kept under water, it refuses either to be an aquatic or to put up with its aluminous poison. It will grow as little as possible, and die the first opportunity. [Prairie Farmer.

Transfusion of Blood.

An interesting, and thus far successful, experiment upon the transfusion of blood, was made some days since at the Hotel-Dieu of Lyons. A woman was brought into the hospital who had been seized with violent hemorrhage, the consequence of a premature delivery. Her condition seemed desperate: it presented all the symptoms of the agony that follows great loss of blood—entire absence of color in the skin, paralysis of the limbs, almost complete blindness, but extraordinary rapidity of the pulse. Death appeared imminent, inevitable.

Doctor Delorme suggested transfusion. This was at first combatted by the other physicians as offering no chance of success, but was finally assented to, as, the case being a desperate one, it could do no harm, even if it did no good. One of the young aspirants, residing in the hospital, offered to furnish the blood necessary for the operation. A syringe was immersed in warm water and kept there till it became of a temperature a little higher than that of blood in circulation. The proper vein in the arm of the sufferer was then opened, and a fine canula, or tube, was introduced to some length. The other end of the tube was then fitted to the syringe, which was enveloped in warm towels, and in which was the necessary quantity of pure human blood. The operator then gently forced into the veins of the dying woman the revivifying fluid.

At this moment, as she afterwards declared, she felt a grateful warmth spread over her body, without having the reasoning faculty strong enough to trace it to any cause. Soon after, she recovered in a great degree her senses and eyesight. A few hours later, a reaction manifested itself so violently, that the physicians were seriously alarmed. It seemed as if death might result as well from too much, to active vitality, as from vatality too much exhausted and enfeebled. But a calming potion soon diminished this natural action, and the patient has since been regularly improving. The last intelligence from Lyons states that it is now hardly possible that a relapse can occur, and that the cure may be set down as complete.

The Force of Lightning.

The following curious and dangerous effects of lightning may not be familiar to many who witness its grand and awful exhibitions:

A person may be killed by lightning, although the explosion takes place at the distance of twenty miles, by what is called the back stroke. Suppose that the two extremities of a cloud, highly charged with electricity, hang down towards the earth; they will repel the electricity from the earth's surface, if it be of the same kind with their own, and will attract the other kind; and if a discharge should suddenly take place at one end of the cloud, the equilibrium will be instantly restored by a flash at the point of the earth which is under the other. Though the back store is often sufficiently powerful to destroy life, it is never so terrible in its effects as the direct shot, which is frequently of inconceivable intensity.

Instances have occurred in which large masses of iron and stone, and even many feet of stone wall, have been conveyed to a considerable distance by a stroke of lightning. Rocks and the tops of mountains often bear the marks of fusion from its action, and occasionally vertical tubes, descending many feet into banks of sand, mark the path of the electric fluid. Several years ago, Dr. Fielder exhibited several of these fulgorites in London, of considerable length, which had been dug out of the sandy plains of Silesia and Eastern Prussia. One found at Banderborn was forty feet long. The ramifications generally terminate in pools or springs of water below the sand, which are supposed to determine the electricity of the fluid. No doubt the soil and substrata must influence its direction, since it is found by experience, that places which have been struck by lightning are often struck again. A school house in Lammers Muir, East Lothian, has been struck three different times

Costly Laces, &c.

Much has been said on the extravagances and temptations of this city; but few realize the amount of money spent in luxuries of dress, by the ladies, unless they have the good (or ill) fortune to belong to a wife, sister or aunt, who, after a morning passed "down town," will condescend, while making your tea, to give an account of her day's "shopping," and perhaps of the purchases of her acquaintances also. There is a department in Stewart's marble palace, of whose wonders that "domestic man" will be sure to hear some time in his life, the room appropriated to that useless, cob-web-like fabric, so inexplicable to us, but so fascinating in its beauties to our fair friends, termed lace. A very obliging gentleman showed us, last week, some goods in this line, of marvelous texture and price, certainly, over which all the ladies present were indulging in raptures, to us most amusingly ridiculous. "Splendid," "magnificent," "oh! if I had several thousands to do what I choose with, how soon it would go there." "Well, if I have a weakness in the world, it is for real lace," &c. Astonishment was not lessened as we saw collars for $60, narrow laces for $50, $60, even $80, by the yard, offered for inspection, and pocket handkerchiefs for $150 only, held up to view. These, we were informed, were costly articles indispensable to a bride's trousseau—and, in addition, veils were brought forth, in price varying from 3, to 4, $500; and "a set of bridal lace," consisting of the veil, bertha, sleeves, and two flounces, for twelve hundred dollars, was displayed, which made us inwardly rejoice that the groom did not have to pay for the bride's clothes, but tremble, also, as we looked down upon the vista of years, and remembered that papas were the sufferers in such cases. These laces are termed Guimpure, Brussels, Hointon, Point, (so called from being wrought with points of needles merely) Valenciennes, &c., &c., according to their style of texture. [Express.

Pitcairn's Island.

The following is extracted from the notes of a visit by the Commander of the Cockatrice, British man-of-war, to this Island, now inhabited by the descendants of the mutineers of the British ship Bounty:—

Some of the women accompanied us, and entertained me very much by their lively and cheerful conversation. I learned from it, that they do the most laborious work, such as preparing the ground for planting, digging potatoes and yams, which they have to carry some distance to their houses by rough and precipitous paths. They also thatch the roofs, cook, wash, and attend to other domestic duties, while the men are employed in building houses, and in other mechanical work, as well as fishing, and hunting goats. The children have not much attention paid to them, after they are able to run about; when they are seven years old they are sent to school, and attend regularly until fourteen. Consequently there is not a soul on the island that cannot read and write, most of them are exceedingly intelligent and well-informed; indeed, much more so than it is possible to conceive from their isolation and little intercourse with the world.

But what must strike strangers more than anything else, is the happy manner in which they live together; there does not appear to be a jealousy or bad thought existing among them; the women, in particular, are very fond of each other; such a thing as a quarrel between them never occurs; and nothing can happen to any one on the island without its being a source of grief to all, they are so knit together by friendship and love.

A magistrate is appointed yearly by a majority of votes; all, both male and female, above eighteen years of age, are voters. He has the management of the affairs of the Island, and settles disputes, with the assistance of a jury if necessary. Should any decision be deemed unsatisfactory, they do not quarrel over it, but let the subject drop, and refer it by mutual consent to the captain of the first man-of-war that visits them, with the express understanding that his decision is final. The magistrate takes charge of any spirituous liquors that may be given them by ships visiting the island, and issues a small portion to any one who wishes it on holidays, of which they have but two in the year, one to celebrate the arrival of the Bounty in January, the other the Queen's birthday—by this means drunkenness is entirely avoided. However, they are not addicted to it. I was told by Author Quintal, that such a crime had not taken place for thirteeen years.

Milk Rooms in Cellars.

Farmers about to build a dwelling, should know that by carrying a large flue in the chimney's back from the cellar, and having a window or two opening to the house out of the cellar, they can have as good a milk room under their house as could be made over a spring, that may be perhaps two hundred yards or one-fourth of a mile off, which is so unpleasant to go in bad weather, especially by the female portion of the family.

The floor should be flagged with stone, as they can be kept sweeter or colder than even cement or brick, which absorb "spilt milk," and thus taint the atmosphere. The walls and ceilings should be plastered to facilitate white-washing and cleansing. Nothing but milk and cream should be kept in the room, as a pure atmosphere for cream to rise in, is absolutely necessary for the making of sweet butter.

What is needed to have a cool, sweet cellar, is a current of air, which will be secured by the aforesaid flue, and the open windows, as a strong current of air is at least ten degrees colder than the same air at rest. [Econ.

DEATH OF MARSHAL SOULT.—Marshal Soult died at St. Armand, his native place, on the 26th of November. In his demise, Fance loses one of the greatest of those great men, whose glory was absorbed and appropriated so largely by the Emperor Napoleon. Nicholas Jean de Dieu Soult was born March 29, 1769; entered the army in 1785; was raised from the ranks in 1790; served in the campaign of Marengo as a General of Division; was named Marshal of France at the establishment of the Empire in 1804; commanded in Eylau; opposed Wellington in Spain, and participated in most of the transactions of the imperial era. After a period of disgace with the Bourbons, he was restored to his honors and offices by Charles X. At the revolution of 1830 he was again temporarily deprived of his baton; but the House of Orleans, as complaisant as the Bourbons, once more returned it to him. Of his subsequent history there is little occasion to speak, as it has been a part of the newspaper history of the times. After the Revolution of February, he withdrew entirely from public life, and died peacefully at home at St. Armand, surrounded by his devoted friends and family, just in time to escape the disastrous news of another revolution. A WORD TO IDLERS.—A person once called and introduced himself by saying that "he was come to spend an idle hour with Mr. Benson." "Be assured," said that eminent man, "that Mr. Benson has no idle hours to spend. He never has any idle hours. From seventeen to eighteen hours he spends every day either in reading, studying, writing, praying, or preaching. Besides, he is going to preach this evening; and he mostly spends an hour upon his knees before he goes into the pulpit." With some degree of confusion, the person withdrew; and it is hoped that he learned, by the mode of his reception, never again to disturb ministers when they are preparing to preach, or to imagine that they have idle hours to spend with idle people who are not conscious of the value of time.

Variety.

The lectures before the Smithsonian Institution, this winter, are to be delivered by Dr. Kane, subject, the Arctic Expedition; Prof. Agassiz, subject, Theology; Prof. Silliman, subject, Geology; and President Hopkins, of Williams College, and Prof. Rogers, of the University of Virginia, of whose subjects we are not apprized. Other distinguished scientific and literary gentlemen have been invited, and are expected to lecture during the season.

The Board of Aldermen of New York, by a vote of sixteen to one, have passed a resolution granting to E. Riddle, Esq., and his associates, the use of Madison Square, for the purpose of erecting thereon a building composed entirely of iron and glass, for an "Industrial Exhibition of all Nations." The building will be six hundred feet long, with a width of two hundred feet, and covered with a semi-cylindrical dome seventy feet in hight.

At the stated meeting of the Committee of the American Tract Society, on Monday, it appeared by the statement of the Treasurer, that the receipts from all sources for the past month were but $12,352, while the expenditures were about twice that amount, thus increasing the indebtedness in notes for printing paper, payable within six months, to $41,035, beside immediate liabilities amounting to $4,501.

Messrs. Gilbert, Secor, Dakins & Co., are constructing a dry dock for the Government, which, after being put together here, is to be taken apart and shipped for San Francisco. It is to be in sections, and when completed it will be capable of taking in the largest vessels in the Navy. It will be finished in about four months, and its cost here will be about $500,000.

Tobacco continues to be a Government monopoly in France. The contract for 1852 has been advertised. It is to embrace 2,250 hhds. Virginia, 4,000 hhds. Kentucky, and 4,000 hhds. Maryland. Total 10,250 hhds., or 5,700,000 Kilogrames. The contract is usually divided between the shipping ports of Richmond, New-Orleans, and Baltimore.

We find in a journal of Pesth, of October last, the official sentence of death upon 38 Hungarians for high treason; of these, 7 were unconditionally pardoned; the punishment of 6 was commuted to 19 years' imprisonment, 13 get 6 years' imprisonment, 7 receive 4 years' imprisonment, and 4 were commuted to 2 years. The sole crime of these men was patriotism.

Pottawattomie county, in Iowa, is offered for sale—that is, all the valuable claims and improvements of that portion of the county owned and occupied by the Mormon population. The Mormons are about to make a general move from that place in the spring. It is the best point for producing in all the West, and the best market on the frontier.

Daguerrean Gallery.

GURNEY'S Daguerrean Gallery, No. 189 Broadway, has been known for years as one of the first establishments of the kind in the United States, and the oldest in the city of New York. He has recently greatly enlarged his Gallery by the addition of more rooms and large skylights, and other improvements, rendering it one of the most extensive establishments in this country. Mr. G. attends personally to his sitters, and from his great experience in the art he is enabled, at all times, to give perfect satisfaction. The large-sized pictures recently taken by his new process are universally acknowledged superior to any heretofore taken in this country. A large collection can be seen at all hours of the day. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to examine them.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year commences the last Wednesday in August, and closes the last Tuesday in June of each year.

Board of Instruction.

Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal,
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress,
Rev. J W. MORTON, } Assistants.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, }

The Terms for 1851 and 1852 are as follows:—
The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.
" Second " Dec. 3 " " March 16.
" Third " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one of two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term, Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.

Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS:

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00
Drawing,	1 00
Monochromatic Painting,	3 00
Oil Painting,	5 00
Writing and Stationery,	0 50
Vocal Music, Elementary,	1 00
Advanced Class,	2 00
Instrumental Music,	8 00

Use of Organ or Piano, $2 00 per quarter.

BOARD, in private families, per week, from $1 25 to $1 50; in clubs, from 60 to 90 cents.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall Term, and at the middle of the Winter Term, and continue seven weeks. The course will embrace a thorough review of the common school branches, with daily lectures on "The Art of Teaching," Chemistry, Physiology, Laws of Health, School Laws, &c., &c. Tuition $2 50.

Students should not be furnished with unnecessary pocket-money, neither should minors be allowed to contract debts in the village. Either member of the Faculty will superintend the financial affairs of pupils placed under their care, by special direction from parents and guardians, if funds are furnished in advance.

THE SABBATH & THE RESURRECTION.

From "An Examination of the Authority for a Change of the Weekly Sabbath at the Resurrection of Christ; proving that the Practice of the Church in substituting the First Day of the Week for the appointed Seventh Day, is unsanctioned by the New Testament Scriptures. By JAMES A. BEGG, Author of a Connected View of the Scripture Evidence of Christ's Speedy Return, &c." [Continued.

Although the Law prescribed the day on which the First Fruits of the Passover Feast were to be offered, yet the period of the day is not so appointed. This, in practice, however, we may believe would be regulated personally by Aaron's sons and successors, under divine guidance. We know, as exhibited in extracts previously given, that, in fact, the offering was made very early in the morning. The very absence of regulation in the Law, in this respect, if wholly left to themselves, would, looking at the consequences dependant on the acceptance of the offering, naturally lead them to adopt an early hour. In the quotation given from Calmet, it, however, appears, that particular care was taken by the deputies, that even the preparatory night work, of reaping the sheaf, should not be commenced until "sunset" had fully shown to all, that the 16th day had actually commenced. The offering itself, being a morning one, as it was also only annual, necessitated, if the sheaf were to be presented before the usual morning sacrifice, that it must have been very early in the morning, as we have seen it really was.

In this respect, also, however, type and Antitype have an exact accordance. We read that, "very early in the morning," the women, who came with the spices they had prepared, "found the stone rolled away from the sepulchre." Luke xxiv. 1. God had already raised his Son from the dead, although, as appears from another of the Evangelists, this was "as it began to dawn." Matt. xxviii. 1. The narrative by Mark reads, "Very early in the morning"—explained farther as being at "the rising of the sun." Mark xvi. 1. In John's Gospel the earliness of the hour is stated still more strongly, if possible. There we read that Mary Magdalene came "early, when it was yet dark, unto the sepulchre, and seeth the stone taken away from the sepulchre." John xx. 1. Darkness, as well as light, is comparative; but by associating, as he here does, the fact of its being "early" as well as "dark," we are taught that it is the darkness not of night, but of the morning, of which the Evangelist speaks—that it was indeed the dawn. Thus, each of the Evangelists testify to the fact, that the resurrection of Christ was indeed very early in the morning; corresponding thus again with minute accuracy with that type which men labored during the night to prepare, that they might at the earliest hour of morning be ready to offer—the acceptance of which betokened the fullness of Jehovah's blessing yet to come.

But we have still to consider the statements of the Evangelists, relative to the day on which the resurrection took place; and to endeavor to show, that the symbol and the prophecy which declared that Christ would be "three days and three nights in the heart of the earth," are not inconsistent with the inspired narratives as to the fact when fulfilled. For we cannot too strenuously insist on the fact, that Christ's truth demands a very different accomplishment of a prediction given by himself to His enemies in evidence of His doubted or denied Messiahship. The form of expression used is one not frequently used in Scripture; but, in every instance in which it is used, it seems truly designed to give fullness or intensity to the declaration in which it occurs—pointing attention to the fact, that in the computation, the number of nights is to be equally regarded as that of the days. Thus it presents itself to the mind in regard to Jonah, whose case the Saviour uses in illustration of His own; so, also, in the case of a famished Egyptian, who "had eaten no bread, nor drunk any water, three days and three nights." 1 Sam. xxx. 12. The full extent of this man's privation seems to be more definitely and emphatically expressed, in saying, not merely that he had been without bread and water three days, but that he had been so "three days and three nights." Again, when it is stated of the Saviour himself, that "He had fasted forty days and forty nights," (Matt. iv. 2,) we are not to suppose that reference to "nights" as well as "days," is an unmeaning addition, or a form of expression not requiring us to believe it actually includes nights, but rather as more emphatically fixing our attention on the real extent of that fast. And when Paul says, "A night and a day have I been in the deep," (2 Cor. xi. 25,) he leaves us no room to imagine that his sufferings on that occasion were not truly a "night," as well as a "day." On the contrary, we infer that we should really have an incomplete idea of their extent, if we did not as truly take into account those by night as intended to be observed and believed, when so brought before us.

The same principle applies, and with equal force, to the language of our Lord, on the occasion referred to, concerning His duration in the tomb. And the very accurate correspondence which we have observed hitherto between the type and Antitype, even in particulars so minute as to be quite remarkable, leads us to expect that still there must be the same accordance, whether or not we can find it. If, in this respect, we are at fault, better to confess ignorance than indulge in conjecture. Imagination, in every case, when dealing with God's word, requires to be kept under restraint. It would be to allow it a very undue place, indeed, if, by its indulgence, we should occasion a disturbance of the obviously true relation in which the death and resurrection of Christ are seen to stand towards each other, in those typical events which God gave expressly to prefigure both; and to which the Saviour himself, as well as His apostles, appealed, as both intended and fitted to convey clearly to His church, the information required.

Both, we believe, will be found in strict accordance with the language employed in the narratives of the several Evangelists concerning the morning of resurrection, which we trust, the reader may now be better able to understand. Peculiar as the phraseology employed really is, there is a very marked agreement among them, in what relates immediately to the time of Christ's rising from the dead. "Into one of Sabbaths," is the literal translation of Matthew's words, (eis mian Sabbaton,) but grammatically requiring a supplementary noun, agreeing in gender with one, (mian) which Sabbaton does not. Most commentators are agreed that day, (hemera) is the supplement required. In Mark's Gospel, the only difference is, that the definite article the (tes) is prefixed, "the one of Sabbaths." Luke otherwise the same, has also the article prefixed; and John uses the same words, in the same order.

These are the literal renderings, for it will be remembered that the Evangelists, and likewise the other inspired penmen of the New Testament use the words for "one," and "Sabbath," which our translators, in the instances relating to the resurrection of Christ, have rendered "first" and "week," making a different sense from the ordinary one, a different sense even from that which, in the authorized version itself, they are usually made to bear. "Mia" is always employed by the Evangelists themselves, (and it is their usage we require to know,) for the cardinal number "one," and not the ordinal "first," while "Sabbaton" is the noun they uniformly use to express the Sabbath, weekly and festival. Dickenson, in his Greek Testament, we have seen, so far accords with these facts, that, in reference to the three latter Gospels, he understands both these words in their proper signification, and supplying not only day (hemera) but also from (apo,) he thus reads, But the one day from the Sabbath, (Te de mia hemera apo Sabbaton.) Nor is he singular in this—for to those who so translate these words, it seems necessarily to follow that one day from the Sabbath, must be the first day of the week—they not observing, what we have so fully proved, that the Sabbath referred to was not the weekly one, but that "that Sabbath day was an high day." Beza, accordingly (on Matt. xxviii. 1,) interprets it thus—"the day next after the Sabbath," which he adds, "we call the Lord's day." Bagster, also, adopts this view, with the same understanding.

The clause is indeed difficult to render; as it is very peculiar even in the original. The difference of idiom between Greek and English, often necessitates a free rather than a literal translation, to express the true meaning in an intelligible form; but this is not the only cause of obscurity in the case before us. Still, in the translations and paraphrases of the commentators we have named, it is to be observed that there is no account made of the fact to which we have formerly adverted, and of which we must still remind the reader, that in all the instances given above from the several Evangelists, respecting the morning of the resurrection, the word Sabbath is not in the singular, but in the plural, SABBATHS—which, therefore, with the supplementary words proposed by others, would read, "One day from Sabbaths." Accordingly, in the Hamiltonian Interlinear Literal Translation of Matthew's Gospel, it is actually thus given, "to the dawning into one of Sabbaths," as a faithful literal rendering. So, also, in the translation of John's Gospel, according to the same system, the parallel text is also rendered with "Sabbaths," in the plural, as the literal translation likewise of that text.

The first clause of the first verse of the 28th chapter of Matthew's Gospel, as formerly we have remarked, is connected by Griesbach with the last verse of the preceding chapter, and is therefore so introduced among his Various Readings, in Bagster's Greek version of his Pollyglott New Testament. Not, however, seeing or adopting this method of removing a confessed difficulty, yet giving attention to the fact, that, in the Original, the word rendered in the common version, Sabbath, is even in that first clause of Matt. xxviii. 1, really "Sabbaths," in the plural, in Poole's Annotations, a rather remarkable interpretation has been based upon it. "In the end of the Sabbath," are the words of our translation; and Poole, upon the clause, says, "which in the Greek signifies 'in the evening of the Sabbaths,' the end of the week." For, he supposes here, "all the days of the week Sabbaths," giving credit to "our translators," (we know not to whom he refers,) who, he says, "translate it well, 'in the end of the Sabbaths;' the evening or night following the Sabbaths, following the seventh day, which was the Sabbath." For, singular as it does appear, he would call "all the days of the week Sabbaths," adding, "the first of the Sabbath, the second of the Sabbath, &c." While, therefore, in the one clause, he proposes to call all the days of the week "Sabbaths," in the explanatory clause following, he substitutes "for all the days of the week" which were thus to be individually so called "Sabbaths," the idea of "week," or Sabbath in the singular, for all the days together, making one "the first of the Sabbath," and the next, "the second of the Sabbath." But as we have shown that mia signifies one rather than first, we should thus really have in the several accounts given in the different gospels, a reference not to "the first day of the week," but only to some one undefined, or indeterminate day of the week—either "one of the Sabbaths," or "one day of the week"—without stating which day that was, whether first or fourth.

THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

To those who have paid any attention to the prophecies, it is evident that we are entering an important epoch in the history of the world. Great and glorious promises are made to the church, to commence about this time. As it regards the prophecy of Daniel, it is now in the feet of the image, and the last chapter in the history of worldly monarchies is rapidly developing itself. The feet and toes are of iron and clay; they are partly strong and partly weak. They have attempted by various means to coalesce, but it is impossible. The clay and iron will not mingle; and no one great and overshadowing monarchy is to result from the efforts of despotism. The principles of monarchy and democracy are perhaps equally diffused throughout the ten kingdoms on which the image rests. The "turns and overturns" which are taking place are uprooting the principles of absolutism, and preparing the world for the kingdom of the stone that is to smite the image in the feet. Indeed, the heavings of the nations give evidence that the image is already smitten, and "totters to its fall." Absolutism must give way to a democracy that acknowledges no sovereign but Christ, before His kingdom will become established and fill the earth. Christians can not fail to look with interest on the developments now making; and if they give credit to the general prediction that these two opposing principles are about to decide the contest by a general and sanguinary conflict, the result must be contemplated as of overwhelming importance.

To the question, Should our American States mingle in the contest? the answer should be, If it be the will of God that the present heavings of the nations, like the premonitions of a moral earthquake, shall give birth to a state of improved security to civil and religious liberty, we cannot wish to be neutral, nor would we desire to be merely spectators of the strife. If blood must flow for the regeneration of the nations, why should we be exempt from contributing our quota in so righteous a cause? Has not God made of one blood all the nations of the earth? And we are certainly, with all our democracy, involved in the charge of oppressing humanity.

With respect to the means to be used by Divine Providence to bring about this glorious state of things, when the gigantic prophetic image (the representation of the powers of absolute and despotic governments) shall fall, we are not careful. God's ways are right, and all His subjects will rejoice in their consummation. With pleasure we should contemplate every blow that seems aimed at that doomed tyranny and oppression—that is likely to hasten the fall of this colossal statue. Perhaps the apostle of civil and religious liberty, the illustrious Hungarian, now in our midst, may be, in the hands of God, a chosen instrument to strike the most effectual blow to the image that has ever smitten it in the feet, and like Cyrus of old be acknowledged as His messenger, chosen to execute His will, and stir up the nations to prepare for the fifth and last monarchy, the glory of all governments, and the consummation of all that is desirable on earth. His reputation for purity of principle, his highly evangelical religious character, coupled with his hatred of oppression, his exalted patriotism, his clear views as a statesman of the means of obtaining and securing civil and religious liberty, point him out as the most extraordinary man of the age. And may we not hope for results that shall be honorable to God, and substantially promote the happiness of man? J. M.

LUTHER AND HIS MAID-SERVANT.

Luther had a domestic residing in his house by the name of Elizabeth, who, in a fit of displeasure, left, without giving the family any notice. She subsequently fell into habits of immorality, and became dangerously ill. In her sickness she requested a visit from Luther. On taking his seat at her bed-side, he said:—

"Well, Elizabeth, what is the matter?"

"I desire," she replied, "to ask your pardon for leaving your family so abruptly; but I have something else weighing very heavily on my conscience, I have given away my soul to Satan!"

"Why," rejoined Luther, "that's of no great consequence. What else?"

"I have," continued she, "done many wicked things, but this is what most oppresses me, that I have deliberately sold my poor soul to the devil, and how can such a crime ever find mercy?"

"Elizabeth, listen to me," rejoined the man of God. "Suppose, while you lived in my house, you had sold and transferred all my children to a stanger, would the sale or transfer have been lawful or binding?"

"O, no," said the deeply humbled girl, "for I had no right to do that."

"Very well, you had still less right to give your soul to the arch-enemy; it no more belongs to you than my children do. It is the exclusive property of the Lord Jesus Christ; he made it, and when lost also redeemed it; it is his, with all its powers and faculties, and you can't give away or sell what is not yours; if you have attempted it, the whole transaction was unlawful, and is entirely void. Now do you go to the Lord, confess your guilt with a broken heart and a contrite spirit, and entreat him to pardon you and take back again what is wholly his own. And as to the sin of attempting to alienate his rightful property, throw that back upon the devil, for that and that alone is his."

The girl obeyed, was converted, and died full of faith and hope. [Lutheran Observer.

WHERE SHALL THE SOUL FIND REST?

Written by Lady Flora Hastings, the victim of a cruel slander originating among the Maids of Honor of Queen Victoria.

Tell me, ye winged winds,
That round my pathway roar,
Do ye not know some spot
Where mortals weep no more?
Some lone and pleasant dell,
Some valley in the West,
Where, free from toil and pain,
The weary soul may rest?
The loud wind dwindled to a whisper low,
And sighed for pity as it answered—"No!"

Tell me, thou mighty deep,
Whose billows round me play,
Know'st thou some favorite spot,
Some Island far away,
Where weary man may find
The bliss for which he sighs,
Where sorrow never lives,
And Friendship never dies?
The loud waves rolling in perpetual flow,
Stopped for awhile, and sighed to answer—"No!"

And thou serenest moon,
That with such holy face,
Dost look upon the earth,
Asleep in night's embrace;
Tell me, in all thy round
Hast thou not seen some spot,
Where miserable man
Might find a happier lot?
Behind a cloud the moon withdrew in wo,
And a voice sweet, but sad, responded—"No!"

Tell me, my secret soul,
Oh! tell me, Hope and Faith,
Is there no resting-place,
From sorrow, sin and death?
Is there no happy spot,
Where mortals may be blest,
Where grief may find a balm,
And weariness a rest?
Faith, Hope, and Love—best boons to mortals given—
Waved their bright wings, and whispered—"Yes! in Heaven!"

MOSAIC ACCOUNT OF THE CREATION.

"Thus the heavens and the earth were finished, and all the host of them. And on the seventh day God ended his work which he had made; and he rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made. And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it, because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made." Gen. 2: 1—3.

The apostolic caution, "Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ," was never more needed than at this moment, owing to the insidious effects and pretensions of geological science. Although many of its supporters are the avowed friends of Divine revelation, we must consider them as deceived by the accomplishments and reputation of men distinguished in the science of geology, and who, not contented with its legitimate province, go far beyond it, compelling revelation to bend to their speculations, without regard to the disastrous consequences to which it is thereby subjected.

Among other subjects which geology has attacked is the time specified by Moses as employed by Johovah in the creation of the world. Geologists would have the period of six days to be understood as embracing periods of vast duration, not to be comprehended by our feeble powers.

But the scriptural account refers, it is very evident, to six diurnal periods, the writer intending that it should be so understood, intimating no difference whatsoever as to their length, between them and that of the seventh diurnal period—the latter being only marked as that period on which nothing was created, the work of the preceding six days presenting a perfect and entire organization of creation, so that each preceding day had the perfecting of its peculiar work. This is plainly asserted by the Divine Word as applicable to every department of creation. "The Lord God made the earth and the heavens, and every plant of the field before it was in the earth, and every herb of the field before it grew."

It is very evident, then, that on this principle, (its immediate perfection by the Word of God,) creation in all its parts was effected, so that long periods of time, as geologists assert, were not necessary, neither were they employed in creation. We might as well contend for periods of time as necessary for the growth of plants and herbs, which are said to have been created before they grew, or even were in the field, as contend for periods of time as necessary for the creation of the different strata on the earth's surface. What was created, was created by the Word of God, "so that things which are seen were not made of things which do appear." Creation, in all its parts, being a series of stupendous miracles accomplished by the simple fiat of God, and applicable to all that is on the earth's surface, as well as to that which is not immediately cognizant by our sense, but essential for the welfare and comfort of his creatures. I here allude, not to formations which are undoubtedly effected by time, under the influence of chemical action, since creation, but to those formations on which the great age of creation is predicated by geologists.

If, as must be admitted by all who receive the Scriptures as the Word of God, Jesus of Nazareth, in his pre-existent state, was the great Creator, and if he, while on earth, displayed his creating power without the intervention of laws of production or of reproduction, why should it be thought a thing incredible that he formed the earth just as it is stated as regards time in the Mosaic account of the creation? The loaves and fishes with which he fed five thousand men, besides women and children, were not produced by the laws of production, for he created fishes which never swam, and bread from grain which never grew. Those came from his hand as fast as they could be distributed to the famishing multitude, and, if so, why should the diurnal period of time, according to the Mosaic account of the creation, not be sufficient for the production of the various phenomena of creation in the geoligical structure of the earth's surface? The Divine fiat, and not time, being all that was requisite, according to the statement of the writer of the book of Genesis, and all that was employed by the great Creator.

Some geologists, who would like to retain the assumptions of their science as to the period of time in creating, and reconcile them with the Mosaic account, would refer it to the period occupied by the re-organization of the earth, fitting it for the reception of man, and not to its first origin. But this goes on the ground that God must needs have had laws to effect his purpose in creation, and by so doing they limit the omnipotent God, whose power was just as equal to the task of creating at once, as of giving to matter a certain period of time to effect his purposes.

In conclusion, had long periods of time been employed in creation, there would have been little or no force in constituting a diurnal period as comprehending the Sabbatical institution, the force of the observance of the institution lying in that the work of creating occupied just six of these diurnal periods, as in the text that heads this article, and not long, interminable periods of time, God requiring, after his own example, a cessation from labor after that of six diurnal periods, namely, the seventh comprehending the institution. And this very reason is assigned when the Divine institute was again promulgated from Sinai: "For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it."

Thus do we dispose of the opposition of geological science to Divine revelation, by an appeal to the Word of God itself in support of its own statements. It asserts that the work of creation was a miracle, and unless we are prepared to give eternity to matter, it is just as reasonable to conclude that the world was made in six days, and at the period specified by Moses (as thousands of millions of years ago) when the eternal God thought fit to command its existence. We have no objection that geology should drill and bore the earth for its own legitimate purposes, but would protest against its pretended discoveries being reared and shaped into a science to invalidate the teachings of the Bible as to the period of creation and the manner of creating. "Let God be true, and every man a liar." J. J.

MRS. HEMANS AND THE PILGRIMS.

At the late meeting of the Cape Cod Association, Rev. Charles Brooks being called on, spoke as follows:—

Mr. Chairman,—In replying to your call, I have thought it might not be uninteresting to state the cause and occasion of the writing of that popular little poem on the "Landing of the Pilgrim Fathers," by Mrs. Hemans. During a short and delightful stay at her house in Dublin, Ireland, in July, 1834, I had a long conversation with her. She expressed a deep interest in the United States, and said she had been better understood in Massachusetts than in England. She uttered with deep feeling her profound gratitude to Professor Norton, of Cambridge, for the delicate and efficient manner in which he had commended her to the American public; for the generosity with which he had published, at his own risk, a beautiful edition of all her works, and then sent his approbation of her, in that substantial and unequivocal form, which admits of no misconstruction—pounds sterling. This patronage stimulated her to efforts, which, otherwise, she would not have made.

She told me, that of the many strangers and foreigners who had visited her within the last few years, she had been most gratified with the Americans; and named one or two signal examples. She was as truthful in her words as she was pure in her thoughts; and in thought no one was purer. In her conversation, she was simple and glowing, and seemed without effort to throw the prismatic colors of her own ideas upon every object she touched. I was struck with her deep sense of justice when she spoke of her sister spirits, Joanna Bailie, Caroline Bowles, Mary Mitford, Letitia Landon, and Mary Howitt. She never spoke of them as rivals or competitors, but as friends and companions.

I told her that, as a member of the Old Colony Pilgrim Society, I had a right to thank her, in their name, for her true and touching little poem on the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers. "Well," said she, "would you like to know how I came to write it?" "Certainly I should," was my reply.

She said it was thus:—"I purchased two volumes at the bookstore and brought them home, and as I laid them on the table my eye was attracted by their envelope, which proved to be eight pages 8vo. of an address delivered at Plymouth on some anniversary. There was no title page and no date. The excellence of the paper and the beauty of the type first arrested my attention; but how this stray fragment got to Ireland, I could never ascertain. I began to read, and I found it contained an entire description of the fact of landing, and so beautiful was the painting and so thrilling the fact, that I could not rest till I had thrown them into verse; I took off my bonnet, seized my pen, and having read and re-read the story, I caught the fire from this transatlantic torch, and began to write, and before I was aware, I had finished my poem."

I then told her how much we valued the lines for truthfulness and spirit, and how I had stood with a thousand persons in the Pilgrim Church, at Plymouth, on "Forefather's Day," and sung with them her exquisite hymn. At this remark, a tear stole into her eye. "But," said I, "my dear madam, there are two lines of that poem which the descendants of the Pilgrims prize above the rest." "Ah! which are they?" I began to repeat—"They left unstained, what there they found;"—"O! yes," said she, interrupting me hastily, and then reciting the next line, "Freedom to worship God." "Yes," I replied, "Freedom to worship God." Then raising her voice, her eyes at the same time beaming with religious enthusiasm, she exclaimed—"It is the truth there, which makes the poetry."

Yes, Mr. Chairman, it is the truth there which makes the poetry—for so true is that poem to the facts and feelings of the case, that this fortunate lady has connected her name forever with the shore of Plymouth and the landing of our fathers; yes, so long as the "breaking waves dash high on that stern and rock bound coast," to chant their ocean dirge at the grave of the pilgrim, so long shall be joined in the sacred requiem the name of Felicia Hemans.

When about to say farewell to this charming lady, she took my hand and said—"When you next meet with your Pilgrim Society present them with my heart-felt thanks for their flattering partiality towards me, and tell them that I wish each one of them prosperity and happiness."

Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, I have not been able to meet with our Pilgrim Society since that event, and therefore avail myself of this opportunity, the most proper that could happen, to discharge my long cherished, well remembered, religious trust.

EMPLOYERS AND EMPLOYEES.

Among pastors of churches and others, there is evidently a growing attention to the exposures of young men employed by merchants and those engaged in commerce. Rev. Mr. Stone, of Park-street Church, Boston, discourses thus of this matter in the Congregationalist:—

"I tell John he's too honest."

"Ah, how so?"

"Why, he has lost me many a good bargain because he will insist on telling every thing he knows about the lot he's selling."

"That's unlucky."

"Yes—now when you are putting off your hay, you don't feel yourself bound to tell just how it was cut and got in—whether or not you had a little sprinkle of rain upon it, or whether the lot will run as well as the sample."

"Certainly not."

"If you did you would'nt get your price for it."

Returning to the city in one of our Eastern trains of cars, a few mornings since, after a night's absence, we overheard two gentlemen on the seat behind us delivering with great energy the dialogue commenced above. We felt under no obligation to put our fingers in our ears, and so we were favored with more of the same sort.

"Now," continued the first speaker, "I tell John, when a customer is looking at a case of my boots, he is'nt obliged to dig up every pair in the box and display to him every flaw in the leather and every slip of the knife, and the quality of the thread, and all that. If he wants to make a trade, he must put the best face on the article he can, and he may be sure the purchaser will make allowance enough for defects."

"Precisely."

"But I can't make that boy understand the matter. It's just so with all that family. It runs in the blood. His father before him had the same failing, or he might have been a rich man. John won't tell any thing but what is exactly true about the boots, and he will tell all that is true."

"What do you keep him for?"

"Well, I've thought a good many times I should get rid of him, but you see I can trust John myself—I don't have to watch him in any thing between him and me. I always know what to depend upon where John is concerned. He'd cut off his right hand, I do verily believe, before he'd cheat me out of a mill. But I have to take care how I leave customers in his hands. When I am there I attend to them myself—but when I am away they find out a little more of the art of boot-making than I care to have them know."

"That's all nonsense. There's no use in setting up for such special honesty. If every body traded on such principles it would do. But if one man undertakes it alone, he'll go to the wall. The fact is, if we tell the worst about our goods, we actually mirepresent—for the purchaser will suppose all the while we are saying the best we can, and that, the actual worst is very far beyond what we have admitted. O, it won't do at all."

"Just what I've told John over and over."

Honest John! brave John! heroic John! Our heart warmed towards this unknown, incorruptible one that kept his integrity through such a fiery ordeal. God bless him and shield him and deliver him out of the hands of the Philistines!

And this is the way, we thought, that many an employer sets about corrupting the unprotected youth committed to his care and training. This is the sort of nurture under which many a youthful aspirant for a business career is indoctrinated in the mercantile virtues. These are the models and exemplars after which they are exhorted to pattern in their creed and their practice if they would win golden fortunes.

WHAT IS PUSEYISM?

Mr. Dennison, in his pamphlet, says that he understands the following to be the principal Tractarian doctrines:—

I. That man is "made a member of Christ, the child of God, and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven," in and by holy baptism.

II. That man, "made a member of Christ, the child of God, and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven," in and by holy baptism, is renewed from time to time in holy communion.

III. That "death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness" is given to every adult, and every infant, in and by the outward visible sign or form in baptism, "water, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."

IV. That the gift may be received, in the case of adults, worthily or unworthily, but that it is always received.

V. That the body and blood of Christ are given to every one who receives the sacramental bread and wine.

VI. That the gift may be received worthily or unworthily, but that it is always received.

There is no mistaking the meaning of this. It is clear and explicit; but wherein does it differ from Romanism?

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, January 15, 1852.

MAN A PROBATIONER.

We do not know that any one denies, in so many words, that man is accountable for his conduct to his Creator—that is, any one who has not made up his mind already to be an infidel—but in these days of degeneracy, many things are said, which go far to destroy the force of the doctrine, and to render the creature careless in his manner of living. For instance, it is denied that man is a probationer for eternity. It is admitted that, as a rational being, he is bound by the law of God, and is held to a strict account for his violation of it. But that the rendering up of this account is delayed till the close of life, and that his eternal state is fixed accordingly, is utterly denied. It is contended, rather, that he is brought to account, from time to time, here in this world; that is, that he receives his punishment as he goes along.

But whatever may be said upon the question whether man is a probationer for eternity, it is very clear that he is put upon probation for a certain length of time, and that his refusal to improve this season allotted to him is followed by consequences disastrous to himself. The following passage is directly to the point:—"Because I have called, and ye refused; I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded; but ye have set at nought all my counsel, and would none of my reproof; I also will laugh at your calamity; I will mock when your fear cometh; when your fear cometh as desolation, and your destruction cometh as a whirlwind; when distress and anguish cometh upon you. Then shall they call upon me, but I will not answer; they shall seek me early, but they shall not find me; for that they hated knowledge, and did not choose the fear of the Lord; they would none of my counsel; they despised all my reproof. Therefore shall they eat of the fruit of their own way, and be filled with their own devices." Prov. 1: 24—31.

Now, it is evident from this passage—I. That there is a certain portion of time, longer or shorter, during which "Wisdom" extends her call to the "simple ones," ver. 22. II. That this portion of time is a period of probation in reference to that which follows. III. That this period of probation has a limit; that it will come to a close. IV. That the period which follows it, will be one in which calls for mercy will be useless; and that this calamity will come upon the 'scorners' because they did not improve the season of their probation. From these conclusions there is no escape.

Where, now, shall the dividing line be drawn between that portion of man's existence during which 'Wisdom' treats with him, and that in which she no longer treats with him? When is it that she begins to laugh at his calamity, and mock at his fear? There certainly must be some point in his existence at which this momentous crisis occurs. And if it be not at death, it must be at some point of his career this side of the grave. Grant it, that it takes place in this life, does it render the sinner's condition any the more hopeful for eternity? Suppose it to take place ten years before he dies. During all these ten years he continues a reprobate, suffering the righteous retributions of God's anger. In the language of the text, he "eats the fruit of his own way, and is filled with his own devices." Of course, when he dies, he "is driven away in his wickedness," and does not, like the righteous, have "hope in his death." For, so far as this life is concerned, it consists, according to the supposition, of these two portions only—the portion in which Wisdom treats with him and the portion in which she laughs at his calamity, or leaves him to eat the fruit of his doings. There is no third state, or new state of trial afforded. No such period is hinted at.

It is sheer assumption, however, to suppose that the dividing line between probation and retribution is drawn in this life. The time in which Wisdom uttereth her voice in the streets, and crieth in the chief places of concourse, is the time that the human race lives on earth. The day in which she mocks at their calamity, and brings fear upon them as desolation, and destruction as a whirlwind, is evidently the last great day—the day of judgment. And as no succeeding state of trial is spoken of as being afforded afterward, it is evident that man is, in this life, a probationer for eternity.

T. B. B.

Dr. Baird on the Religious Condition of Europe.—At a meeting in New York, one evening last week, Rev. Dr. Baird gave some account of a tour he has recently made through various parts of Europe, and his views of their religious condition. The Protestant movements in Ireland, Dr. B. regards as most encouraging, and he thinks that there are at least 30,000 converts to Protestantism in that country—the fruit of the labors of humble missionaries and Bible readers. In France, Dr. Baird fears that Protestants will have a hard time during the reign of Louis Napoleon. In Belgium the Protestant religion is making rapid progress, and though the country is essentially Catholic, and the Government Catholic, Protestant missionaries are fully protected. In Holland there is the greatest Protestant activity. In Germany the Protestant religion is increasing, and among the Protestants the Evangelicals are increasing. In Hungary, the Protestant religion has suffered more persecution than in any country in Europe, yet this has not been able to extirpate Protestantism. There are in Hungary 3,500,000 Protestants, and 6,500,000 Roman Catholics. The Protestants support their churches and their schools by voluntary contributions. In reference to the closing of the American Church at Rome, the Doctor said he was sorry to find that among the influences that operated to induce the Pope to request this act should be done, were remonstrances addressed to the Pope by highly respectable American Roman Catholics.

THE RELIGIOUS NEWSPAPER.

Those who take an active part in carrying forward the benevolent enterprises of the day, know very well, that the co-operation of the religious newspaper is indispensable to their success. So well is this understood, that many of the large Societies—such as the American Tract Society, the American Bible Society, the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and the Baptist Missionary Union—devote a portion of their funds to the printing of papers for the circulation of general religious intelligence, in connection with matter relating particularly to their own operations. Every religious newspaper ought to be viewed, to a certain extent, in the light of a benevolent enterprise. That it is such in fact, must be evident to any one who considers, that the reading matter of the religious newspaper is furnished to subscribers from twice to four times cheaper than is done in the volumes of any benevolent publishing society. Add to this consideration, what is equally true, that the religious newspaper often does as much every year to advance the interests of other benevolent institutions as could be done by one or more salaried agents, and then say if it is not a benevolent enterprise, and one which has claims upon the friends of such enterprises.

In several of our exchanges, of late, we have read articles setting forth their claims to increased patronage on the score of what they have done for the cause of religion in general, and for the benevolent societies with which they are connected in particular. We propose to copy several of them, and shall be glad to see proof that the principle which they set forth finds a response among our readers. The one we give this week is from the Boston Recorder, a long-established and well-supported paper:—

"If we could speak of the duty of Christians in circulating religious papers, on the simple ground of the good accomplished, in a way to awaken no thought of any private interests involved, and stand in the reader's mind clear of all suspicion of such interest, we might bring strong reasons why each in his sphere should exert an active influence to that end. Our religious newspapers occupy, with no mean efficiency, a sphere which no other religious literature can; and which the issues of none of our benevolent societies can. They can speak with distinctness of the distinctive principles of the respective denominations of Christians that sustain them. They are vehicles of the common sympathies, common interests, and common thoughts of those denominations—organs of defense where defense is needed—instruments of mutual understanding, of mutual aid and reproof in practical matters—conveyances of whatever is most instructive and entertaining in religious events; and, taking in all branches of this influence, we find the power of a good religious paper in a family to be incalculable. And the good attained by extending its circulation is proportional. Yet few think of the duty of using even a little influence to this end. Many will give money to the Tract Society, to be spent for the printing of its papers, and take the satisfaction of feeling that they have accomplished a great good—and well they may. But they little think, that they may, without money, by a word spoken in season, induce a neighbor to become a permanent subscriber to a good religious paper, and thus, at his own expense, to open upon his family a perpetual flow of good; good so much the more valued and effectual, because he pays for it.

"If we had, in the aggregate, all the advantages which are had individually by our many warm friends among our subscribers—advantages for putting our cause before individual minds, just how and when a word in season would tell, and that in all places where our paper goes, we would double our list in three months. And a doubling of our list would more than double the good influence of the paper, because it would increase our ability to condense upon its columns a greater interest and power of good."

MISSIONARY REPORT.

To the Brethren of the Seventh-day Baptist Central Association:

This is to inform you, that the undersigned has continued in his field of labor since the meeting of the Association. One half of his time has been spent in Otselic and its vicinity, the other half in Preston, (the former place only being properly missionary ground,) where he has since the meeting of the Association preached 67 sermons, made 110 family visits, conducted 6 inquiry meetings, attended 2 covenant meetings and communion seasons, and several other meetings. During the summer season but little could be done, except to keep along in the ordinary course. In the Georgetown Branch, we have enjoyed a precious revival, in connection with the brethren of other denominations, commencing soon after the time of beginning to hold evening meetings. Between 30 and 40 have been, in the judgment of charity, converted, and the usual number of backsliders reclaimed. Several of them belong to Seventh-day Baptist families, but they have not yet united with any church. Living between Otselic and DeRuyter, they seem to have been unsettled which church to join. There seems to have been a little awakening in the borders of Otselic, near Georgetown, but what the end will be is hard to predict. The uncoverted in Otselic seem to be unusually hard to move. It is difficult even to get them under the influence of the means of grace.

I wish to mention one thing that is, to me, exceedingly discouraging. I meet with persons every where, professing piety, who acknowledge a full conviction of the teachings of the Bible in favor of the seventh-day Sabbath, who excuse themselves, in view of popular custom and interest, from keeping it. Several of the converts in Georgetown acknowledge this conviction, but it is doubtful whether they will come out. The seventh part of time doctrine is a very convenient one with which to pacify the conscience in the practice of a palpable sin. Some one introduced the subject of a concert of prayer in the denomination, which is a thing that has often occupied my mind. Though truth should be put forth in love for the consideration of our erring friends, yet the offering up of the prayer of faith, unitedly, for the Spirit's power to rest on those who know their duty, to wake up their consciences, is quite as important, in my view; for, if all, as fast as they know their duty, were constrained by the Spirit's power to come out, a very few years would turn the scale, and give victory on the side of truth. And until we have more ardent piety, and a more vigorous exercise of living faith, as a denomination, we are unworthy of seeing such a victory. Let us humble ourselves under the mighty hand of God, that He may exalt us in due time.

Though Preston is not occupied properly as missionary ground, yet it may be proper to say something about the state of things there. In relation to the long-standing difficulties, I succeeded, at last, to get them to leave them to a council, with mutual pledges to abide their decision. Ample opportunity was afforded to present all the light on the subject of their respective claims. The council took all the time that they thought proper to look over and compare the evidence presented, and gave a decision which, I think, was very judicious. The church received and adopted the report of the council very cordially, and has gone, as far as time and circumstances will admit, in her action according to her understanding of said decision. * * * * My next effort will be to see how many can be found in fellowship to commence gospel travel, and then try to have the gospel rules applied, in their mildest form, with those who are far away from their duty. Do not fail to remember us in your prayers.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

French Affairs—Dissent & Tractarianism in England.

Glasgow, December 25th, 1851.

Although still indisposed to speak of the political aspect of France, its moral and religious condition, as affected by the despotism now being established there, lie within our province. We have already adverted to the fact that the Pope and the Popish Party express their satisfaction at the successful movement of Louis Napoleon. This has since been more fully manifested. For, although the Archbishop of Paris is still said to have scruples about receiving from the hands of the President and consecrating the Pantheon for a church, the Bishops of Muns and of Chalons openly avowed their desire for his success, even before the voting began—the latter, indeed, assigning as his reason for so doing, that "God is with the President." The inferior clergy have urged upon their people the duty of supporting his cause; and that there might be no danger of plots being formed against it, a prohibition has been issued against the celebration this year of the midnight mass on Christmas even in the churches of Paris. The Glasgow Popish newspaper has, in its last number, a leading article, taking of course the Pope's view of the matter, with this singular remark, that the President's "mind would seem to have really taken a religious turn, as he has already adopted measures for the better observance of the Sabbath." And on this Sunday-observance ground its editor bespeaks for the military despot the favor of the Scottish Presbyterian Church. But fond as our friends have shown themselves to be of a Popish Sunday, Napoleon's aid in behalf of this object of the Evangelical Alliance will hardly be deemed reason sufficient for the sympathy of British Christians in his general measures. We have much to fear for the cause of religion at his hand.

A recent Parliamentary Committee Report contains the following estimate, believed to have been carefully compiled by a witness, of the Chapels of Dissenters in England.

Wesleyan,	4450
Independent,	2572
Baptist,	1943
Primitive Methodist,	1662
Roman Catholic,	597
Calvinistic Methodist,	778
Bible Christian,	415
Society of Friends,	330
Wesleyan Methodist Association,	322
Methodist New Connexion,	281
Unitarian,	260
Church of Scotland,	12
Free Church of Scotland,	77
United Presbyterian,	61
Lady Huntingdon's Connexion,	30
Swedenborgian, Jews, and Minor Sects,	550

These returns are of England, exclusive of Scotland; and the numbers of adherents which the figures represent indicate an amount of opposition to the Established Church greater than we have been accustomed to think was the fact. The condition of the Establishment ought indeed to warrant the expectation of a large increase to the number of Dissenters from its pale; for those who are denominated "Evanglicals" cannot be said to hold some of the important doctrines of its formularies. The Privy Council in Mr. Gorham's case, have decided that such differences may exist; and 3100 of the clergy subscribed, last month, a declaration of approval of that decision. But numerous meetings and resolutions of the Tractarian party, at the same time, express great disapprobation with the avowed opinion of the Archbishop of Canterbury, that episcopal ordination is not essential to true Christian ministry—even although that opinion referred only to ministers of foreign churches, where I suppose he charitably makes allowance for the difficulty of finding such episcopal ordination as he and his church give.

The chief upholder of these high Tractarian views is the Bishop of Exeter, who, while stringently insisting on subjection to ecclesiastical authority, and exemplifying the tyranny of it, does not hesitate to denounce as heretical the published sentiments of his own superior, the Archbishop. Baptismal regeneration is the most important article in his theology, as exhibited in many ways. Sometime ago, Mr. Hatchard, Vicar of the principal parish in Plymouth, having nominated the Rev. T. G. Postlewaite to the incumbency of one of the churches in his parish, the Bishop soon found that he held the views of Mr. Gorham, and summarily rejected him. This month, the same Bishop has prohibited the Rev. Mr. Newton from continuing his ministrations in his diocese, because, after a severe examination, he considered him unsound on the same dogma. And consistently with this, he suspended the Rev. R. Autram three months for neglecting to baptize an infant, who therefore died unbaptized. The Bishop spoke with awful solemnity of the difference that there may be through all eternity between the state of the babe that has been baptized and that of the babe that has not. Nor is Exeter the only one of his order holding these views. Others at home, though they may be less able or less disposed to do battle for their cause, as well as five out of six of the Bishops of our Australian Colonies, are as thoroughly tinctured with this unscriptural delusion. It is a part of the remnant of that Popery which was still retained at the era of the Reformation. Even the Bishop of Exeter, however, deems it needful to maintain a protest in some things against Mother Church. A complaint having been presented to him in regard to paintings in progress in the chancel of Shevioke church, his Lordship, after careful examination and minute specification of the subjects, decides that there is little for him to interfere with except that of the angel kneeling to the Virgin Mary in the picture of the Annunciation. This, which Popery, pure and undefiled Popery, would glory in, the Bishop of Exeter deems "improper."

The Free Church Missionary Record for the present month intimates that Mr. Cassidy, one of the missionaries at Bombay, had "adopted Anti-Pedobaptist views." J. A. BEGG.

ANTI-LIQUOR LAWS.

Many persons who desire to see the liquor traffic abolished, express doubts of the constitutionality of laws which abolish it. The following written opinions of members of the United States Supreme Court—the highest judicial authority known among us—as to the power of the several States to control the sale of intoxicating liquor within their limits, ought to settle this question. It will be seen that the decision embraces all the Judges of the Court, including the Chief Justice:—

Chief Justice Taney said, "If any State deems the retail and internal traffic in ardent spirits injurious to its citizens, I see nothing in the constitution to prevent it from regulating and restraining the traffic, or from prohibiting it altogether."

Mr. Justice McLean said, "No person can introduce into a community a malignant disease, or any thing which contaminates its morals or endangers its safety."

Mr. Justice Catron said, "If the State has the power of restraint by licenses to any extent, she has the discretionary power to judge of its limits, and may go the length of prohibiting sales altogether."

Mr. Justice Daniel said of imports that are cleared of all control of the government, "They are like all other property of the citizen, whether owned by the importer or his vendee, or may hrve been purchased by hogsheads, casks, or bottles." In answering the argument that the importer purchases the right to sell when he pays duties to government, Mr. Daniel continues to say, "No such right is purchased by the importer; he cannot purchase from the government that which it could not insure to him, a sale independently of the laws and policy of the State."

And Mr. Justice Grier said, "It is not necessary to array the appalling statistics of misery, pauperism and crime, which have their origin in the use and abuse of ardent spirits. The police power, which is exclusively in the streets, is alone competent to the correction of these great evils, and all measures of restraint or prohibition necessary to effect the purpose, are within the scope of that authority."

REVIVAL AT HOPKINTON, R. I.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

I write you, believing that it will be interesting to most of your readers to learn that we have of late enjoyed a precious revival of religion. For a long time we have been in a state of declension, and many have been the trials through which we as a church have been called to pass; but God has once more seen fit to visit us in mercy. Bro. Halsey H. Baker, of Berlin, N. Y., came to this place about four weeks since, and from that time to the present has held forth to us daily the word of life, which, under the blessing of God, has resulted in the conversion of many precious souls; the reclaiming of wanderers, and some who possessed acerbity of feeling, we trust, have been amicably harmonized. Seventeen have already gone forward in the ordinance of baptism, and we hope that many more will soon follow their example. Our prayer is, that God will still continue to pour out his blessing upon us, that we may continue steadfast, immovable, and always abounding in the work of the Lord.

Henry Clarke.

Hopkinton City, Jan. 5, 1852.

Piety of the French President.—When Louis Napoleon wanted to make himself dictator of France, he did it just as any ambitious sinner would, by trampling upon the Constitution he had sworn to defend, and shooting down those who opposed him. But no sooner is his authority established, than he turns saint, and professes great zeal for the spiritual interests for his people. His well-timed movement in turning the Pantheon into a church, it is understood, has had the effect to make the Catholics his friends. And now he has made a bid for the Protestants, by sending a circular to the prefects, and other departmental authorities, urging upon them the importance of dispensing with unnecessary Sabbath babor, and instructing them to suspend labor upon the public works on Sunday, so that the State may give the example of rest on that day—a maneuver which is likely to make him many friends among the sticklers for Sunday observance. In this way he is establishing his claim to the designation, "nephew of his uncle."

Death of Prof. Moses Stuart.—The death of this venerable and eminent theologian is announced as having taken place at his residence in Andover, Mass., on the 4th inst. Nearly the whole of his long life had been devoted to biblical studies, and in that department he has done good service to the church, while achieving a high reputation for himself. He was a devoted friend of education; a sturdy descendant of the Puritans, inheriting their faith and their virtues; an encourager of youthful genius; an ardent lover of his country; a sincere worshiper of his God.

"The leading dates in Prof. Stuart's biography, may be briefly given. He was born on the 26th of March, 1780, in Wilton, Conn., and had nearly completed the seventy-second year of his age. He received his academical education at Yale College, where he graduated in 1799, remaining in that Institution as a Tutor from 1802 to 1804. Leaving the profession of the Law, for which he had studied, he determined to engage in the ministry of the Gospel, and having completed his preparation for the sacred office, became the Pastor of the Central Congregational Church in New Haven in 1806. In 1810 he was appointed Professor of Sacred Literature in the Theological Seminary at Andover; in which office he continued until 1848, when he was led to resign it by continued ill health and the growing infirmities of age, having discharged his duties for the protracted space of thirty-eight years."

Missions in Syria.—At a missionary meeting in New York, on the first Monday in January, letters were read showing that the missions of the American Board in Syria, are in a very flourishing condition. Mr. Thompson writes that considerable numbers have avowed themselves Protestants, and petitioned the Emir to be legally acknowledged as such. The Emir is decidedly favorable, although he is the same who some time ago swore that he would exterminate the Protestants. Of Rashaiah, Mr. T. writes that "the whole town is moved," and that "wherever he goes, religion is the topic of conversation, not its externals, but the great cardinal truths of life and salvation." Mr. T. says further, that the Druses and the Jews even, of Rashaiah, are discussing the doctrine of salvation with great earnestness. In other villages, where much opposition has formerly been experienced, requests are made for schools and religious instruction. Mr. Ford, of the same mission, recently made a short tour among the cities and villages which lie between Aleppo and the Mediterranean. Idib and Kessab are the two principal cities. Exclusive of them, the Christian population numbers 10,000 or upward. They mostly inhabit villages situated on the sides of the lofty Mount Cassius. A considerable portion of the Christians of Idib were found to be unusually intelligent.

Agriculture in West Jersey.—We learn from the West Jersey Pioneer, that an adjourned meeting of the citizens of Cumberland County, N. J., favorable to the organization of an association for the promotion of Agricultural Interests and the Mechanic Arts, will be held in the Presbyterian Session Room, Bridgeton, on the afternoon of the 3d Monday in January, 1852, commencing at 1 o'clock. An address appropriate to the occasion will be delivered by Professor Gurdon Evans of New York State. After the address a basis of organization will be presented by the committee appointed for that purpose, and if thought expedient, an association will than be organized.

Neander's Library.—Some months ago, the friends of Lane Seminary, Ohio, raised the money necessary to buy the Library of the celebrated ecclesiastical historian Neander. But through some misunderstanding, or because a higher price was offered by another party, they have failed to secure it. The Library has been bought by a person in Halle, and is said to be for some person in America.

Pew Rents.—The three hundred pews of the Church of the Puritans in Brooklyn, of which H. W. Beecher is pastor, rent for about twelve thousand dollars annually—sufficient to build a very respectable place of worship. At the recent sale of pews for the current year, one hundred and forty sold the first evening for the aggregate sum of $7,500—one hundred of them bringing a premium above their valuation.

Love of Liberty Hereditary.—In the "Life of Kossuth," recently published in The Phrenological Journal, we find the following, which shows that Kossuth came honestly by his love of liberty:—

"It may show what blood runs in the veins of this modern hero, to state that the chronicle of his ancestor shows, that seventeen of them, at different times, have been executed for political offenses against despotic rule."

Movements of Kossuth.—Gov. Kossuth spent last week at Washington, where he was formally introduced to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States. A splendid Congressional Banquet was also given him, which was attended by the Vice President pro. tem. of the United States, Mr. Secretary Webster, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, with the leading Senators and Members of the House, Judge Wayne of the Supreme Court, &c. On that occasion, as well as on several other occasions during the week, he spoke in a way to disarm opposition, and excite sympathy for his oppressed country.

On sixth-day last, Kossuth visited Henry Clay in his sick room. Mr. Clay received him standing; and then, being seated on account of his feeble condition, addressed the celebrated Magyar in a speech of half an hour in length, frankly expressing his opinions. He deprecated the policy of intervention as the greatest calamity which could befall this country, and said that, as the possessors of the only existing republic, the example of man's capacity for self-government, it was the duty of the American people to encourage human progress and prosperity on this continent, which might be destroyed by foreign wars, involving in their fall all the hopes of free institutions. These were, he said, the sentiments of a dying man who had struggled for freedom. Kossuth replied. He did not combat Mr. Clay's positions, but confined himself to the prospects of Hungary, and the situation of France, believing that events in the latter country would terminate in civil war, and, perhaps, in a general revolution. At parting, Mr. Clay rose and bade Kossuth farewell forever, wishing him a God-speed for Hungarian independence as the reward of the noble efforts of her people. Kossuth responded with emotion, saying that he would pray God daily for Mr. Clay's restoration to health and usefulness. Both were deeply moved, and the scene was touching and solemn.

Kossuth last week received intelligence of the death of his mother, caused by the anxiety and depression consequent upon the prosecution and imprisonment of her daughters at Vienna.

Kossuth has engaged to speak at Annapolis and Baltimore, and it is expected that he will thence proceed to Cincinnati, St. Louis, New Orleans, Charleston, New York, Albany, Buffalo, Niagara Falls, and Boston.

Education in Canada.—The Canada correspondent of the New York Tribune says that the Annual Report of the Normal and Model Schools for Upper Canada, just issued, shows that education is making real progress in that Province. In 1850 there were 3,407 school sections, being an increase of 371 over the preceding year. In each section there is always one school, and sometimes both a male and female school. The average attendance of children is 49 at each school, while the number of children in each section, of what is called school age, that is from 5 to 16 years of age, is 76. The number of children of school age in 1849 was 259,258, being an increase on the preceding year of 5,894. The number attending school last year was 151,891, being an increase of 14,258 on the preceding year. There are 100,000 children in Upper Canada, of school age. The amount paid for teachers' salaries, and the erection and repairs of school-houses, last year, was $411,000. During 1850 the number of teachers employed was 3,476, of whom 2,697 were males and 779 females: 291 of them had been trained in the Provincial Normal School. In 2,067 of the schools the Bible is used as a class-book. Its use is gradually extending; the number of schools where it was used in 1850 exceeded those of 1849 by 231. The teachers belonged to the following religious denominations: Episcopalians, 796; Roman Catholics, 390; Presbyterians, 858; Methodists, 904; Baptists, 238; Congregrationalist, 73: 54 being reported simply as Protestants, and 87 not being reported at all. The average salaries of the male teachers in the country were only from $120 to $240, and those of female teachers from $100 to $200. The whole number of school-houses is 2,475; of which 95 are brick, 117 stone, 1,191 frame, and 1,568 log. The schools are generally well supplied with apparatus, and the school libraries altogether contain 96,165 volumes.

Convention of Colored Men.—In his recent Message, Governor Hunt expressed his despair of any improvement in the condition of the Colored Population, so long as they remain among us, and suggested that something should be done by the State in aid of their colonization. This gives offense to a portion of the colored people, and they have issued a call for a State Convention of Colored Citizens, to be held at Albany on the 30th inst., the purposes of which are thus stated:—

1st. To protest against this gross violation of the principles of the Constitution of our State, and flagitious proposal to mal-appropriate State funds.

2d. To expose the ignorance and wickedness which pervade this portion of the Governor's Message.

3d. To petition the Legislature for an extension of the Elective Franchize.

The Christian Review for January has articles on "The Doctrine of Original Sin," "Epicurus," "The Distinctive Features of the Baptist Denomination," "The Unity of the Race in its Higher Relations," "The Permanence of American Institutions," "Works of Dr. Williams," and "Robert Southey," together with a variety of book notices and literary intelligence. The review is edited by Rev. Sewell S. Cutting, assisted by Prof. Wm. Gammell, and is one of the best works of its kind to be had. Published by Lewis Colby and Joseph Ballard, 122 Nassau street, New York, at $3 per year.

Died, on the 27th of December, at his residence in Fourth-st., New York, Rev. William Provost Kuypers, D. D., in the 79th year of his life, and after a service in the ministry of more than fifty years. He was the last surviving of five brothers who studied for the ministry.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, JAN. 5.

In the SENATE, after the usual opening exercises, numerous petitions and memorials were presented, and several reports on private bills were made. Mr. Cooper presented one or more petitions against the transmission of mails on Sunday. Several private bills were introduced and referred, and others were ordered to be engrossed. A bill reviving the pension act of 1816, so as to give the widows of soldiers in the last war a pension for life, was taken up, debated, and, on motion, was laid on the table.

But the great business of the day in the Senate was the reception of Kossuth, in anticipation of which the Chamber was thronged. At 1 o'clock, Messrs. Shields, Seward and Cass entered, with Kossuth, who was leaning on the arm of Mr. Shields. Mr. Shields said, "Mr. President, we have the honor to announce Louis Kossuth to the Senate of the United States." The chair invited Kossuth to a seat placed in front of the Secretary's desk. Senators then rose, and Kossuth advanced to the seat and sat down. Mr. Mangum said, In order that Senators and all others may have an opportunity of paying their respects to our illustrious guest, I move that the Senate now adjourn. Agreed to, and the Senate adjourned. A crowd then advanced, and were introduced to Kossuth by Messrs. Seward and Shields.

The HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES did nothing worth naming, except to pass the long-debated resolution to appoint a Committee to receive Kossuth. The vote was 123 to 54, the latter being mostly southern men.

THIRD-DAY. JAN. 6.

In the SENATE, there was a petition presented for an increase of pay to those of our Navy employed on the Pacific. The lash for the sailor's back was taken up and laid down again. Mr. Seward presented a petition for the exploration of a route to China. The Report of the Secretary of the Treasury was received. A debate ensued on printing the Census; nothing done. A Message from the President, inclosing a note from Mr. Webster, was received, concerning the Cuban prisoners, recommending an appropriation for their relief. A bill appropriating $10,000 for relief of the Library passed. Mr. Seward offered a resolution looking toward granting a pension to the widow of General Belknap.

In the HOUSE, a committee was announced to receive and introduce Kossuth to-morrow. Mr. McMULLEN, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported a bill granting to every man who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, one hundred and sixty acres of land, on condition that he will occupy and cultivate the same for a certain period. Referred to the Committee of the Whole. Mr. Bernhisel (delegate from Utah) protested against the publication of the returned Judges for Utah Territory. The House then went into Committee of the Whole, where they engaged themselves a few minutes to no purpose, and adjourned.

FOURTH-DAY, JAN. 7.

In the SENATE, after some unimportant preliminary business, the subject of flogging in the Navy was taken up, and Commodore Stockton fired a complete Paixhan broadside into the ranks of the advocates of the lash. He eulogized the Navy, and suggested the abolishing of spirit rations. A short but spicy interloquitur occurred between Messrs. Stockton and Badger, when the debate was adjourned till Second-day, and the Senate till Sixth-day.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Bayly, from the Comittee on Foreign Relations, reported a bill making an appropriation for the relief of the Cuban prisoners released by the Spanish Government. After a short scene of trifling between Mr. McMullen, of Virginia, and Mr. Polk, of Tennessee, the ladies were admitted to the floor of the House, when Kossuth was received. The Committee of five entered with Kossuth, who had the arm of Mr. Carter, and having approached to the area, Mr. Carter said, "Mr. Speaker, I have the honor, on the part of the Committee, to present Louis Kossuth to the House of Representatives." The Speaker said, As the organ of this body, I have the honor to extend to Louis Kossuth a cordial welcome to the House of Representatives. Kossuth bowed to the compliment, and in a low tone acknowledged with gratitude the honor paid to him, an exile, by the Legislature of this glorious Republic, and returned thanks to the House of Representatives for their generous reception. He was invited to a chair near the Speaker; and had scarcely seated himself, when the House adjourned until Sixth-day. Crowds then pressed around Kossuth, and a general introduction took place. After a lapse of about fifteen minutes, Kossuth retired with the Committee.

The following are Kossuth's remarks in reply to Speaker Boyd in the House of Representatives:

SIR: It is a remarkable fact in the history of mankind, that while, through all the past, honors were bestowed upon glory, and glory was attached only to success, the legislative authorities of this great Republic bestow honors upon a persecuted exile, not conspicuous by glory, not favored by success, but engaged in a just cause. There is a triumph of republican principles in this fact. Sir, I thank, in my own and my country's name, the House of Representatives of the United States for the honor of this cordial welcome.

SIXTH-DAY, JAN. 9.

In the SENATE, after some preliminary business, the Chair presented a message containing the thanks of the Canadian Parliament for the donations toward rebuilding the Parliamentary Library given by Congress and by the States of New York and Vermont. Several private bills were considered, debated, and ordered to be engrossed, when the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE, thirteen private bills were passed; after which a message was received, containing all the documents relative to the difficulty between the United States officers and the people of Utah. The House adjourned to Second-day.

The N. O. Picayune states that the revolutionary party under Caravajal has been completely broken up and dispersed, and that Caravajal has been arrested by the Americau Gen. Harney, for violating the neutrality laws of the United States, in attempting to organize an expedition against Mexico. Caravajal was a prisoner at Fort Brown.

European News.

By the Steamer Cambria, from Liverpool, we have news from Europe to Dec. 27, three days later.

Two great events had transpired in the course of the few days preceding the departure of the Cambria, each capable of seriously influencing the character of all commercial operations; first, the resignation of the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in England, and second, the election of Louis Napoleon, as President of France for ten years, by a very large majority.

The resignation of Lord Palmerston caused a temporary derangement of the various markets, and a decline of prices in many occurred; but when it became known that Lord Granville was to succeed Lord Palmerston, confidence became in some measure restored. The withdrawal of Lord Palmerston is imputed to the dissensions which have been known to exist in the Cabinet for several months past, and was probably precipitated by the significant reception and emphatic avowal of opinion to the Kossuth deputation, to whom his Lordship used language by no means complimentary to the absolutists of Europe. The fearless position assumed by his Lordship proved distasteful to the majority of the Ministry, and hence the result.

The all-engrossing topic of the Presidential Election was occupying the French mind, to the exclusion of all others. Louis Napoleon has been elected to the Presidency for ten years by an overwhelming majority of votes. A telegraphic dispatch from Paris, Dec. 26, gives the votes of 81 Departments, of which 23 were complete: Yes, 6,011,000; No, 709,000. Many of the Deputies had been set at liberty, and much speculation was indulged in as to the Press law, to be shortly promulgated. The best informed persons think that each journal will have to deposit a certain sum with the Government as security for good behavior. The offenses of the press were to be, first, attack upon the President; second, inciting hatred among citizens; third, an attack upon religion, family or property. Each offense was to be punished by fine and imprisonment.

The plan of Napoleon in respect to public bath and wash-houses is that the Government, in conjunction with the City of Paris, shall erect four vast bathing and washing establishments in different quarters of Paris, where the working classes will not only be able to wash their clothes, but will find cold and hot water baths, as well as steam and vapor baths for the sick.

The Limerick Reporter notices an extraordinary feature in the history of emigration. It appears that while thousands are leaving their native shore for the land of the west, there are vast numbers returning to Ireland; and it is added that scarcely a ship leaves New York that does not bring 80 or 100 passengers homeward.

The High Court of Judiciary, Edinburgh, has affirmed a conviction of a husband charged with stealing £200 from his wife, the money being her special property, and secured to her by express contract.

The Augsburg Gazette quotes a letter from Rome, of the 8th, stating that a great many of the English tourists, lately arrived there, having distributed seditions and anti-catholic pamphlets, and the police having caught some in the act, the Minister of Finance has given strict orders to inspect the baggage of travelers with the greatest minuteness.

The United States Treasury.

The Report of the United States Treasury, which was not quite complete when Reports from the other Departments were sent in to Congress with the President's Message, has at length made its appearance. The Secretary says that the balance in the Treasury on July 1 last, was $10,911,645 68; and by his estimates the total means of the current year will exceed the expenditures $11,458,743 09; and on the 1st July, 1853, he estimates that there will be in the Treasury a balance of $20,366,443 90, a sum sufficient to pay off the $6,237,941 35 of public debt maturing on that day, and meet such extra appropriations as Congress may authorize. These estimates are based upon an annual income of $49,000,000 from customs, $2,100,000 to $2,500,000 from public lands, and $300,000 from miscellaneous sources.

The expenditures demanded by the new territories are stated in the Report separately from those for the general purposes of the Government; the former are set down at 9½ millions, the latter at 33½. The Secretary advocates a liberal policy toward the territories, and on sufficient grounds.

The entire public debt is now $62,550,395 26. Notwithstanding the extraordinary demands on the Treasury, $1,667,843 11 of the debt has been redeemed in the last year. In investing the surplus funds of the Department in U. S. stocks at market rates a heavy premium has had to be paid, amounting, on 2½ millions, to $325,655 24; and if the entire debt should thus be bought up in advance, this premium would amount to above 8 millions of dollars; and should it be known that the Government was thus in the market, the premium would rise still higher. To obviate this the Secretary proposes to buy instead sound State stocks, and hold them as a sinking fund for the redemption of the debt.

Interoceanic Canal.

A New York paper says that the Atrata Interoceanic Canal Company is forming in this city, to undertake this work in earnest. The route possesses advantages which Baron Humboldt long since proclaimed to the world, and which are in part recorded in Congressional documents. The Atrata route is the most southern of those proposed for water communication between the two oceans. It commences at the very root of the Isthmus, where the Bay of Uraba opens the way into the mouth of the Atrato. This is a fine stream about 180 miles in length, with a very straight course and gentle current, and a depth of 7 to 13 feet, according to the season. It rises in a swamp, which, on the south-west, sends out the San Juan, whose course for about 60 miles brings it to the Pacific, and one of the finest harbors known. Both these streams flow through regions abounding in gold mines; and the mountain ranges, which interpose an uninterrupted wall between the oceans, from Mexico downwards, here sink and disappear. Yet these two rivers have been out of the range of travelers since the overthrow of the Spanish power. The population is very thin, and some large districts are almost unpeopled, and in the possession of Indians. Humboldt learned, to his surprise, that a canal was dug in 1782 between the head waters of the two rivers, by the inhabitants, and served for many years for the passage of loaded boats, carrying merchandize between the western coast and different points, even as far as Carthagena. The Congress of New Granada have recently granted to some Americaus an exclusive privilege to make a canal for the passage of larger vessels, with rights and facilities of the most favorable character. Everything indicates that active operations will soon be commenced in those new and inviting regions, in various departments of industry.

Revolutioners Gone.

The Suffolk Democrat notices the death of Capt. Joel Cook, a soldier of the Revolutionary War, on the 19th Dec., aged 81. The deceased, says The Democrat, was probably the last survivor of the battles of Bunker Hill and Lexington. He was born at Wallinsford, Conn. October 12, 1760, and took part in all the important battles of the Revolution. After Independence was gained he was promoted to the rank of Captain, receiving his commission from Jefferson. He was in every war of the United States to the present time, excepting that with Mexico, and saved the life of Gen. Harrison at Tippecanoe.

Col. Stephen Wright departed this life on Christmas night, having numbered just 88 years and one day. He was a native of the old borough of Norfolk—descended from one of its first settlers—and entered the Revolutionary Army toward its close, as an Ensign, at the early age of 17; was soon after taken prisoner and sent to Bermuda, whence (being exchanged) he returned in time to be present at the seige of Yorktown, to witness the closing scene of the momentous struggle of his country for national independence. He was for many years the oldest Justice of the Peace of Norfolk County, and officiated occasionally till within a few years past. He also represented the County of Norfolk in the Legislature more than fifty years ago.

John Pierpoint, a revolutionary soldier, died at North Haven, Dec. 29th, aged 91. He served during the war as a gunner, and was the leader of the small party that placed a gun so as to bear on the British vessel in the North River that was waiting to couvey Maj. Andre back after his visit to Arnold. The shot taking effect, compelled the vessel to go down the river, and thus obliged Andre to travel by land, which eventuated in the discovery of Arnold's treachery. Mr. Pierpoint was in many of the battles of the Revolution, and was present at the surrender of Cornwallis.

At North Stonington, Vermont, Dec. 30, Rhilemon Baldwin, aged 96, a revolutionary soldier.

In Garrand Co., Ky., Dec. 16, John Slavin, aged 95, a revolutionary soldier.

At Easton, Md., Dec. 6, Solomon Barrott, a revolutionary soldier, aged 89.

POSTAGE TO CANADA AND GREAT BRITAIN.—The mail arrangements for letters, between this country and all parts of Great Britain, and all parts of the British Provinces of North America, including Canada, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, &c., are as entirely unrestricted as though they were all under one government. A letter mailed anywhere in the United States goes to any post-office in Great Britain or the North American Colonies, and vice versa, according to direction, without any conditions whatsoever. It may be prepaid or it may not, at the option of the person sending it. And the rate of postage is the same, whether it is prepaid or not. That rate is twenty-four cents to any post-office in the Provinces, be the distance more or less.

In relation to newspapers, the regulation is this: All papers coming from or going to Great Britain pay four cents postage; of which two cents must be prepaid at the office from which the paper is sent, whether on one side or on the other, and and two cents must be collected at every office where the paper is delivered. No newspaper can be wholly prepaid. And in regard to newspapers sent to or from the British Provinces, the same rule holds good; only that on them the postage must be prepaid to the point on the line where they pass from one Government to the other, according to our regular established rates of internal newspaper postage. Thus, in a county bordering on the British possessions, no payment of postage is required. Beyond the county limit the postage varies according to distance. In this arrangement California and Oregon are excepted.

THE AZTEC CHILDREN.—These remarkable specimens of humanity are now on exhibition at the Society Library, and after a personal examination we can strenuously commend them to the notice of all who would see a couple of the most unique, pygmean, unaccountable, lively, harmless, elves that were ever seen, fancied, or dreamed of. When, on entering the exhibition room, we saw their tiny figures frisking about upon an elevated platform, we could hardly believe our eyes. What, thought we, have they here a couple of automata, moved by invisible wires or secret springs? A close inspection showed them to be veritable miniature individuals of our own race. The boy is supposed to be about eleven years of age, and the girl a year or two younger. The former is about thirty-three inches high and weighs twenty pounds—the latter is twenty-nine and a half inches high and weighs seventeen pounds. Their complexions are dark, their hair fine, black, and glossy, their eyes sparkling, their forms symmetrical; motions agile as those of squirrels; their foreheads low, and their whole physiognomies exceedingly like those of some of the ancient images discovered by Stevens, the celebrated traveler, in Central America, whence these little creatures are said to have been brought. They are playful and happy in the extreme; kindly and affectionate in disposition, and strongly excite the curiosity and interest of beholders. Go and see these little Gautemalan prodigies—you will never look on their like again. [Art'n.

A WHOLE FAMILY SUFFOCATED.—Friday afternoon last a family named Brady, consisting of four persons—two brothers, Phillip and James, Catherine wife of Phillip, and James his son—moved into the basement of a building in the rear of No. 174 Twenty-fourth st., New York. In the evening they built a fire of charcoal in an open furnace, closed the windows and doors, and went to bed. Saturday morning some of the neighbors called and knocked at the door, but could get no answer. Fearing something was wrong, they called Capt. Whigham of the Eighteenth Ward Police, who broke open the door, and immediately brought the bodies into the air. It was much too late, however; they were quite dead.

CALIFORNIA NEWS.—The steamer Daniel Webster, with ten days later news from California, (being to Dec. 15,) arrived at New York on the 11th inst., bringing 250 passengers, and about half a million in gold dust. The news from the mines continues to be of an encouraging character. There is nothing farther about Capt. Waterman and the Challenge. The difficulties with the Indians in the Southern part of the State appear to be temporarily settled. It is reported from the Sandwich Islands that no important consequences have resulted from the arrival of the mysterious expedition which recently sailed from San Francisco.

By this arrival, we have intelligence from Oregon to Dec. 6. The rainy season had commenced with vigor, and the rivers were slowly rising. Trade was dull at the river towns, and there was no new excitement relative to gold finding. The Indians were quiet, and with the exception of the difficulties at Port Orford, no further troubles are recorded.

FEMALE MEDICAL COLLEGE.—The first public commencement of the Female Medical College of Pennsylvania, took place at the Musical Fund Hall, on Third-day, Dec. 30 The following are the ladies who graduated: Hannah E. Longshore, Philadelphia; Anna M. Longshore, Bucks Co., Pa.; Angenette A. Hunt, New York; Mrs. Martha M. Sawin, Boston, Mass.; Ann Preston, Phebe Way, Susannah H. Ellis, Chester Co., Pa.; Mrs. G. Mitchell, Philadelphia, late of England. Total 8. The class now attending the College is composed of ladies principally from Pennsylvania. Three of the students, however, are from New York; two from New Jersey; one from Virginia, and one from Ohio.

"MYSTERIOUS NOISES."—The Albany Atlas notices the fact that "Mysterious Noises" have broken out at the house of Valentine Hamsher, East Hill. Sometime last summer the family were alarmed by the noise as of some one "spinning on a large wheel" up stairs, but on examination no one was in the room; then the noise resembled that of "a tamborine," and when spoken to, the noise, considering itself encored, would be repeated; thus it continued at intervals for several weeks, till within the past few weeks it has assumed the shape of sundry rappings and knocks on the windows, breaking panes of glass as often as Mr. Hamsher could replace them, until he has beeu compelled to board them up entirely, and now the noises are heard daily in different parts of the house in the shape of "knockings," slamming of doors, stamping, grating, &c., defying all attempts at satisfactory explanation.

SUMMARY.

Galusha A. Grow, Member of the House of Representatives from Pennsylvania, is the youngest member of that body, being only twenty-six years of age. He came to Amherst College eleven years ago from the backwoods of Pennsylvania, to commence his education. Previous to that he had been engaged in rafting logs down the Susquehannah and in deer-hunting in the Alleghanies. He soon took a high rank in his class, excelled as a writer and especially as a declaimer. On leaving College, in 1843, he studied law with David Wilmot.

The Collins steamers, which receive a very large sum from our Government for the transportation of the mails, are said to be, nevertheless, losing money very fast for their owners. And there is great danger that the line will be unable, without further aid, to withstand the competition of their British rivals. It is said by competent American merchants, that the steamers now building on the Clyde for the Cunard Company are sure to beat any of our sea steamers afloat.

In an article in The Scalpel upon Lead Poisons, the editor uses very strong language in relation to the danger of using lead for water pipes and in the shape of white lead for painting dwelling houses, and also in relation to the great danger incurred by workmen in the manufacture of lead in all its shapes. He gives numerous instances of the pernicious results of the use and manufacture of lead, and gives a table of 2,161 cases of lead diseases received during 8 or 9 months at one hospital in Paris.

A Washington correspondant of the N. Y. Tribune, under date of Jan. 10, says: Kossuth made another admirable speech last night. Things here in relation to him have at length taken a very satisfactory direction. The efforts of his true friends, who have been indefatigable in his behalf, aided by his own excellent sense and judgment, have overcome all the embarrassments of his position. To this result we must do Mr. Webster the credit of having contributed.

Isaac D. Titsworth, Esq., of Shiloh, N. J., advertises for sale at Public Auction, on Mon day, Jan. 19, 1852, at 12 o'clock, at the hotel of E. Davis and Son, Bridgeton, N. J., his farm, situated near Shiloh, containing 107 acres of good land, in a high state of cultivation. On the farm is a new and substantial Dwelling House, two young apple Orchards, a large Barn, stabling and hay house, wash and wood house, &c.

Henry M. Scott, about 24 years old, a convict in the New Hampshire State Prison, from Lempster, in that State, under sentence for ten years, for burglary, nine years of which sentence had expired, a few days since drew a knife twice around his arm, near the elbow joint, cutting every thing clean to the bone. When asked why he did it, he said his work, which was at turning lathe, was too hard for him.

Alexander S. Johnson, the newly elected Justice of the Court of Appeals of New York, is the great-grandson of John Adams, the second President of the United States—his mother having been a daughter of Charles Adams, Esq., of the city of New York, the second son of the President. His paternal grandfather, Zachariah Johnson, was a Jew, and one of the earliest settlers of the County of Oneida.

The Washington Republic says: It is understood that M. Kossuth has been summoned before the Grand Jury of this county, to testify in certain libel cases growing out of statements respectively made by Mr. De Ahna and by Major Tochman.

At Cooperstown, on Saturday week, the mercury fell to 28 degrees below zero. The same degree of cold was experienced at Owego on the previous evening. At Elmira, the mercury stood at 24 below zero on Saturday morning.

Mr. Montague, editor and publisher of The Pittsfield Eagle, has invented a power press, on which he now prints his paper. We understand it will print 2,000 sheets per hour, forms being fastened in an upright position, and the impression given by a cylinder. It may be worked by steam or hand power, and can be made at a cost of $650 for single cylinders, and $750 for double cylinders.

The last number of The Lake Superior Journal brought intelligence that the winter supplies had arrived at Marquetts, where several hundred persons had been for six weeks without flour, and were actually suffering from famine. Several thousand barrels bulk of provisions, goods, &c., are at the Saut and cannot go forward.

Four cargoes of negroes have recently been landed upon the Island of Cuba, two on the south side, one at the east end, and one east of Cardenas, making a total of one thousand nine hundred and eighty human beings drawn into the light of civilization by the chains of slavery.

The Temperance men of Rhode Island are to present a petition to the Legislature in favor of the Maine Liquor Law, signed by 15,000; and it is said the Legislature, not having courage to act, will refer it to the people.

A tremendous storm of wind occurred at Baton Rouge on the 30th ult. Several houses in the neighborhood were prostrated. The sugar house of Dr. Perkins was destroyed and ten negroes killed. The telegraph lines for a long distance were prostrated.

Over thirty thousand bass were taken in Point Judith Pond on New-Year day—it being the first day the pond could be hauled by law. The Providence Journal is answerable for this fish story.

The British Government will, no doubt, settle the Prometheus affair by an apology, accompanied by the dismissal, or other punishment, of the officer who fired into that steamer.

Capt. Howe, formerly of the steamer Empire State, on the Lake, is crazy at the Columbus (Ohio) Asylum.

DIED.

In Hoosick, Rensselaer Co., New York, Dec. 28th, 1851, sister POLLY DERBY, daughter of Nathan Derby, in the forty-third year of her age. There are circumstances connected with the history of this sister, which call for something more than a passing notice of her death. Though poor, isolated, and lonely, she was rich in faith, a citizen of heaven, and an accepted companion of the lovers of true religion. She experienced a change of heart about twenty years ago, and immediately connected herself with the Seventh-day Baptist Church of Petersburg. From that time she has been separated from the church of her choice until after the commencement of her sickness, which terminated in her death. Her complaint was cancer, in the most malignant and hopeless form. She felt at once that she could not leave this world till she had in some manner bid farewell to the Church, and enjoyed its prayers. She wrote a letter to the Church, requesting a visit. In answer, I with our deacons went a number of times. We found her prepared to live or die—fainting, yet a light in the world—far removed from church privileges, yet loving and beloved by a little band (Baptist Church of Hoosick) who did all for her comfort that was in their power. Her constancy and faith won the hearts of the faithful. No father was near her to provide the comforts of life; no mother to watch through the lonely vigils; or brother to aid, or sister to sympathize. A faithful friend, her cousin, supplied all these offices, and though her hands were her whole dependence, yet she mainly supplied her with the comforts and necessaries of life, and stood by her bed, like a ministering angel, until her death. "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord."

J. S.

In Rockville, R. I., on the 3d inst., of pulmonary con sumption, Miss MARIA E. CRANDALL, daughter of Samuel Crandall, Jr., aged 19 years. She became a Christian in childhood, and has filled up the measure of her days thus early in a manner of usefulness becoming her profession. She was connected with the choir, also a teacher in the Sabbath-School, and a member of the 3d Seventh-day Baptist Church of Hopkinton. She suffered but little severe pain in her sickness, and death stole almost imperceptibly upon her. When informed by her friends that the hour of her departure was near, she received the information with composure, gave some brief counsel to her surviving relatives, bade them all farewell in full hope of heaven, and fell quietly asleep in Jesus.

C. M. L.

In DeRuyter, Jan. 3d, of consumption, WILLIAM B. MUNCY. He had long indulged a hope in Christ, but doubts and fears deterred him from an open profession of his love. In his last illness, he was enabled to say with confidence, "I know that my Redeemer liveth."

On Sunday morning, Jan. 11, of croup, MARY, youngest child of James E. and Mary Johnson, aged one year and eleven months.

In Preston, N. Y., Jan. 2, 1852, ESSTELLA, daughter of J. C. and H. A. Maxson, aged 15 days.

Two Living Aztec Children.

A NEW AND ABSOLUTELY UNIQUE RACE OF MANKIND.—The most extraordinary and inexplicable phenomena that the history of the human race has yet produced, can be seen for a few weeks at the large Exhibition Room of the Society Library, corner of Broadway and Leonard-street. They were recently taken from a newly-discovered and idolatrous people in Central America, by whom they were kept with superstitious veneration, distinct and secluded as a caste of their priesthood, and employed as Mimes and Bacchanals in their Pagan ceremonies and worship.

They are male and female. The latter measuring 29½ inches in height, weighing 17 lbs.; the former is 33 inches high, and weighs 20 lbs.

From repeated and careful examination, the best Physiologists state the older to be 12 or 13 years of age; the younger about 10 years.

They differ altogether from examples of the dwarf kind, and from children; affording complete and undeniable illustration of a Piamean variety of the Human Race!

Tickets of Admission 25 cents. Children under 10 years, half price. Season Tickets, $1 00. Doors open each day, from 11 until 1, and from 7 until 9 o'clock. dec18 4t

Miscellaneous.

The Modern Belle.

Extract from Mr. Sark's Poem, read at the late Manchester, N. H., Fair.

The daughter sits in the parlor,
And rocks in her easy chair;
She's clad in her silks and satins,
And jewels are in her hair—
She winks and giggles and simpers,
And simpers and giggles and winks,
And though she talks but a little,
'Tis vastly more than she thinks.

Her father goes clad in his russet,
And ragged and seedy at that—
His coats are all out at the elbow,
He wears a most shocking bad hat.
He's hoarding and saving his shillings,
So carefully day by day,
While she, on her beaux and poodles,
Is throwing them all away.

She lies a-bed in the morning,
Till nearly the hour of noon;
Then comes down snapping and snarling,
Because she was called so soon;
Her hair is still in the papers,
Her cheeks still dabbled with paint,
Remains of her last night's blushes,
Before she intended to faint.

She doats upon men unshaven,
And men with "the flowing hair,"
She's eloquent over moustaches,
They give such a foreign air,
She talks of Italian music,
And falls in love with the moon,
And though but a mouse should meet her,
She sinks away in a swoon.

Her feet are so very little,
Her hands are so very white,
Her jewels are so very heavy,
And her head is so very light;
Her color is made of cosmetics,
Though this she never will own,
Her body's made mostly of cotton,
Her heart is made wholly of stone.

She falls in love with a fellow,
Who swells with a foreign air,
He marries her for her money,
She marries him for his hair;
One of the very best matches—
Both are well mated in life,
She's got a fool for a husband,
He's got a fool for his wife.

Mormonism in 1851.

The officers who were sent out to Utah by the United States Government, and driven back by Governor Brigham Young, have made a report to the President, stating the facts in the case. The report is dated Washington City, Dec. 19, 1851, and is signed by B. D. Harris, Secretary of the Territory of Utah, Samuel G. Banderbury, Chief Justice, and Perry A. Brocchus, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States for the Territory of Utah. We copy a part of it for the purpose of showing the present character of Mormonism :—

To His Excellency Millard Fillmore,
President of the United States :

Sir,—It becomes our duty, as officers of the United States for the Territory of Utah, to inform your Excellency that we have been compelled to withdraw from the Territory, and our official duties, in consequence of the lawless acts and the hostile and seditious feelings and sentiments manifested by Brigham Young, the Governor, and the great body of the residents there, toward the Government and officers of the United States, in aspersions and denunciations so violent and offensive as to render the discharge of our official duties not only dangerous, but impracticable, and a longer residence in the Territory, in our judgments, incompatible with a proper sense of self-respect, and the high regard which is due to the United States.

To enable the Government to understand more fully the unfortunate position of affairs in that Territory, it will be necessary to explain the extraordinary religious organization existing there, its unlimited pretensions, influences, and powers, and to enter into a disagreeable detail of facts, and the language and sentiments of the Governor, and others high in authority, toward the people and Government of the United States.

We found, upon our arrival, that almost the entire population consisted of a people called Mormons; and the Mormon Church overshadowing and controlling the opinions, the actions, the property, and even the lives, of its members; usurping and exercising the functions of legislation, and the judicial business of the Territory; organizing and commanding the military; disposing of the public lands upon its own terms; coining money, and forcing its circulation at a standard above its real value; openly sanctioning and defending the practice of polygamy, or plurality of wives; exacting tithes from its members, and enormous taxes from citizens not members; penetrating and supervising the social and business circles, and inculcating and requiring, as an article of religious faith, implicit obedience to the councils of the church, as paramount to all the obligations of morality, society, allegiance, and of law. At the head of this formidable organization, styled, "The Church of Jesus Christ, of Latter Day and Latter End Saints," stood Brigham Young, the Governor, claiming and represented to be the Prophet of God, and his sayings as direct revelations from Heaven, commanding thereby unlimited sway over the ignorant and credulous. His opinions were their opinions, and his wishes their wishes. He had but to indicate his sympathies or dislikes, and they were made their sympathies or dislikes. In a word, he ruled without a rival or opposition, for no man dared question his authority.

Congress having established a Territorial Government for this people, and extended the Constitution and laws of the United States over them, it was apprehended by us, that in this state of affairs there would be great danger of a conflict of authority, and, in that event, either the United States must yield to the claims of the church, or the latter must give up some of its extraordinary pretensions. We were, therefore, not only anxious for a cordial co-operation of all the officers, in the organization of the Territory and faithful administration of the laws, but equally anxious to avoid everything in the execution of our duties that would be likely to exhibit that conflict. We hoped and expected that as Brigham Young had sought and been honored with the office of Executive of the Territory, he was well disposed toward the Government, and would wield his unbounded influence in subduing the pretensions of the church within proper bounds, and securing a due regard for and obedience to the law. But in this we were disappointed. He soon made us feel that all his sympathies were with the church, and against the Government; that he was jealous of his power as head of the church, and hostile to a division of it even with the United States. He forbade an interview to one of the officers first arriving, and refused to permit the civility of paying his respects to him, as Executive of the Territory, alledging, as we were afterward informed, that he wished no introduction, for none but Mormons should have been appointed to the offices of the Territory, and "none others but d—d rascals would have come there." With another of us, an interview was solicited and made the occasion of a violent exhibition of his temper, and gross personal insult. This feeling of jealousy and hostility could neither be subdued nor concealed; its murmur and mutterings were rife in the community, and it soon broke out into open denunciations of the Government, people, and officers of the United States. The Sabbath and the pulpit were alike prostituted to this purpose, especially if any of the officers happened to be present.

He announced to the immense masses who assembled for worship, "that he was not opposed to the Government of the United States, but it was the d—d infernal corrupt scoundrels at the head of it." In speaking of the organization of the Territory, and the officers, he declared upon the stand, and to individuals, with great feeling, "that he had governed the people for years himself, and he could still rule them; that the United States Judges might remain in the Territory and draw their salaries, but they should never try a cause if he could prevent it." Another speaker, high and influential in the church, encouraged by this determination of the Executive of the Territory, announced from the pulpit to a large audience, "that the United States officers might remain in the Territory so long as they behaved themselves and paid their boarding; but if they did not, they (the Mormons) would kick them to hell, where they belonged."

Upon the occasion of celebrating the anniversary of the arrival of the Mormon pioneers into the valley, (the 24th of July,) an immense concourse of their people were assembled from all parts of the Territory. Those of us then in the Territory, were invited to be present and participate in the festivities of the occasion. We were seated upon the stand or platform, with a number of the leading men of the church, including the present Delegate in Congress, (Hon. John M. Bernhisel.) The Governor rose to address the audience, and a profound silence ensued, as is always the case when he rises to speak. After reflecting in terms of condemnation upon the alledged hostility of Gen. Taylor to the Mormons, and to giving them a government, he exclaimed, in a loud and exulting tone, "But Zachary Taylor is dead and in hell, and I am glad of it." Then, drawing himself up to his utmost hight, and stretching out his hands toward heaven, he declared, in a still more violent voice, "And I prophesy, in the name of Jesus Christ, and by the power of the priesthood that is upon me, that any President of the United States who lifts his finger against this people, shall die an untimely death, and go to hell!" To this sentiment there came up, from those seated around us, and from all parts of the house, loud and mingled reponses of "Amen!" "Good!" "Hear!" &c. With the invitation to be present on this occasion was included and invitation to dine with the Governor. Although we believe the occasion of our presence was seized upon the by Governor to show us how brave and independent he could be in his declarations, and with what impunity our feelings could be outraged and insulted, we were forced, from an indisposition to produce a rupture, and break off our official relations so soon after our arrival, to smother our indignation, an mingle in the parade of a dinner.

Upon a subsequent occasion, in reply to the remarks made by one of the undersigned upon the subject, before a large audience, the Governor reiterated and declared, "I did say that Gen. Taylor was dead and in hell, and I know it!" A man in the crowd, seemingly to give the Governor an opportunity of fixing its truth, spoke out and said, "How do you know it?" To which the Governor promptly answered, "Because God told me so." An elder in the church, laying his hand upon the shoulder of one of the undersigned, added: "Yes, Judge; and you'll know it, too, for you'll see him when you get there."

In reproach of our Government, it was declared, in our presence, before a large audience, by another speaker, that "the United States had intended the utter destruction of the Mormons, and in a cruel, wanton, and dastardly manner had torn away five hundred of them from their wives and children, and forced them into service as soldiers, leaving their wives and children to perish on the frontiers."

Another speaker, in a tirade against the Government, announced to the people, in presence of two of us, invited to take seats upon the stand, that "the laws and policy of the United States were intended to oppress the poor;" that "the Government of the United States was a stink in the nostrils of Jehovah, and no wonder the Mormons wished it down;" that "they could save it by theocracy; but rather than save it in any other way, they could see it d—d first." Another one had declared "that it was going to hell as fast as it could, and the sooner the better."

In justification of their feelings of hostility to our Government, another speaker urged with much feelings that "the Mormons were proscribed by the United States—he had two wives, others of his brethren had more, and brother Brigham Young still a greater number, and none of them dare return to the United States, with their families; for their dirty, mean, little, contracted laws, would imprison them for polygamy."

The Mayor of the city, (Jedediah M. Grant,) in a speech upon the subject, declared with great confidence that "the United States could not conquer them with arms." * * *

Congress appropriated $20,000, to be applied under the direction of the Governor and Legislature, in the erection of public buildings. The Governor no sooner received this money than he embezzled every dollar of it, or the greater portion of it, in payment of debts due by the Mormon Church, and in a few days after its arrival in the valley it was on its way to the United States in other hands.

The Secretary had with him twenty-four thousand dollars, to be applied in payment of the per diem and mileage of the members of the Legislature, and contingent expenses. It was understood that the members, being all Mormons, would relinquish their daily pay and mileage to the Church; when it became known that the officers intended leaving the Territory. The Governor determined to secure these twenty-four thousand dollars, in addition to the $20,000 appropriated for public buildings, and at all hazards, if he had to take it by violence. He, therefore, sent out runners over the Territory, and secret notices to the members in the city, to meet in two or three days thereafter. They met accordingly on the 22d September, and after spending a part of a week in meeting and adjourning until organized, passed a formal resolution, ordering and requiring the United States Marshal to demand this money from the Secretary, and if he refused to give it, to seize and imprison him, until he delivered up the whole amount. The Marshal being absent, his deputy, a Mormon, undertook the execution of the order. The Secretary refused to comply with the demand, and transmitted his reason therefor in writing. As Governor Young had threatened to take the money, "law or no law," and members of the Legislature had declared that they would cut his throat from ear to ear before he should leave the Territory with it, he applied to the Supreme Court for an injunction, which was granted, forbidding the Marshal and others from seizing or intermeddling with the funds and other property of the United States in the custody of the Secretary. * * * *

We deem it our duty to state in this official communication, that polygamy, or plurality of wives, is openly avowed and practiced in the Territory, under the sanction and in obedience to the direct commands of the church. So universal is this practice, they very few, if any, leading men in that community can be found who have not more than one wife each, which creates a monopoly, and which was peculiarly hard upon the officers sent to reside there. The prominent men in the church, whose example in all things it is the ambition of the more humble to imitate, have each many wives, some of them, we are credibly informed and believe, as many as twenty or thirty, and Brigham Young, the Governor, even a greater number. Only a few days before we left the Territory, the Governor was seen riding through the streets of the city in an omnibus, with a large company of his wives, more than two-thirds of whom had infants in their arms—a sure sign that the evil is increasing. It is not uncommon to find two or more sisters married to the same man; and in one instance, at least, a mother and her two daughters are among the wives of a leading member of the church. This practice, regarded and punished as a high and revolting crime in all civilized countries, would, of course, never be made a statutory offense by a Mormon Legislature; and if a crime at common law, the court would be powerless to correct the evil, with Mormon juries.

The City of Great Salt Lake is an important point in the overland route to Oregon and California, for the emigrant to replenish his stores, or to winter if overtaken by the advance of the season; but the intimidation which is produced by the denunciations and conduct of the Mormon Church and people upon citizens of the United States passing through or engaged in business there, is such as to induce the emigrant to avoid it, if possible, and the resident to submit without a murmur. No man dare open his mouth in opposition to their lawless exactions, without feeling its effects upon his liberty, his buisness, or his life. And thus, upon the soil of the United States, and under the broad folds of its stars and stripes, which protect him in his rights in every part of the civilized world, there is a spot where the citizen dare not exercise the liberty of a freeman. We were told that many of the "Gentiles" (as all are called who are not members of the Mormon Church, and have only one wife,) have been sentenced, for trivial offenses, to two, five, and ten years of labor upon the public highways, with ball and chain to their legs, with no shelter at night but caverns dug in the earth by their own hands. We have seen one of these highways, cut out of the side of a mountain, and the caverns far down at the base; but the approach of the federal officers, we are told, was the signal for the release and banishment of these convicts from the Territory into Texas.

Washington Hunt, Governor of the State of New York, delivered his Annual Message to the Legislature on the 6th inst. It is too long for us to copy entire; but we give below extracts embodying the most important facts.

Financial.

The State of New York may well be proud of her Financial condition. Her entire indebtedness falls short of $22,000,000, while her Canal Revenues alone for the year just closed exceeded $3,700,000; which sum, after paying all the expenses of Repairs and Management, $1,650,000 principal and interest of the Canal Debt, and $200,000 toward the ordinary expenses of the Government, left a surplus of $950,000 to be devoted to the completion of our Public Works. Of the $9,000,000 to be borrowed to complete these Works, $1,500,000 has recently been obtained on six per cent. bonds which the State agrees to pay only in case the Canal Revenues shall suffice for that purpose, yet these bonds have sold above par. The Individual Property subject to Taxation by the State is officially valued at $1,100,000,000, and is doubtless worth $1,500,000,000. The Canal Revenues of the past year exceed those of the preceding by $235,000, and the Half Mill Tax for general purposes has also (owing to a more just and equal valuation of property) yielded a large increase over the proceeds of any former year. Gov. Hunt suggests that this tax may be reduced, but exhorts to caution in the reduction of our Canal Tolls in view of the pledges of said Tolls to secure the payment of our new Canal Stock. Our School Fund exceeds $6,500,000, which, added to the fair productive value of our Public Works, makes a total of over Fifty Millions of Dollars against a Public Debt of some Twenty Millions.

Educational.

The funds devoted to school purposes are believed to be in a safe and healthy condition. On the 30th of September, the capital of these several funds was as follows:

Common School Fund	$2,325,449 72
United States Deposit Fund	4,014,520 71
Literature Fund	272,880 12

Making an aggregate of $6,612,850 55 invested in productive securities for the advancement of education.

The annual report of the Superintendent will present a complete view of the operations of our Common School system.

The number of children taught during the year was 726,291; the whole amount expended for teachers' wages, including books for school libraries, was $1,432,696. Under the present law the State furnishes $1,100,000 of the amount required annually for the support of the district schools, viz: $300,000 from the income of the School Fund, and $800,000 required to be raised yearly by State tax. It is estimated that the sum thus furnished from the treasury will be sufficient in most cases, to make the schools free for six months in each year; leaving it for each district to provide means by rate bills for such additional period as the school may be taught.

The ordinary appropriations in support of Colleges were omitted by the two last Legislatures. The present condition of the United States Deposit Fund is such as to justify a moderate grant in aid of the higher institutions of learning, and I would renew the recommendations in their favor contained in my last annual message. Several new institutions, including the Genesee College and the Rochester University, which have not yet enjoyed the public bounty, present strong claims to encouragement, and it would seem but just and reasonable that they should be admitted to an equal participation in the patronage of the State. The University of Albany has been organized under favorable auspices, and if the design of its patrons and professors shall be realized, it will ultimately be made equal to the best Universities of Europe.

Much interest has been manifested for some years past in favor of creating an institution for the advancement of agricultural science and of knowledge in the mechanic arts. The views in favor of this measure expressed in my last annual communication, remain unchanged. My impressions are still favorable to the plan of combining in one college two distinct departments for instruction in agricultural and mechanical science; but many, whose opinions are entitled to weight, contend that a separate establishment for each branch, would be most advantageous to both. Before adopting any final action on the subject, the merits of the several systems of organization that have been proposed should be maturely considered. I would respectfully recommend that a sufficient portion of the proceeds of the next sale of land for taxes be appropriated to the erection of an institution which shall stand as a lasting memorial of our munificence, and contribute to the diffusion of the useful sciences and the elevation of the producing classes, during all future time.

Charitable Institutions.

It appears from the official report that the number of inmates in the State Lunatic Asylum at Utica, on the 30th of November last, was 435; the number in the Lunatic Asylum on Blackwell's Island on the 20th of December, was 523.

The total number of insane persons in this State in 1850, as shown by the census of that year, was 2,506, of whom 1,106 were in the Asylums, leaving 1,400 to be supported in private families or poor-houses. It is evident, therefore, that some further provisions ought to be made for the relief of this unhappy class of our fellow-beings. The number of pupils in the Institutions for the Deaf and Dumb at the close of the year, was 244, of whom the State supports 160.

The New York Institution for the Blind contained 139 inmates, of whom 86 are State beneficiaries.

In pursuance of the act passed by the last Legislature, the Trustees appointed for the purpose have established an Asylum for Idiots. They have fortunately secured the services of Dr. H. B. Wilber as Superintendent, whose efforts for the improvement of imbeciles have been attended with great success. A suitable building was procured in the vivinity of this city, and the school has been opened under encouraging circumstances.

Prisons, &c.

"The number of convicts in the several State Prisons on the 1st of Dec. last, was as follows :—

Sing Sing,	830
Auburn,	771
Clinton,	113
Total,	1,714

The number pardoned from these prisons during the last year was 104."

"An extraordinary number of capital offenses and a considerable increase in other crimes, have made the last a memorable year in the judicial annals of the State. This melancholy fact must be attributed in a large degree to the prevalence of intemperance in our cities and large towns—a growing evil which has become the most prolific source of wretchedness, pauperism and, crime.

"During the year, seventeen persons were found guilty of murder and three of arson in the first degree; and several more are in prison awaiting trial. Of the number thus convicted six have been executed; the sentences of five have been commuted to imprisonment for life, and nine await the time fixed or to be fixed for their execution."

"My reflections upon the subject have produced a belief that the ends of justice would be promoted by submitting every capital conviction to a review by the Judges of the Supreme Court, before fixing a day for the execution of the sentence."

Immigrants.

It appears from the information furnished by the Commissioners of Emigration, that nearly 300,000 emigrants were landed at the port of New York during the last year. The most gratifying success has attended the efforts of the Board to provide for the wants and better the condition of the destitute strangers who are coming among us in such extraordinary numbers. More than 20,000 of the sick and helpless were received during the year into the institutions under the charge of the Commissioners; employment for nearly an equal number was obtained through their friendly agency; many thousands were forwarded to the interior at the expense of the emigrant fund; and effectual measures were employed to protect the whole body of emigrants from those nefarious frauds which had been practiced for years with comparative impunity.

Railroad Accidents.

The frequent occurrence of railroad accidents renders it but too apparent that proper care for their prevention is not now exercised. A large proportion of these calamities might have been avoided by due care in the construction, management, and service of the roads and their moving equipment. The obligation of the State Government to extend its protection to the lives of railroad passengers is imperative, and rests on high moral grounds. I would, therefore, invoke the Legislature to enact such laws as may, on mature consideration, seem most proper and efficient for preventing the recurrence of these lamentable disasters.

[The Governor winds up his message with a lengthy review of the subject of slavery agitation—a hearty endorsement of the colonization scheme—and a peremptory declination of reelection.]

The President and Kossuth.

From the National Intelligencer of Jan. 1, 1852.

M. Kossuth, accompanied by his suite, waited yesterday on the President, to whom they were introduced by the Secretary of State. We do not understand that the reception was designed to be a very formal one, but M. Kossuth read to the President a short address, of which we have been favored with the following copy :—

"Enlightened by the spirit of your country's institutions when we succeeded to consolidate our natural and historical State's right of self-government by placing it upon the broad foundation of democratic liberty :

"Inspired by your history when we had to fight for independence against annihilation by centralized absolutism :

"Consoled by your people's sympathy when a victim of Russian interference with the laws of Nature and of Nature's God :

"Protected in exile by the Government of the United States supporting the Sultan of Turkey in his noble resolution to undergo the very danger of war rather than leave unprotected the rights of humanity against Russo-Austrian despotism :

"Restored by the United States to life because restored to freedom, and by freedom to activity in behalf of those duties which, by my nation's unanimous confidence and sovereign will, devolved upon me :

"Raised in the eyes of many oppressed nations to the standing of a harbinger of hope, because the star-spangled banner was seen cast in protection around me, announcing to the world that there is a nation alike powerful as free, ready to protect the laws of nations, even in distant parts of the earth and in the person of a poor exile :

"Cheered by your people's sympathy so as freemen cheer not a man whatever, but a principle,

"I now bow before you, Sir, in the proud position of your great nation's guest, generously welcomed by resolution of the Congress of the United States, with equal generosity approved and executed by your Excellency.

"I beg leave to express my fervent thanks, in my name, and in the name of my associates, who, after having shared my misfortunes, have now the reward to share the honor and the benefit which the great Republic of the United States was pleased to bestow upon Hungary by bestowing it upon its freely chosen chief, when he became a persecuted victim of despotic violence.

"I beg leave to express my fervent thanks, in my country's name, and also, which, amidst the sorrows of its desolation, feels cheered by your country's generosity, and looks with resolution to the impending future, because it is confident that the time draws near when the eternal code of the laws of nations will become a reality.

"President: I stand before your Excellency a living protestation against the violence of foreign interference oppressing the sovereign right of nations to regulate their own domestic concerns.

"I stand before your Excellency a living protestation against centralization oppressing the State right of self-government.

"May I be allowed to take it for an augury of better times, that, in landing on the happy shores of this glorious Republic, I landed in a free and powerful country, whose honored Chief Magistrate proclaims to the world that this country cannot remain indifferent when the strong arm of a foreign power is invoked to stifle public sentiment and repress the spirit of freedom in any country.

"I thank God that he deemed me not unworthy to act and to suffer for my fatherland.

"I thank God that the fate of my country became so intimately connected with the fate of liberty and independence of nations of Europe, as formerly it was intimately connected with the security of Christendom.

"I thank God that my country's unmerited woe and my personal sufferings became an opportunity to seek a manifestation of the spirit and principles of your Republic.

"May God the Almighty bless you with a long life, that you may long enjoy the happiness to see your country great, glorious, and free, the corner-stone of international justice, and the column of freedom on the earth as it is already an asylum to the oppressed.

"Sir, I pledge to your country the everlasting gratitude of Hungary."

The President replied briefly to M. Kossuth's address, in substance as follows :—

"I am happy, Governor Kossuth, to welcome you to this land of freedom; and it gives me pleasure to congratulate you upon your release from a long confinement in Turkey, and your late arrival here. As an individual, I sympathized deeply with you in your brave struggle for the independence and freedom of your native land. The American people can never be indifferent to such a contest, but our policy as a nation in this respect has been uniform, from the commencement of our Government; and my own views, as the Chief Executive Magistrate of this nation, are fully and freely expressed in my recent message to Congress, to which you have been pleased to allude. They are the same, whether, speaking to Congress here or to the nations of Europe.

"Should your country be restored to independence and freedom, I should then wish you, as the greatest blessing you could enjoy, a restoration to your native land; but, should that never happen, I can only repeat my welcome to you and your companions here, and pray that God's blessing may rest upon you wherever your lot may be cast."

And here the interview terminated.

It is recommended by a Joint Committee of the Legislature of South Carolina, that an appropriation of $20,000 be made for the erection of suitable monuments in honor of John C. Calhoun and Col. Pierce M. Butler. The Committee have ascertained that the sum indicated will be quite sufficient for one or more structures of cast iron, in the most substantial and elegant forms, and that it can be so constructed as to make the memorials complete for the purpose in hand, and also to form integral parts for any future extension to commemorate other patriots, or other events in the history of South Carolina, not connected with the names of Calhoun and Butler. The Report of the Committee was adopted, the appropriation made, and the Commissioners appointed to superintend its work.

Winter Arrangements.

Leaves New York at 9 A. M. and 4½ P. M., foot of Cortlandt-st.; at 11 A. M. (freight) and 4.10 P. M., Pier No. 1 North River—for Elizabethport, Elizabethtown, Westfield, Scotch Plains, Plainfield, Boundbrook, Somerville, Raritan, White House, Easton, &c.

Daguerrean Gallery.

Gurney's Daguerrean Gallery, No. 189 Broadway, has been known for years as one of the first establishments of the kind in the United States, and the oldest in the city of New York. He has recently greatly enlarged his Gallery by the addition of more rooms and large skylights, and other improvements, rendering it one of the most extensive establishments in this country. Mr. G. attends personally to his sitters, and from his great experience in the art he is enabled, at all times, to give perfect satisfaction. The large-sized pictures recently taken by his new process are universally acknowledged superior to any heretofore taken in this country. A large collection can be seen at all hours of the day. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to examine them.

DeRuyter Institute.

The Academic Year commences the last Wednesday in August, and closes the last Tuesday in June of each year.

Board of Instruction.

Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress.
Rev. J. W. MORTON, } Assistants.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, }

The Terms for 1851 and 1852 are as follows:—
The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.
" Second " Dec. 3 " " March 16.
" Third " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one or two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term, Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.

Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS.

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00
Drawing,	1 00
Monochromatic Painting	3 00
Oil Painting,	5 00
Writing and Stationery,	0 50
Vocal Music, Elementary,	1 00
Advanced Class,	2 00
Instrumental Music,	8 00

Use of Organ or Piano, $2 00 per quarter.

Board, in private families, per week, from $1 25 to $1 50; in clubs, from 60 to 90 cents.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall Term, and at the middle of the Winter Term, and continue seven weeks. The course will embrace a thorough review of the common school branches, with daily lectures on "The Art of Teaching," Chemistry, Physiology, Laws of Health, School Laws, &c., &c. Tuition $2 50.

Students should not be furnished with unnecessary pocket-money, neither should minors be allowed to contract debts in the village. Either member of the Faculty will superintend the financial affairs of pupils placed under their care, by special direction from parents and guardians, if funds are furnished in advance.

Sabbath Tracts.

The American Sabbath Tract Society publishes the following tracts, which are for sale at its Depository, No. 9 Spruce-st., N. Y., viz:—

No. 1—Reasons for introducing the Sabbath of the Fourth Commandment to the consideration of the Christian Public. 28 pp.
No. 2—Moral Nature and Scriptural Observance of the Sabbath. 52 pp.
No. 3—Authority for the Change of the Day of the Sabbath. 28 pp.
No. 4—The Sabbath and Lord's Day: A History of their Observance in the Christian Church. 52 pp.
No. 5—A Christian Caveat to the Old and New Sabbatarians. 4 pp.
No. 6—Twenty Reasons for keeping holy, in each week, the Seventh Day instead of the First Day. 4 pp.
No. 7—Thirty-six Plain Questions presenting the main points in the Controversy; A Dialogue between a Minister of the Gospel and a Sabbatarian; Counterfeit Coin. 8 pp.
No. 8—The Sabbath Controversy: The True Issue. 4 pp.
No. 9—The Fourth Commandment: False Exposition. 4 pp.
No. 10—The True Sabbath Embraced and Observed. 16 pp.
No. 11—Religious Liberty Endangered by Legislative Enactments. 16 pp.
No. 12—Misuse of the Term Sabbath. 8 pp.
No. 13—The Bible Sabbath. 24 pp.
No. 14—Delaying Obedience. 4 pp.

The Society has also published the following works, to which attention is invited:—

A Defense of the Sabbath, in reply to Ward on the Fourth Commandment. By George Carlow. First printed in London, in 1724; reprinted at Stonington, Ct., in 1802; now republished in a revised form. 168 pp.
The Royal Law Contended for. By Edward Stennet. First printed in London, in 1658. 60 pp.
An Appeal for the Restoration of the Lord's Sabbath, in an Address to the Baptists from the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference. 24 pp.
Vindication of the True Sabbath, by J. W. Morton, late Missionary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. 64 pp.

These tracts will be furnished to those wishing them for distribution or sale, at the rate of 15 pages for one cent. Persons desiring them can have them forwarded by mail or otherwise, on sending their address, with a remittance, to George B. Utter, Corresponding Secretary of the American Sabbath Tract Society, No. 9 Spruce-st., New-York.

THE SABBATH & THE RESURRECTION.

From "An Examination of the Authority for a Change of the Weekly Sabbath at the Resurrection of Christ; proving that the Practice of the Church in substituting the First Day of the Week for the appointed Seventh Day, is unsanctioned by the New Testament Scriptures. By JAMES A. BEGG, Author of a Connected View of the Scripture Evidence of Christ's Speedy Return, &c." [Continued.

Professor Stuart, indeed, in his Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, speaks of Sabbaton, in Greek, as a word in regard to which "there appears to be no difference between the plural and singular form;" and others have adduced supposed instances from the Gospels in support of this idea. Some, at least, of the texts so presented in proof of this, seem so obviously to refer to Sabbaths generally, rather than to any particular Sabbath, as to suggest the inquiry, whether there be really any instance in the Original in the plural, where a singular meaning is the idea intended to be conveyed.

But, if it be true, as our commentators thus believe, that, in translating the "Sabbaths" of the Greek, here, either the singular or plural may be used "indifferently," then, may it not be, that, when the Evangelists write "Sabbaths," in the plural, they mean Sabbaths, in reality, and that we are truly to understand it Sabbaths accordingly? If even only "indifferently" used for either singular or plural, there can be no necessity for our reading it in the singular when it is written in the plural. In other instances, all of the Evangelists, confessedly, sometimes write "Sabbath," in the singular, when they mean it to be understood in a singular sense; and in other instances, again, they also write it in the plural, when, confessedly, intending to convey a plural sense. In the contexts, they write Sabbath in the singular; but there is a perfect harmony among them in writing it in the plural when speaking of the Resurrection morning; and we cannot doubt that this is done designedly, as conveying equivocally the precise meaning intended, not as saying that one Sabbath, but "Sabbaths"—therefore, two at least—had intervened between the interment and Resurrection of Christ. We believe this on the ground that, while, in the respective contexts, they severally speak of the Sabbath in the singular, when obviously this is the true meaning; so also, when now they equally unite in all writing "Sabbaths," a corresponding translation in the plural should be adopted. But were we even to accept the principle of interpretation, that, when the Evangelists write "Sabbaths," we, in the exercise of a sound discrimination, must, ourselves, determine whether they mean it to be understood in the singular or the plural, then we say, that even on this principle, our Lord's predictive sign will come in as an all-important element of consideration, absolutely determining for us, that in order to His being three days and three nights in the heart of the earth, two entire days must have intervened between the time of His interment and that of His Resurrection; and the first of these two days—the fifteenth of the month—we know otherwise, and learn also from all the Evangelists, was "a Great Sabbath." Another day, besides, He must have been in the tomb. If, then, that next day, following immediately after that high Passover Sabbath, was the weekly Sabbath, or if any other Sabbath, of festival character, that year, followed immediately after the Passover Sabbath, then the two entire days during which Christ lay in the tomb would both be "Sabbaths," and the morning of the Resurrection would be one day from or after the Sabbaths. We are ignorant of any festival Sabbath that could have so come in immediate succession after the Passover Sabbath; and as, for aught we know, it may really have been the weekly Sabbath, although we know of no proof that it was so, we can perceive that such a supposition would give distinctness to the Evangelists' language.

And while the Spirit of God—so careful in noting the accomplishment of predictions concerning Christ, and in showing out the significancy and perfection of types prefiguring His work—has not seen it to have been a matter of such importance to the church, that we should assuredly know, on which day of the week Christ rose from the dead, as to put a direct statement of it on record in the Word, it may yet be true, though incapable of positive proof, that "the third day," on which He rose from the dead, according to the Scriptures, was the first day of the week. If we were to assume, with the church, contrary to the clear evidence we have produced, that the day immediately following His crucifixion was the weekly Sabbath, we should then say, that Christ's truth rendered it impossible that His Resurrection could have taken place on the first day of the week. But, we seek only for the truth, and will not accept the aid of known falsehood to establish it. We have no preference of our own for any unrevealed day; nor have we any dislike to the supposition, that, the Resurrection was on the first day; but, if required to believe this is as an absolute truth, we must ask for evidence to justify that belief. We go farther, and say, that although we could not regard a conclusion so arrived at, as matter of faith, yet, as we know of no other Sabbath to follow immediately after the Annual Passover Sabbath, (although it is stated that the Jews were accustomed to speak of the intervening days between the appointed Passover Sabbaths, the First and Last days of the Passover Feast, as "the lesser solemnity,") we are by no means unwilling to avow, that, looking at the whole circumstances of the case, we can offer no better solution of the meaning of the "Sabbaths," spoken of by all the Evangelists, than that the weekly Sabbath may have that year followed immediately the Great Annual Passover Sabbath, the 15th of Nisan.

Reverence for the word, as received, and a perception of the fact, that while the Evangelists, in speaking of the Resurrection morning, all put in connection with "Sabbaths," in the plural, although in their respective contexts they speak also of a "Sabbath" in the singular, render us unwilling to suppose, and until better reason be adduced, impossible to believe, that they are equally to be understood as meaning precisely the same thing, when they write, in one instance, Sabbaths in the plural, and when in another they write "Sabbath" in the singular. Mark, in the very same verse, even, in which he writes of these "Sabbaths" has already spoken of a single "Sabbath," which "was past." "When the Sabbath was past, Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James and Salome, had bought sweet spices, that they might come and anoint Him. And very early in the morning, of the one of SABBATHS, (tes mias Sabbaton,) they came unto the sepulchre, at the rising of the sun." Mark xvi. 1, 2.

Here we have first a reference to a Sabbath, in the singular, which having been past, forms the reason of the procedure of these women in coming to the sepulchre, "the one of Sabbaths," in the plural. Whatever this last phrase may mean, then, the use of it by the Evangelist does not seem to arise from his making "no difference between the singular and plural form," but, on the contrary, from his desire to express a different meaning, by the difference of the words used. Whether, therefore, we can understand the allusions or not, there seems a discriminating, rather than an indiscriminate use of the singular and the plural. So, in the preceding context, when he refers to "the preparation, that is, the day before the Sabbath,"—a preparation which belonged to the Passover Sabbath only—he does not speak of it in the plural, but quite distinctively, in the singular, as "the day before the Sabbath." Mark xv. 42.

In like manner, Luke, before he speaks of the Resurrection as having been on the morning of "the one of the Sabbaths," has, in the immediately preceding context, repeatedly spoken of the Passover Sabbath, in the singular, and not in the plural, as when the "Sabbath drew on;" and when the women "rested the Sabbath day, according to the commandment." Luke xxiii. 54, 56. John, also, (xix. 31,) when he records the desire of the Jews "that the bodies should [illegible] cross on the Sabbath day, (for that Sabbath day was an high day,) in both instances uses the word in the singular; yet, again, when he speaks of the Resurrection morning, it is "the one of Sabbaths." Does this look as if, in his mind, when so using the words, there was "no difference between the plural and singular form?"

It is, however, worthy of remark, that Matthew twice speaks of Sabbaths, in the plural. The words which in our translation read, "In the end of the Sabbath, as it began to dawn toward the first day of the week," are according to the Greek, "And late of Sabbaths, the dawning toward the one of Sabbaths;" (Opse de Sabbaton, te epiphoskouse eis mian Sabbaton,) or according to Poole's translation of the first clause, "'in the end of the Sabbaths,' the evening or night following the Sabbaths." In thus connecting these two, the Evangelist seems to confound sunset and dawn, in a manner which has occasioned the critics not a little difficulty. Griesbach, as we have remarked, avoids this, by dividing the chapter otherwise. He connects the words "late of Sabbaths," (Matt. xxviii. 1,) with the closing words of the preceding chapter, as intimating the period at which the tomb was secured: "They went and made the sepulchre sure, sealing the stone, and setting a watch, late of Sabbaths." Griesbach does not, indeed, seem to refer to the fact that Sabbaths here is in the plural; nor do we know the precise grounds for the conclusion to which he has come respecting it—as, in Bagster's list, our authority, it is given under the head of passages presented in a form different from the usual one, "on account of some variety in the punctuation, or some various reading which he rejects."

If this reading, however, be well founded, the correction may, perhaps, be of more consequence than at first appears. For then the Evangelist would seem to intimate, although application was more early made to Pilate for the securing of the sepulchre, that yet this was not done, until Christ had already been in the tomb two entire nights and two entire days, and both of these days "Sabbaths." It was "the next day that followed the day of the preparation," the day following that on which He was crucified, therefore, and, consequently, the Passover Sabbath, that the Jews came to Pilate. (Matt. xxvii. 62.) They state the danger which they feared, and the need of caution. It does not appear that any obstacle was thrown in the way by Pilate, or any delay in his acceding to the request. He said unto them, "Ye have a watch; go your way, make it as sure as ye can." Ver. 65. Nor is there here any express mention of their having at all deferred carrying their purpose into execution, unless this be implied in the proposed emendation, "So they went, and made the sepulchre sure, sealing the stone, and setting a watch, late of Sabbaths." But if, from any cause, the Jews were prevented from executing their design until the close of the day following that on which they made their application, one important purpose would be served. His enemies would, themselves, be the evidence that the sign of His Messiahship was well nigh fulfilled, ere the precautionary measures which it led them to adopt had been carried into execution. Two days and two nights would have already completely expired, and a few hours more, would exhaust the third night, and bring them to the morning of the third day. [To be continued.

WHAT IS A YEAR?

What is a year? 'Tis but a wave
On life's dark rolling stream,
Which is so quickly gone that we
Account it but a dream.
'Tis but a single earnest throb
Of Time's old iron heart,
Which tireless now, and strong as when
It first with life did start.

What is a year? 'Tis but a turn
Of Time's old brazen wheel;
Or but a page upon the book
Which death must shortly seal.
'Tis but a step upon the road
Which we must travel o'er;
A few more steps, and we shall walk
Life's weary road no more.

What is a year? 'Tis but a breath
From Time's old nostrils blown,
As, rushing onward o'er the earth,
We hear his weary moan.
'Tis like the bubble on the wave,
Or dew upon the lawn,
As transient as the mists of morn
Beneath the Summer sun.

What is a year? 'Tis but a type
Of life's oft-changing scene,
Youth's happy morn comes gaily on
With hills and valleys green;
Next, Summer's prime succeeds the Spring,
Then Autumn with a tear,
Then comes old Winter—death—and all
Must find their level here.

RHODE ISLAND CORRESPONDENCE.

Educational Reform—Brown University—New College System, &c.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

In closing the series of articles which you have been pleased to call "Rhode Island Correspondence," it may not be amiss to offer a few facts and suggestions on the subject which has been the occasion of my stay in Providence, R. I., and to present to your readers some of the principal features of the College at which I have been a student.

Reforms in education, like all other reforms, are of slow growth, and liable to opposition, both from real enemies, and from the mistaken notions and long-standing prejudices of friends. This last mentioned class present by far the most formidable barriers to educational reform. Very few indeed can be found, who do not do homage to education; but many there are, who deem innovations upon old and time-honored methods of education, as the hight of sacrilege. The time has not been long gone by, when black-boards and outline maps in the school-house were looked upon as sad evidences of declining civilization, and when English Grammar was considered as a bold intruder upon the more important avocations of reading, writing, and ciphering.

All the most important changes in the modes of instruction, have been made in Common Schools and Academies; but some of these, at the present time, can claim no higher sanction than antiquity, for many of their usages and courses of instruction. If we ascend to Colleges and Theological Seminaries, we find that antiquity is still more honored, and that fewer improvements have been made. This may result from the fact that they were founded in more wisdom, and consequently need less improvement than other institutions. But it will hardly be claimed, that founders and presidents of Colleges are perfect; hence we may reasonably look for improvement in their systems of education.

Most of the older Colleges of our country are offshoots from the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge in England, and they retain many of the antiquated customs of those institutions. Whatever may be their virtues, (and they have very many,) nothing is more manifest than that they essentially fail to meet the demands of advancing civilization. This is evinced:—

1st. In the diminished number of applicants for college honors. In an age when the demand for the highest grade of education is constantly increasing, the numbers who knock at the doors of our colleges are diminishing. The infererence is inevitable, that those colleges do not furnish what is demanded. Suppose, for illustration, that the demand for meats and vegetables in this city is constantly increasing, and yet, at the same time, the number who call at the markets for them is diminishing; the inference is inevitable, that those markets fail to meet the demand. At no time in our history have the people at large been more thoroughly imbued with the great truth, that to be extensively useful a man must be extensively educated. The very utilitarian spirit of the age, then, tends to drive young men into college as a means of realizing the idea of utility. Very few young men indeed look forward to the most extensive fields of usefulness, except through the musty halls of colleges. Why, then, is the number of college graduates diminishing in proportion to the number of inhabitants? The answer is obvious; Colleges do not meet the demands of the age.

Again, this conclusion is greatly strengthened by the painfully obvious fact, that by far a larger portion of those who annually go out from our first colleges, loaded with their highest honors, are scarcely able to take care of themselves. They are educated only in name, and their diplomas only signify, that they have staid in college four years, and paid all bills. At the end of three years more, the more exalted title of A. M. is added, which simply means, that God in his providence has let the man live three years since he left college. Very small virtue in the recipient of the new honor! The age demands thoroughly educated men, and our colleges send out men with full recommendations, only qualified to make mortifying failures in any place which their A. B.'s and D. D.'s may secure for them. It may not be expected, that any college system can entirely obviate this difficulty; but it may reasonably be expected, that this class of superficial, titled dignitaries, may be reduced to a minority of college graduates. It is true, that some come out from our colleges thoroughly educated, but they do it in spite of many crippling disadvantages. When such disadvantages are removed, we may hope for more educated graduates. These disadvantages are—

1st. Too much is required for the length of time appropriated. Four years are assigned for a college course, and more sciences and classics are crowded into those four years than can be fairly mastered in twice that number of years. The student is thus compelled to "pony," or be delinquent in recitations. He thus goes through his whole course, makes brilliant translations of Latin and Greek, and comes out profoundly ignorant of all that he has pretended to study. A little, well done, avails more than much only half done. The farmer will find it much more to his advantage to till one acre of land well, than to half till two acres. So the student who thoroughly masters one science or language by his own efforts, will be much better educated than he who skims over a dozen, by the aid of appendices and translations. Let any one take a catalogue of Yale, or Union, or Amherst, and look over the list of studies assigned, and he will not wonder that so few well-educated graduates come forth from those institutions. The time has come when men's education is not measured by the number of books which they have been through. I verily believe that a man would be better educated to spend his four years in Amherst on Euclid's Geometry alone, than to go over the almost endless catalogue of authors of dead languages, whose ghosts rise up before him from his ingress to his egress.

The second disadvantage, which is most obvious, is the undue proportion of time allotted to the ancient classics. Far be it from me to disparage the ancient classics; I would rather do them honor by bringing them into proper relations with the more useful and practical branches of science and literature. As a beardless boy appears more dignified at play with his equals, than when placed on the bench of [illegible] their native beauty, when brought into proper relations with modern classics and sciences. But they approach to the appearance of great immodesty when they claim an amount of time nearly equal to that bestowed upon all other branches of study combined. Can any man tell why Latin and Greek are deserving of more attention than the Mathematics, or Mataphysics, or Ethics, or English Literature, or the Natural Sciences? Surely no one can tell why they should have more attention than all of these combined. Such is the unbecoming attitude of the ancient classics at the present time in our most popular courses of instruction. Like every thing inherently beautiful, they lose their beauty when they get out out of their proper place. The two great objects of study are intellectual development and practical knowledge. (I of course do not now consider the moral bearing of the question, which, by the way, I think would ill recommend some of the drunken and licentious Roman authors which the classical student is compelled to swallow as daily food.) If these be the ends of study, then wisdom teaches that our courses of study be so arranged as to best secure them. That the ancient classics are well adapted to the first of these ends is undeniable, but it is equally undeniable that their adaptation to the second end is very limited. So far as they conduce to both, let them enter into our courses of study, but so far as they conduce to but one, let them yield to such branches as will give both mental development and practical knowledge.

This leads to the third disadvantage of our college systems of study, viz.: They nearly all require students, however different their avocations are to be when they leave college, to go through the same course of study. Thus the engineer, whose business is to be with lines and angles, surfaces and solids, &c., must spend just as much time in Latin, Hebrew, and Greek, as the young divine, whose business will be to search and expound the Scriptures, which are written in Hebrew and Greek. So the physician and farmer, lawyer and mechanic, must all pass through the same ordeal, before our colleges can pronounce them prepared for their various avocations. If the young candidate for the pill-bags and lancet, has four years in which to prepare for his business, he had better let Latin and Greek alone, and substitute in their place such studies as will give equal mental development and more practical knowledge. This is true of every profession. It is a false notion, that a man cannot be a scholar who has not spent half his life digging up the rubbish of heathen mythology. Ancient classics add a polish to education, as varnish to furniture; but there can be furniture without varnish which will be useful and durable. So there can be useful and durable education without ancient classics, and it is thought that modern classics may polish an education nearly as bright as the ancient classics. D. E. M.

SOW AS YOU WOULD REAP.—If you should see a man digging in a snow-drift with the expectation of finding valuable ore, or planting seeds on the rolling billows, you would say at once that he was beside himself. But in what respect does this man differ from you, while you sow the seeds of idleness and dissipation in your youth, and expect the fruits of age will be a good constitution, elevated affection, and holy principles.

FUH-CHAU.

Fuh-Chau is one of "the five ports" at which foreigners are allowed to have intercourse with the Chinese. The noble river Min, on which it is situated, flows into the ocean at about 26° north latitude, and 120° east longtitude. On fairly entering this river, you find yourself between two mountain ranges, sometimes approaching the very margin of the stream, and most of the way pressing so closely on its banks as not to allow a site large enough for a place of any size to be built. As you pass along, however, you have a striking and delightful exhibition of Chinese industry; for the sides of these mountains are cultivated nearly to their summits, the ground being laid out in terraces rising one above another till they reach an elevation difficult to be traced by the unassisted eye. At length, about thirty miles from the mouth of the river, the northern range sweeps back from the shore, leaving an extensive and fertile plain in which stands Fuh-Chau with its suburbs. This plain is not an unbroken level, but is diversified with hills, several of which are of considerable elevation.

The city proper lies somewhat back from the river, the walls no where approaching it nearer than a mile and a half or two miles. It is not far from seven miles in circumference, and is surrounded by walls seventeen feet in thickness, and from fifteen to forty feet high. The streets are universally paved with granite, though often presenting a very uneven surface, and are so narrow that no carriages of any description can be used in them. The houses are mostly of one story, the better sort being built of soft brick, or of broken brick and clay commingled. Glass windows are not in use; indeed, windows of any kind are too few for either health or comfort; and in general it may be said, that comfort, as the term is understood in its application to home in Christian lands, is unknown. The population of the city, together with the suburbs, is supposed to be 600,000. [Jour. of Miss.

NEW MISSIONARY GROUND.

On the 18th of November, Rev. B. G. Snow and wife, and Rev. L. H. Gulick and wife, sailed from Boston, under the direction of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, with a view of commencing a new mission among those groups of islands in the Pacific Ocean which are comprised under the general name of Micronesia, a term which signifies "the region of small islands." The substance of what is known of them and of their inhabitants is contained in the charge, [illegible] Gulick at his ordination, by Dr. Pomroy; from which the account is drawn.

Micronesia comprises several groups of islands lying north of New Guinea and the Feejee Islands, east of Celebes and the Philippines, and south-west of the Sandwich Islands, extending through about forty degrees of longitude and twenty of latitude, almost the whole of it being north of the equator. The principal groups in this division, are the Pelew, Ladrone, Caroline, Ralich and Radick Islands, Mulgraves and Kingsmill. The islands are very numerous, but not large.

The Micronesians are of the same race with their neighbors the Polynesians, to whom the Sandwich Islanders belong, and are like them in complexion, features, physical structure, language, customs, and general characteristics. There are, however, some diversities in the different groups of the region. The more southern islands have evidently received some accessions, and some modifications of complexion and character, from the Melanesians on their southern border, while the western section has clearly been reached by influences from the Asiatic continent.

They are social and enterprising. A constant intercommunication is kept up by the inhabitants of the different groups and islands, a circumstance highly favorable to the spread of the gospel among them. In their voyages, it is said, they govern their courses by the stars with great accuracy. They divide the horizon into twenty-eight points, giving to each a name.

Their skill in some of the arts is considerable. Their canoes, which sail either way with equal facility, are covered with a varnish of native manufacture, which renders them water-tight. The girdles or sashes which they wear are made of the filaments of the banana plant, not braided as in other parts of the Pacific, but woven in a simple loom, the shuttle being much like that in use among us.

In regard to general character, all navigators who have visited them are strikingly agreed, and testify that their most striking trait is a certain native kindness of heart, sweetness of natural temper, and an absence of harsh and violent feelings, very rarely to be found among men in the savage state. They are distinguished also from the other inhabitants of Oceanica by the unusual consideration awarded to the gentler sex, as well as by the degree of purity and honesty which are said to prevail among them. They are described as intelligent, considerate, acute in reasoning, and curious to understand the meaning of any novel appearance. It is the opinion of some, that they have descended to their present condition from a higher level of civilization once enjoyed by their forefathers, and some traces of which, it is thought, are still visible. Wars are not frequent among them; and when they do engage in them, they give due notice to their enemies that they are coming.

Their religion is said to consist mainly in the worship of the spirits of their ancestors, which fact shows that at some former period they have had a connection with eastern Asia. They pray and perform certain ceremonies, and among these offer a portion of their food to the spirits; but they have neither temples, images, nor sacrifices. It does not appear that the tabu system, which once prevailed at the Sandwich Islands, has any existence among them. It is certain, there is nothing of the kind in that part of Micronesia which bears the name of the Kingsmill group.

Of the probable population of Micronesia no estimate has been made by navigators, though many of the islands are said to be thickly peopled.

The result of all our researches is, Micronesia promises to be an open and exceedingly interesting field of missionary labor. Some of the inhabitants have heard of the changes wrought at the Hawaiian Islands, and have earnestly entreated that missionaries might be sent to them also.

This mission is to be a branch of the Sandwich Islands mission, and will be composed partly of American and partly of Hawaiian Christians, chiefly of the latter, both males and females. The Hawaiian missionaries, it is expected, will be sustained wholly by their own churches. Other missionaries who may accompany them will derive their support from the same source, so far as may be found practicable.

THE PREACHER AND THE ROBBERS.

A Methodist preacher, many years ago, was journeying to a village where he was to dispense the word of life, according to the usual routine of his duty, and was stopped on his way by three robbers. One of them seized his bridle reins, another presented a pistol and demanded his money; the third was a mere looker on.

The grave and devout man looked each and all of them in the face, and with great gravity and seriousness said, "Friends, did you pray to God before you left home? did you ask God to bless you in your undertakings to-day?"

The question startled them for a moment. Recovering themselves, one said, "We have no time to answer such questions, we want your money."

"I am a poor preacher of the gospel," was the reply; "but what little money I have shall be given to you."

A few shillings was all he had to give,

"Have you not a watch?"

"Yes."

"Well, then, give it to us."

In taking the watch from his pocket, his saddlebags were displayed.

"What have you here?" was the question again.

"I cannot say I have nothing in them but religious books, because I have a pair of shoes and a change of linen also."

"We must have them."

The preacher dismounted. The saddlebags were taken possession of, and no further demand made. Instantly the preacher began to unbutton his great coat, and to throw it off his shoulders, at the same time asking, "Will you have my great coat?"

[illegible]

He then addressed them as follows: "I have given you everything you asked for, and would have given you more than you asked for. I have one favor to ask of you."

"What is that?"

"That you kneel down and allow me to pray to Almighty God in your behalf; to ask him to turn your hearts, and put you in the right way."

"I'll have nothing to do with the man's things," said the ringleader of them.

"Nor I either," said another of them. "Here, take your watch, take your money, take your saddlebags; if we have anything to do with you, the judgment of God will overtake us."

So each article was returned. That, however, did not satisfy the sainted man. He urged prayer upon them. He knelt down; one of the robbers knelt with him; one prayed, the other wept, confessed his sin, and said it was the first time in his life that he had done such a thing, and it should be the last. How far he kept his word is known only to Him to whom the darkness and light are equally alike; to Him whose eyelids try the children of men.

CHINESE CONVERTS.

The Journal of Missions says that at the Missionary Station of the American Board at Amoy, China, two places are open for preaching every Sunday, and by the help of the native members of the church they are also open some part of almost every day or evening of the week for public worship of some kind. Tuesday and Thursday there are Bible classes, and Friday evening a prayer meeting. Once a week the female members of the church and some other women meet with Mrs. Doty for religious instruction and worship. God is blessing these means. The last Sunday in March one man and two women were welcomed to the table of the Lord. Of the women, one is the wife of a member of the church; the other has for her husband a police officer, a man of the world, who has occasionally attended preaching, but probably cares little for religion of any kind. May he, through the shining example and prayers of his wife, be speedily won to the truth. The man was about fifty years of age. Being somewhat deaf, it was difficult for him to understand the word preached. He was also unable to read. Yet under these circumstances his views of the plan of salvation were remarkable clear, showing that the Holy Spirit in his instruction is more than able to make up for all natural deficiencies. Two months afterwards he was called to his reward. During the short space that he had been a member of the church, he adorned his profession by a consistent life, and in the prospect of death enjoyed that peace of mind which the gospel brings. It is pleasing to read of the attention paid him in his sickness by the members of the church, and of their deep sorrow over his death. The church is increasing in strength as well as in numbers. Some of its members, says Mr. Talmage, might be held up as patterns of activity and zeal for church members in Christian countries to imitate. The men are all ready to make known the doctrines of the gospel to their countrymen, and most of them zealously seek opportunities for this.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, January 22, 1852.

FOREKNOWLEDGE---AGAIN.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

When I penned my first queries on the subject of God's foreknowledge, to which an incidental reference had been made by one of the editors, I had not a thought that the matter would be continued thus far. Had I thus thought, knowing my scantiness of time, my disrelish for any thing even bordering on controversy, but especially the presence of an overwhelming sense of inadequacy in view of the vastness of the theme under examination, I am certain those questions would never have appeared in print.

But as from time to time articles appeared in the Recorder, either editorial or selected, which seemed to give countenance to what is popularly denominated the doctrine of "Divine decrees;" and moreover, as it was plainly introduced on 23d of October, in an article entitled "Salvation Illustrated," by Rev. John Todd, and this without any explanation or comment accompanynig it by the editors; I had become anxious to understand the true bearing of these things, and to know their true import. I therefore wrote what I did.

I however utterly disclaim the thought of complaining of the able and worthy conductors of our valuable paper for the manful and outspoken manner in which they present their sentiments in the columns of the sheet under their charge, and for the conducting of which they are responsible. And particularly so, as the columns of the Recorder are always open for the articles of candid reviewers; of which circumstance I now avail myself; not so much, however, for the purpose of reviewing, as stating in a brief manner my views on some of the points involved in the controversy.

But, in the first place, it would seem proper to inquire how far the editor and myself agree in sentiment, that there may be no needless dispute about words.

In the first instance, then, we agree as to God's "foreknowledge," that it is "infinite;" that He "pondereth all our goings." (2.) That this foreknowledge does not in the least interfere with the "freedom" of the agent. (3.) That this foreknowledge has respect to the "certainty" of events only, that is, it has nothing to do with "causing" human actions, only foreseeing them. (4.) That the Divine prescience as clearly and as certainly foresees contingent acts, as those governed by absolute laws. Therefore, human actions are not certain because foreseen, but foreseen because certain.

The question here arises, How can the Divine Being certainly foreknow future events. And this thought is applied to contingent acts, as well as to those governed by absolute laws. And it is argued that, unless contingent events are decreed, God could not certainly foreknow them. He could only "conjecture" them. This argument is based upon the idea that the Divine Being could not certainly foreknow an event unless He had determined it, and this upon the principle of God's "moral" omnipotence; so that he orders moral events "certainly" and "infallibly." This sentiment has been considered, and I freely confess that the difficulties apparent to others do not at all so present themselves to my mind. Of course this will be set down as an instance of the temerity of the unlearned. But to the question, "How can the Divine Being certainly foreknow future (contingent) events, unless they are decreed?" I answer, first, All contingent events that happen, possess the character of absolute certainty. The truth that a free agent might have done differently from what he did, can by no means destroy the character of certainty in what he does. Does he not as certainly do what he does, as if it were decreed? Second—Cannot the All-seeing as certainly foresee future contingent events, as any others? If not, then what of his infinite foreknowledge? To deny this is to deny the very doctrine contended for. But further, cannot the ever-blessed God certainly foreknow a future event, which happens because the creature by whom it is brought about wills it? And can he not know, at the same time, that the creature might have willed otherwise, for any thing God had decreed to the contrary? Now, we are not guilty in this of perpetrating the blunder of saying, that God foreknows a thing at the same time "certain" and "uncertain." This is not the logical sequence.

Again, if a given action that transpires does not so happen because the creature wills it, then where is human responsibility? If I preach to a man, that the actions that he performs he so performs because God has decreed them, does he not necessarily, in so far as he believes my preaching, feel himself relieved from responsibility? But it may be asked, why so many who hold this doctrine also hold the doctrine of human responsibility? To which I answer, for two reasons—1. Because, if the Bible (which is universally acknowledged by Christians) teaches any thing plainly and unequivocally, it is that man is responsible to God and his fellow men for his conduct. 2. This doctrine is also affirmed by universal consciousness. Therefore the doctrine of human responsibility is held in spite of the doctrine of Divine decrees, as under consideration in this article, and not because of it.

I do not wish to tantalize; but I should like to see this proposition reasoned out: All human actions certainly transpire because God has "decreed" them; therefore man is responsible for his conduct.

As to the matter stated in the second article, to which reference has already been made, I have to say, that the explanation given of the second statement, it seems to me, should be satisfactory; and would to God, that the sentiment might be ever present to the mind of the Christian.

As to the first, however, I do not feel so clear. Perhaps I do not understand the writer. If the idea is, that no person "truly" prays until illuminated by the "Spirit of Life," I readily and most heartily agree to it. But if by the Spirit of Life taking possession of his soul is meant being born again—regenerated, I as freely confess that I do not so understand it. But, lest I should fight as one that "beateth the air," I will wait for further explanations.

N. V. HULL.

ALFRED, Dec. 31, 1851.

Remarks.

We know how to sympathize with our correspondent. We have the same "overwhelming sense of inadequacy, in view of the, vastness of the theme under examination," that he complains of, and could heartily wish that the discussion were confided to abler hands. But when a person proposes important questions implicating the soundness of our doctrinal views, we must either make some attempt to answer them, or candidly confess our inability to do so. When our brother's "queries" came, we were not prepared to admit that our creed had been adopted in hot haste. We thought that we had some ground for it, and therefore did not feel ourselves so thoroughly "used up" by a single sweep of his broom, as some others, perhaps, may have thought we were. But we have no desire to prosecute the matter in the way of controversy. The incidental allusion to the subject in our remarks upon the Efficacy of Prayer, was was not intended to rouse the spirit of debate with our brother, nor with any one else. We alluded to it, because the general scope of the argument seemed to require it.

It could hardly be expected, that a person whose system of theology is decidedly Calvinistic, should write, and preach, and talk, from year to year, and yet always keep his system out of sight. It will gleam through his teachings, notwithstanding he may never find it expedient to press it upon the people in a controversial way. So it has been with us, and so we expect it will continue to be, as long as we entertain the views which we do. We could not consent to stand in any situation where we should be bound studiously to conceal our system.

While we are upon this point, we may as well speak out. We may have entered the Seventh-day Baptist denomination under wrong impressions. We certainly thought, that our connection with it involved no modification of the general system of doctrine which we had always held. But we have since been told, so frequently, that our doctrine was not the doctrine of the denomination, and have had our views protested against with such solemn and deliberate dissent on the part of some who seemed to consider themselves the chosen expounders of the denomination's faith, that we can scarcely repress an inclination to ask, Were we mistaken when we formed the connection? In years gone by, we believe there was a document put forth by the General Conference, purporting to be an expose of the faith of Seventh-day Baptists. That document is not now [illegible], it contains nothing on the subject of the "Divine decrees." For aught which that document contains, a man may be either a Calvinist or an Arminian, according to his pleasure. Indeed, we should say, that the denomination, as such, has no faith at all on the subject. We therefore very naturally supposed, that our connection with it left us at full liberty to speak, write, or teach, whatever we judged to be most agreeable to the Scriptures. Were we wrong in the supposition?

But we have no ambition to direct the faith of our brethren. If on this subject they could see eye to eye with us, we should be glad; because we honestly believe, that our views are more agreeable to God's Word, more promotive of true piety, more consolatory to the saints, and more stimulating to the conscience, than those which are radically different from them. Responsible to God, we expect to continue to give utterance to them; but our choice is to do so not in a controversial manner. In fact, both before and since our connection with the denomination, it has been our aim to present this doctrine in a practical form, without reference to those scholastic terms which have so often been the occasion of unprofitable contention.

Whether our editorial career has given satisfaction to the denomination, we do not know. Assuming that it has for the most part, it may be the fact, nevertheless, that our teaching on the particular subject of God's foreknowledge has given much dissatisfaction. Be it so: we have not pretended to set forth denominational views on this subject. We have spoken for ourselves only, in the presumption that it was never expected that we should throw away our independence, and be but the echo of those by whom we were employed.

We trust that our brother will not understand these remarks as implying any censure of his course in questioning us on this important topic. He has done but what he had a right to do, and has done it (for aught we can see to the contrary) in a good spirit. And we will add, that we know of no one more uniformly tolerant of those who differ from him doctrinally, than himself. We simply seize upon the occasion as affording a suitable opportunity of defining our position. Our theology is radically Calvanistic. Our manner of presenting it is well known to be, for the most part, practical rather than controversial. We think this is the best mode of presenting it, because we are convinced that no one can profitably understand the great truths involved any farther than he is taugh of God. Our views are essential to our peace; we could not live comfortably without them. If we thought that we could not, in consistency with our position as an editor, or as a minister of the Seventh-day Baptist denomination, give free expression to our views, we should choose to separate ourselves and stand alone.

Upon the question under discussion, we shall say as little as may be consistent with a respectful notice of our correspondent, and a due regard to our own views. He says, "All contingent events that happen possess the character of absolute certainty." But if this be so, brother H.'s notion of contingency must be different from ours. In a former communication, he undertook to define his notion; but we fear that we have failed to understand him. According to our notion, the term excludes every kind of necessity; and if we mistake not, the term is so employed in all controversies upon free will. Now, we have already shown, in the language of President Edwards, that an event whose future existence is strictly contingent—that is, whose future existence is not in any sense necessary—cannot be foreknown, because there can be no evidence—neither self-evidence nor proof—to any understanding that the event ever will take place. (See our reply to Bro. Crandall, week before last.) Hence certainty and contingency are inconsistent with each other. And it appears to us, that an admission of thee absolute certainty of an event as foreseen by the Omniscient, is an admission of the very principle for which we contend. For instance, the wicked act of the Jews in crucifying the Saviour was foreseen as absolutely certain. There was, therefore, some kind of necessity that the thing should take place. Yet this necessity was not a natural or physical necessity, but only a moral one. There was no other kind of necessity for the act, except that which was requisite to make the connection between the act and God's foreknowledge of it absolutely perfect. And that the connection between the act and God's forknowledge of it was absolutely perfect, infallible and indissoluble, brother H. will have to admit according to his own principles. Now, if a decree be added to the foreknowledge, it does not increase or strengthen the connection; it does not render it more infallible or indissoluble. For, by the supposition, the connection is absolutely perfect, and therefore is incapable of being increased. And if this absolutely perfect connection between the event and the foreknowledge of it is not inconsistent with human liberty—and brother H. is precluded by his own principles from pretending that it is—then the addition of a decree to the foreknowledge is not inconsistent with human liberty; because this addition does not increase the connection.

To say, "that a free agent might have done differently from what he did," does not seem to be a fair way of meeting this question; because such a mode of speech merely expresses the freedom of the creature in acting—a proposition which we do not dispute, and which, as we have just shown, is quite as inconsistent with our correspondent's premises as with our [illegible] creature has no more right to "feel himself relieved from responsibility" for his acts "because God has decreed them," than he has because God foreknows them.

Our correspondent does not wish to "tantalize," but "would like to see this proposition reasoned out:—All human actions certainly transpire because God has decreed them; therefore man is responsible for his conduct." Now, it really strikes us, that a man of brother Hull's acumen ought to have been more careful than to have stated such a proposition. Suppose we should ask him to reason out this proposition:—Mormonism is a system of imposture; therefore the holding of human beings in bondage is a great sin. We presume he would answer at once, that while each member of the proposition is true, and can be proved to be true, the latter is not deducible from the former. To hold men in bondage is a sin; but it is not therefore a sin, because Mormonism is a system of falsehood. No sane person would pretend that it was. Yet a sane person would say, that one statement was not contradictory to the other. Just so in the case under discussion. All human actions are decreed, is one proposition; man is responsible for his conduct, is another. But nobody ever pretended that the latter is a therefore from the former. All that is pretended is, that each proposition is true by itself, and that the one is not inconsistent with or contradictory to the other. We beg leave to state it in another form, and will ask our correspondent to reason it out: All human actions are certainly foreknown; therefore man is responsible for his conduct.

As to the proposition, that no one truly prays till the Spirit of Life has taken possession of his soul, we do not know that we have any thing to say in modification of it. By the Spirit of Life we mean, not merely the illuminating influences of the Spirit, but that influence which makes the soul alive. A man may be illuminated, while yet he is 'dead in trespasses and sins.' But in such a state he does not truly pray. True prayer is a spiritual exercise, and proceeds only from a spiritual nature. Saul of Tarsus never truly prayed till God quickened him to life, though he had, no doubt, used the form of prayer many a time.

T. B. B.

NEGRO PROSCRIPTION IN PENNSYLVANIA.—In the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania, on the 9th inst., a bill was introduced to prohibit the emigration of Negroes or Mulattoes into the Commonwealth. The first section declares, that from and after the passage of the act, it shall not be lawful for any Negro or Mulatto to come into or settle within the Commonwealth; and any Negro or Negroes, Mulatto or Mulattoes, so coming, emigrating, or moving into the State, for the purpose of settling therein, shall be liable to an imprisonment of not less than two, nor more than nine months, upon conviction thereof. The second section says that any person or persons, employing, or otherwise encouraging any such Negro or Mulatto to emigrate into, settle or remain, within the bounds of this Commonwealth, shall be liable to a fine of not less than fifty, or more than one hundred dollars. These fines are to be applied to the use and comfort of the poor, and it is made the duty of the overseers of the poor to watch for and prosecute lawbreakers in this respect.

We can not for a moment entertain the supposition that the bill will become a law in Pennsylvania. It would be worse, if possible, than that law subjecting Seventh-day Baptists to fine and imprisonment for working on Sunday—a law which now disgraces the statute-books of the State named after William Penn, the staunch and consistent advocate of religious liberty and equality.

A COLONY ON THE PACIFIC.

The attention of the readers of the Sabbath Recorder has recently been called to the subject of a colony to the shores of the Pacific. It seems to me that too much importance can not be given to this question. No people are better calculated for colonizing, and none more need the advantages of a suitable colony. Young men especially, those who are looking about them for the best prospect of improving their condition, find themselves completely shut out from many sources of honor, usefulness, and emolument, or are tempted to sacrifice their principles. So it has been, and so it will be. In the Sabbath Recorder for Oct. 2, 1845, was an article to Sabbath-keepers, in which I endeavored to call attention to the necessity of a movement of this kind. At no period in our history has the disposition to emigrate been stronger than at present. Many have gone; others are constantly going. The most of them go out as adventurers, without their families, intending to return—a form of emigration which at this time will be sure to result in moral and social evils of the most disastrous character, and in a great majority of cases will end in disappointment. But there is no benefit in preaching against it; they will go, and it would be a better part to direct the movement to a wise end. An organized movement should be begun at once. Whether I shall ever see the shores of the Pacific again, or not, I can but regard them with great interest, as a land favored in an extraordinary degree by genial climate, inexhaustible resources, and, in geographic position, of such importance in respect to its influence on the future destinies of the lands that bound that vast ocean, as to be almost overwhelming. No point on that coast can be looked upon with indifference.

Our colonies in the West have been chiefly agricultural, and for the sake of locating where they could observe the Sabbath unmolested, they have gone where their influence has been circumscribed, and their children have grown [illegible] have been theirs. Our people are not agriculturists only; they are mechanics, seamen, professional men, and tradesmen; they are all necessary to a well-constituted community. These are the classes that form the population of towns, and towns, we know, have the controlling influence upon the country dependent. These classes, more than any others, need a suitable colony; and I have no doubt, that if a proper place could be determined upon, a movement could be effected that would have a greater influence on the future of our denomination than all the missions in which we are now engaged, and of such magnitude as to control, by numerical superiority alone, the character of the country in which such town may be located. It is plain, that the site of the town should not be on so great a thoroughfare as to lead to the probability of its being overrun with those whose habits are not in conformity with our own. Such places there are on that coast.

Humboldt Harbor was discovered in 1850, by Lieut. Ottinger. It is in latitude 40° 40′, longitude 124° 8′; distance from San Francisco 210 miles. The bay is three or four miles, to the best of my recollection, in a northerly and southerly direction; its entrance is half a mile wide, with 18 feet of water on the bar at mean low tide. The harbor is easy of access, and is the only good harbor between San Francisco and the Columbia river. Three small rivers empty into this bay, which run through a country (though not extensive in comparison with other valleys of California, it is sufficiently so for our purposes,) of great fertility, well timbered, and subject to showers in summer; and the grass is said to be green the year round. The waters, like all on that coast, abound with fish and water-fowl, and the surrounding country with game. The mines on Trinity River are about forty miles distant by land, and the high mountains between this valley and those of the interior serve to isolate it in a sufficient degree from other parts of the country. The high winds so prevalent at San Francisco are less prevalent here. The importance of the place was appreciated as soon as the place was discovered, claims were taken up at once along the bay, and town lots surveyed; but the mines in the coast range of mountains have not turned out so well as was expected, and there is but little else than farming and lumbering done there at this time. I see by the California papers, that they are shipping produce, chiefly potatoes, from there to San Francisco already. The mail steamer from San Francisco to Oregon stops there on her passage. There must be an important town there before long, I have no doubt, capable of developing every branch of our people's industry. I do not know what amount would be required to buy the improvements there now, nor am I certain whether it is not now too late in the day to make that place what we would. Changes are very rapid. But there are others, without doubt, if they are not so advantageous. If an organization is determined upon, it might be well to send out an agent to examine the country at Paget Sound, and other places in Oregon, and stop at Humboldt Harbor, and report.

Twenty-five or fifty families, with at least $100,000 capital to invest as each one deems for his own interest, would be desirable, if they would avoid the hardships incident to a pioneer life; and capital is necessary to compete with capital that is ever ready, even in California, to swallow every thing else. My information of Humboldt Harbor is derived from those who visited it, and confirmed by officers in the coast survey; and unless there are changes greater than I have any reason to anticipate, it is the most desirable place on that coast for a people circumstanced as we are. The expense of reaching it would not be great to those who have no objection to going through the Straits, which, though safe, is tedious. In that case, they would accompany ther goods, and be landed upon the spot with every comfort that they please to provide for themselves. There would be no hardship about it, not so much as one would endure in settling on new land in the valley of the Mississippi at this time. The best time to arrive in the country is March or April.

These are intended only as suggestions. I think there is nothing visionary or impracticable about the enterprise. On the contrary, there is nothing, more practicable, even for the feeble grandsire and child. Others will avail themselves of all these advantages, if we do not, and in after generations our people will, as usual, timidly gather around the hills, and "mourn over the cities of the plain."

If these suggestions meet the approval of those who are friendly to the movement, and they will communicate with me, (post-paid,) I will do all in my power to facilitate it, and aid in the organization.

NOVELTY WORKS, New York.

SABBATH-KEEPERS IN NEW JERSEY.

The American Baptist Publication Society has recently issued an octavo volume of 468 pages, entitled "Minutes of the Philadelphia Baptist Association, from A. D. 1707 to A. D. 1807, being the first one hundred years of its existence." Among the many curious and interesting facts which it brings to light, are several relating to early Sabbath-keepers in New Jersey.

The Seventh-day Baptists, it is well known, were very early to be found in New Jersey; and there, as everywhere else, occasioned considerable discussion on their distinguishing difference from the general body of Baptists, who, on the whole, seem to have manifested much forbearance.

"In the year 1730 a query was presented [illegible] member of a regular church separate himself on account of the seventh day, and join himself to those who hold the same for a Sabbath, when, at the same time, the church he was a member of allowed, if it was to him a matter of conscience, he might observe it, and keep his place where he was a member, and that they would respect him as they used to do; yet, nevertheless, he goes away, and presumes to be a leader among the aforesaid seventh-day people. What must the church do in such a case, in order to discharge their duty?

"Resolved, That it is the duty of such a church, in as moderate a way and manner as they can, to disown such a member, so as he may not be looked upon to be a member any further with them on any account."

Again, in 1753, came a "query from the church at the Scotch Plains: Whether a person, observing the seventh day as a Sabbath, and keeping the first day in condescension, may be received into membership?

"Resolved, That such may, provided nothing else appear to the contrary."

"SABBATH CONVENTION" IN IOWA.

A Convention was recently held in Iowa City, by the friends of the Sabbath, so called, at which the following points were discussed:

1st. The origin and design of the Sabbath.
2d. Its perpetuity under every dispensation.
3d. The authority for its change from the seventh to the first day of the week.
4th. The duty of Christians to keep holy the Sabbath day, commonly called the Lord's day, by spending it in God's worship, and abstaining from all works but those of necessity and mercy.
5th. The evils of Sabbath desecration.
6th. The best method of promoting a proper observance of the Sabbath.
7th. Commercial relations of the Sabbath.
8th. Legislative action.
9th. Circulation of Sabbath documents.

In noticing this extensive programme, the ex-rev. Gilbert A. Beebe, editor of the Liberty Banner, published at Middletown, N. Y., speaks as follows of the third item:—

"3d. 'The authority for its change from the seventh day to the first.' Can it be that these priests are so ignorant as not to know, that there is not a particle of such authority in the Bible? Certainly not; but they wish to humbug the people. Sunday was first observed as a holy day by the Persian sun-worshipers, the followers of Zoroaster. Its partial observance was first introduced into Europe by the Roman Emperor Constantine, in the third century; although but little attention was ever paid to it elsewhere but in Asia, until the Puritanic infection was introduced into England by Dr. Bound, in the 16th century. Such is the authority for the observance of Sunday as a Sabbath; and it is not pretended to be so observed at the present day, except by ignorant, Puritanic bigots in Great Britain and the United States. It is a general gala day over the whole continent of Europe, and observed with every species of popular amusement. Although not a Bible Sabbath, it is by conventional custom a day of relaxation from ordinary vocations, and as such the most convenient day for religious meetings, which are properly enough held on that day. Any other day would be as holy, but not as convenient for the purpose."

THE RELIGIOUS NEWSPAPER.

We promised, last week, to give our readers occasional extracts from our exchanges, showing in what light they view the religious newspaper, and how they think the friends of such a paper can most effectually promote its interests and usefulness. The following we copy from the Christian Watchman and Reflector, one of our very best exchanges:—

A Good Suggestion.

It is a great practical mistake, that the number of readers of religious journals can be greatly increased without interest and effort on the part of those who are their readers and friends already. The Christian newspaper is no exception to that law which makes work necessary, in order to advance all good objects. The British Banner, with its large circulation, deems it needful to make the following suggestions to its subscribers, which we take the liberty of commending to ours. Our friends, we trust, will regard the hint here given, as eminently practical and worthy of immediate attention. Says the Banner:

"Will our subscribers now suffer us to make a suggestion as to the best method of enlarging the sphere of our journal? We would then sit down, and, casting about, make a list of those who have hitherto not taken the British Banner, although not in the receipt of any other paper of the same class, and who, perhaps, are not even aware of its existence; and we would lend them our own copy, begging a perusal of it within a day or two, when we would make a friendly call, and act as circumstances might prompt. Were they to do so, many thousands of fresh subscribers might at once be procured. And why should not this be done? Would it not be a labor of love, a contribution to the welfare of families and the comfort of neighborhoods, one of the most efficient methods of effecting good on a great and permanent scale? The family is the germ of the State, the school of the future citizen, the well-head of the civilization of the age. To purify and quicken with the leaven of truth, beauty, and knowledge, the little circle which clusters around the fireside, and contains the seeds of unimaginable good or evil, is to salt the fountains that in their flow fertilize and make good the whole face of society."

THE SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST MEMORIAL.—The first number of The Seventh-day Baptist Memorial—a quarterly magazine, devoted to history, biography, statistics, &c.—will be issued in the course of the present week. The Historical Department will contain an account of the settlement of the colony of Rhode Island, the establishment of the first Baptist Church in Newport, and the controversy in that Church relative to the Sabbath, which led to the formation of the first Seventh-day Baptist Church in America. In the Biographical Department will be found sketches of the lives of the first five pastors of the Church at Newport, viz. William Hiscox, William Gibson, Joseph Crandall, John Maxson, and William Bliss. The Missionary Department gives a history of the early efforts to promote foreign missions. The Statistical Department furnishes a List of Seventh-day Baptist Ministers, with their post-office address. In the way of illustrations, this number will contain a very fine portrait of William Hiscox, and an engraving of the Seventh-day Baptist meeting-house at Newport, R. I. Specimen copies will be sent to ministers and others in different parts of the denomination, and it is hoped that they will take immediate measures to procure such a list of subscribers as will justify the Publishing Society in continuing the work. Terms—$1 00 a year; 25 cents a number.

WRITINGS OF GARRISON.—R. F. Wallcut, of No. 21 Cornhill, Boston, has published in a neat duodecimo volume of four hundred pages, "Selections from the writings and speeches of William Lloyd Garrison." It includes some of his boldest denunciations, and his most radical sentiments touching the various reformatory enterprises in which he has been so deeply enlisted for the last twenty years. The volume can not fail of being welcome to his friends, and it would be most useful to his enemies, if they could be induced to read it.

ARVINE'S "ANECDOTES OF LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS," which Gould & Lincoln of Boston are publishing in parts, have reached the fifth number. The work is to be completed in eight numbers, at 25 cents each, and will make an entertaining and instructive volume. To persons remitting $2 25, the work will be forwarded by mail, as published, free of expense.

"THE MARRIAGE MOMENTO," by Rev. S. Remington, is a neat little volume on the nature of matrimony, suitable for a wedding gift. It sets forth very plainly the mutual obligations of husband and wife, and gives some wholesome advice to both. Published by E. H. Fletcher, 141 Nassau-st., New York.

"THE PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL," "THE WATER-CURE JOURNAL," and "THE STUDENT," for January, are issued in the excellent style for which the publications of Fowlers & Wells are proverbial. They are well adapted to their respective purposes, and fully justify the popular favor in which they are held.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE commenced a new volume on the 1st of January. It has reached its four hundredth number, and embraces for the last eight years an amount of current literature and history which cannot be found elsewhere in the same compass.

"THE AZTEC CHILDREN" furnish a subject for numerous paragraphs in our exchanges, wherein their origin and relations are discussed. All admit that they are from Central America, and that they are among the greatest curiosities of the day; but whether they belong to the Aztec race, to the sculptured representatives of which on the monuments of Palenque and Copan they bear such a striking resemblence, is a question about which there is much difference of opinion.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, JAN. 12.

In the Senate, Mr. Seward presented a petition from this State, on Russian Intervention, which was referred. Mr. Stockton presented petitions against flogging in the Navy. The Committee on Commerce asked to be excused from Palmer's book on Japan. The Census Printing Job was then taken up. Mr. Smith, of Conn., wished to have the census printed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. When he concluded, Mr. Bright took the floor, and the Senate adjourned.

In the House, a resolution was adopted to inquire into the stability of the about-to-be-enlarged Capitol. The Senate-amended Library bill, for $10,000, was adopted. Mr. Stanly offered a resolution intended to provide for such exiled Hungarians as might be in need, but the House refused to entertain it. Six thousand copies of the Coast Survey were ordered printed, and the House adjourned.

THIRD-DAY, JAN. 13.

In the Senate, Mr. Miller presented the proceedings of a meeting of citizens at Trenton, N. J., expressing sympathy for Kossuth and Hungary; referred. Mr. Shields presented the petition of Alfred W. Thompson, praying that the Postmaster-General be authorized to contract for the transportation of Mails by Steamships between the United States and Ireland. Mr. Stockton gave notice of a bill to establish a line of Steamships from Jersey City to Galway, Ireland. Mr. Bradbury introduced a joint resolution, providing for the publication, in one volume annually, of a compendium of the public documents, and reports of the heads of departments, and this to be published in large extra numbers, instead of the documents themselves. The remainder of the day was spent in talking about the manner of printing the Census Documents.

In the House, several wills were reported and referred to Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union. Mr. Dunham, from the Select Committee, reported a bill explanatory of the Bounty Land Law of September, 1848. The bill extending the act for the punishment of crime in the District of Columbia, so as to cover all cases of incendiarism, was passed. An Executive message was laid before the House, relative to the employment in the West Indies of free blacks and liberated slaves from the United States; but it gave no definite information upon the subject.

FOURTH-DAY, JAN. 14.

In the Senate, several petitions were presented, unimportant bills reported, and a vote was passed allowing clerks to the Post-Office Committee, the Naval Committee, and the Commerce Committee. The subject of flogging in the Navy was then taken up, and Mr. Mallory made a speech in favor of flogging.

In the House, a memorial from E. K. Collins, of the Collins Line of Ocean Steamers, requesting a higher remuneration for carrying the mails, and an enlargement in his share of that service, was presented and referred. Mr. Bernhisel complained that the copy of the charge made against the Mormons presented to him was not the same as that furnished to the House and published in the papers. A brief discussion on the Bounty Land law followed, which, with a short discussion on some improper mode of presenting estimates, closed the weighty business of the body.

FIFTH-DAY, DEC. 15.

In the Senate, non-intervention resolutions from the Legislature of Alabama, were presented and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. A petition was presented from E. K. Collins and associates, contractors for the carriage of the European Mails in steamers, asking for additional facilities to enable them to execute their contracts. The subject of flogging in the Navy was then taken up, and Mr. Mallory spoke in favor of it, and Mr. Hale against it. A joint resolution was introduced providing for a board of practical Engineers to investigate the cause of explosions of steam-boilers and the best means to prevent the same. Several private bills were passed; after which the Senate adjourned till Second-day.

In the House, various bills were introduced by general consent; among them one establishing a Board for the settlement of claims against the United States. Mr. Conger, of Mich., asked leave to introduce a joint resolution declaring the law of nations in respect to the doctrine of non-intervention as understood by the people of the United States, and remonstrating against the conduct of Russia in interfering in the contest between Hungary and Austria. The Speaker decided that it must lie over, and that the resolution could not be referred. Mr. Tuck, of N. H., opposed the passage of the bill to Assign Bounty Land Warrants, and denounced it as a great scheme to squander away a large and indefinite extent of the public domain. No action was taken on this bill, or anything else of moment.

SIXTH-DAY, JAN. 16.

Immediately after opening, the House, according to order, went into Committee of the Whole on private bills. Six bills were passed, including one authorizing the payment of interest to New-Hampshire for advances made to the United States in repelling invasion and suppressing insurrection at Indian Stream in that State. Adjourned to Second-day.

Death of Missionaries.—The Journal of Missions for December furnishes the following list of deaths among missionaries, the intelligence of which has recently come to hand:

At Kuruman, South Africa, July 11, 1851, Rev. Robert Hamilton, for thirty-five years a missionary of the London Missionary Society, thirty-four of which were passed at Kuruman.

At Siam, July 23, of consumption, Mrs. Bush, wife of Rev. S. Bush, of the Presbyterian Board of Missions.

At Berbice, Aug. 17, Rev. Daniel Kenyon, of the London Missionary Society.

At Maulmain, Burmah, Aug. 14, Mrs. Lucretia B. Stilson, aged 37, wife of Rev. Lyman Stilson, of the American Baptist Missionary Union.

At sea, Aug. 26, on his passage from Gambia to Salem, Rev. James Moore, of the Methodist Missionary Society. His death was occasioned by the trisail-gaff falling and striking him on the head.

Seven Days later from Europe.

The Cunard steamer Asia, with seven days later news from Europe, arrived at New York on the 16th inst.

From England, we have reported a rise in Flour, and a decline in Cotton.

The London Globe declares semi-officially that the accession of Lord Granville to office will not change the foreign policy of England.

It is stated that the late Mr. Turner has left by his will a sum of £200,000 for the purpose of founding an institution for the relief of superannuated artists, and has given all his pictures (with the exception of three of his own works, which are left to the British nation) for the purpose of embellishing the building which is to be erected for that purpose.

From France we have an account of the inauguration of Louis Napoleon in Notre Dame, and his installation in the Palace of the Tuileries.

The Consultative Commission presented on the 31st ult. the result of votes favorable to the President. Voters, 8,117,773. Yes, 7,439,216 No, 640,737.

The Archbishop of Paris and the clergy have presented their felicitations and good wishes to the President.

The report that the Pope highly approves of the usurpation is confirmed.

Louis Napoleon's new Constitution will be modeled on that of his uncle. He goes against all representative legislative power.

The President of the Republic has addressed a circular to the Bishops of France, requesting them to celebrate a Te Deum in commemoration of his election.

Louis Napoleon is afraid of being assassinated.

It is said that the French Government has made an application to the Bank of France for a loan of 100,000,000 of francs. This proposition was at first received very coldly by the council of the Bank, which, in the first instance, determined to resist it, but upon further reflection, and in the apprehension, it is said, in case of refusal, that a decree would be issued which would materially affect the bank itself, the council resolved to make the advance demanded by Government.

The Kolnische Zietung has been fined fifty thalers for publishing one of Elihu Burritt's "Olive Leaves" against "Military Pomp;" it was ruled to come within the statute against "turning the measures of the Government into contempt."

The Turkish Government has introduced the culture of cotton in the vicinity of Damascus, with seed procured from the United States. It succeeds well.

A very rich sulphur mine has been opened at Bohar, on the Red Sea. The sulphur can be delivered pure at Alexandria for 62 cents the cwt. Hitherto Egypt has imported yearly some 12,000 cwt., at a cost of $5 50 per cwt. This mine will yield some 25,000 cwt. for exportation during the present year, and will change materially the price of the article in Europe.

The production of silk in Europe has recently undergone great improvements, owing to the introduction of Chinese methods. This is due to M. Julien, an eminent scholar of Paris, who translated into French a Chinese work on the subject. M. Julien has now translated a Chinese manual on the fabrication of porcelain, which it is anticipated, will be equally beneficial to that branch of industry.

A colony of Maronites from Libanus are about to emigrate to Algiers. They will go by land with camels; the caravan will consist of 1200 persons. The French Government have given them land in the province of Constantine.

The Friend of India, on the authority of a Llama lately arrived at Sikhim from Lassa, states that the Emperor of China has just abdicated his throne, having resigned it in favor of the usurper Tien Teh.

The Calcutta papers notice a dreadful accident which occurred recently at the Musjid erected by Prince Goolam Mahomed at the corner of the Durrumtollah-st. The Prince has been in the habit for many years past of making a distribution at the Musjid of warm clothing to the poor at the commencement of each cold season. This year, owing to the death of the Prince's mother, the accustomed dole has been delayed beyond the usual period. On the day of the accident a report got abroad that the alms were to be distributed, and an immense crowd of beggars collected at the Musjid, and pressing upon one of the gates rushed in, in a tumultuous mass. The consequence was, that many were borne down and trodden under foot. Nine persons were killed outright, and many were carried off to the hospital with serious injuries.

Specimens of New York Calamities.

On the evening of the 12th inst., an accident, resulting in the death of six persons, and the probably fatal injury of several others, occurred at a Boarding House in Center-st., N. Y., belonging to the Commissioners of Emigration. It appears that at 9½ o'clock an alarm of fire was sounded in the Fifth District, which was heard by an old woman in the fifth and upper story of the premises above named, which, at the time, contained nearly five hundred persons, most of whom had retired for the night. No sooner had this woman raised the cry of fire, which she said was in the building, than the whole multitude were horror struck, roused from their beds, and rushed for the narrow stairs to escape into the street. The scene at this time, as described by some of those who witnessed it, was truly awful. At the head of each pair of stairs the frantic emigrants appeared, and in their haste to escape, were precipitated to the bottom, and in such numbers piled on top of each other, that six persons were suffocated. The dead bodies were removed to the Station House, and the wounded were sent to the Hospital; and at both of these places the scene presented was agonizing in the extreme, there being at both places fathers, mothers, brothers, and sisters, bewailing, in the most uncontrollable agony, the loss and injury of relatives. The house in which this awful event occurred is nearly new, and had only been used for an emigrant lodging-house about ten days. Its construction, as far as the stairs are concerned, which are more than usually steep, and very narrow, seems to have been badly planned. The Sixth Ward Police generally are deserving of much credit for the promptness and energy with which they acted on the occasion.

On the morning of the same day, about half-past ten o'clock, a fire broke out in the brick dwelling-house, No. 252 Eleventh-st., the second and third stories of which were destroyed before the flames could be subdued. The fire originated in the second story, occupied by John McMahan, during the absence of his wife at market. Their two children, one a boy three years old, and the other a girl nine months of age, were burned to death before they could be rescued from the flames. A woman named Catharine Levin, who was visiting at the house at the time, became so frightened that she jumped from the fourth story window, in the fall fracturing her left leg.

On the morning of the 14th inst., a fire broke out in the three-story brick building No. 18 Morris-st., the lower part occupied as a grocery store, and the upper part by several families. At the time the first alarm was given, the children of the several families were in bed, and in a few minutes the entire premises were so densely filled with smoke, that the greatest consternation prevailed among the inmates. The frantic parents sought in vain for their children, and were obliged to save themselves by jumping from the windows. Two infant children of Philip Heery, named Ann and Elizabeth, were burned to a crisp. Philip Heery jumped from the window with his son Henry in his arms. The father fortunately escaped injury, while the son was considerably injured by falling on the ice. Mrs. Heery, the wife of Philip, had her spine broken by leaping from the window. A single woman, named Sarah Crosby, had her spine broken by jumping from the window. The injured persons were all taken to the N. Y. Hospital. A girl about 6 years of age, was found, after the fire had been extinguished, in one of the rooms, her body being burned to a crisp. An old woman named Catharine Sexton, about 50 years of age, in the confusion, fell out of the third-story window and had her thigh broken.

Disasters on the Western Rivers.—The St. Louis Intelligencer publishes a list of the most serious steamboat accidents on the Western waters during the past year. The whole number is 48. Of these, 26 were caused by striking snags and other obstructions in the rivers; 8 were the result of explosion, 6 of collision, 5 of fire, and the remaining 3 were boats sunk in a storm. The aggregate loss of life is computed at 227. 68 were the result of collisions, and 148 of explosions. The greatest loss of life in any single instance was at the time of the explosion of the Oregon, in March last, when from 45 to 50 souls perished. The destruction of property cannot fall short of a million of dollars.

SUMMARY.

The extraordinary increase of the Anthracite coal trade is again brought to notice by the Miner's Journal, (a very excellent weekly, published at Pottsville, Pennsylvania,) in making up the annual tables of the past year. The trade originated only thirty years ago. Stone coal was unknown as a fuel before that time. During the year 1,020 tons were sent to market. Ten years after, the consumption had increased to 176,000 tons. In 1841, at the close of the third decade, it had reached what was then deemed the enormous tonnage of 958,000. And in 1851 it looms up to 4,383,000 tons! In view of this rapid increase, the Journal may well predict ten millions tuns for 1861.

A dispatch dated Savannah, Jan. 11, 1852, says: The boiler of the steamer Magnolia, Captain McNelly, exploded at St. Simon Island, on Friday afternoon. Capt. McNelly, Thomas Condy, and eleven other persons belonging to the boat, were killed. John Austin, engineer, belonging to New York, and ten other persons, were more or less injured. All of the passengers were saved. The whole of the forward part of the boat was blown off, and she sunk in ten minutes.

Samuel Williams, a colored preacher, was put on trial in the U. S. District Court, Philadelphia, before Judge Kane, on the 12th inst., charged with misdemeanor in giving information to the alleged slaves of Mr. Gorsuch that the man-hunters were on their track. The result of this trial, should the prosecution sustain the charges, will determine whether a person can be made amenable to the penalties of the outrageous Fugitive Slave Law for what may be termed a constructive obstruction.

The American Railway Times, of Jan. 1, contains a list of all the Railways in the United States, by which it appears that the number of Railways in operation is 263, measuring 11,565 miles in length, and constructed at a cost of $335,150,848. The number of Railways in course of construction is 74, measuring 11,228 miles. The total number of Railways is 337, and the total number of miles in operation and in course of construction is 22,893.

The Fort Smith Herald of the 5th ult., says that the Cherokees have determined to sell to the United States a tract of land adjoining the State of Missouri, containing about 800,000 acres. They have appointed a delegation of five to proceed to Washington, to make the necessary arrangements with the government. The principal part of the proceeds is to be applied to the payment of the national debt, and the remainder will be added to their already large school fund.

A tornado occurred in Noxubee Co., Miss., on the 27th ult., which destroyed crops and dwellings. The residence of Dr. Poindexter was torn to fragments, and four persons, one of whom was Dr. P.'s wife, were instantly killed. A daughter was so severely wounded that her life is despaired of, and the Doctor had a leg broken. Two plantations of D. D. Withers, near Fort Adams, the plantation of Major Feltus, on Old River, and several others, suffered severely.

Intelligence was received by the last steamer, of the death of Mrs. Murray, wife of the Hon. Chas. Augustus Murray, the British Consul for Egypt. Mrs. M. was the last of three daughters of the late Hon. James Wadsworth, of Geneseo. She was married in 1850, and immediately set out for the official residence of her husband in Cairo, Egypt, where she died on the 7th of December last.

The Rochester Democrat says that for some time the elect among the believers in Spiritual Manifestations have been quietly removing from Madison and the adjoining counties to Mountain Cove, Fayette Co., Va., where they have purchased $14,000 worth of fine land. The paper dictated by the spirits, and heretofore published in Auburn, will be revived in this new land of promise.

The message of Gov. Fort of New Jersey states that sixteen banks have been formed under the Free Law. Their joint capital is $2,405,000. Circulating notes have been issued to them to the amount of $916,811, of which $113,180 have been returned and canceled, making the present circulation of these banks $803,631. There are 24 incorporated banks in the state. They have a capital of $3,619,900, with a circulation nearly equal to their capital.

A woman was lately buried in a grave-yard, near London, who had been dead upward of five years, a near relation having left her an annuity of 30*l*., to be paid on the first day of each and every year, so long as she should remain on earth. In consequence of this legacy, her surviving husband hired a little room over a stable in the neighborhood of his dwelling, where she was kept in a lead coffin until after his death.

It is a singular fact, that during one of M. Maillefort's operations on Pot Rock, in Hurlgate, the concussion on the shore was so great as actually to split the wall and plastering of a house in the immediate vicinity. The inhabitants of Astoria state that they frequently experienced severe shocks at the period of the explosion of some of M. Maillefort's heavy submarine charges.

On the 22d of December, Mrs. Sarah Pinson died at Scituate, Mass., aged 103 years and 4 months. She was the wife of the late Simeon Pinson, of the same town, and the last revolutionary soldier in it, who died March 22, 1850, aged 96 years and 8 months. It will be observed that their joint ages make precisely two centuries—200 years. They were both born on the 22d day of the month, and both died on the 22d.

Judy Polhemus, a colored woman, died at Jamaica, Long-Island, on the 5th inst., at the advanced age of one hundred years. She was a woman grown and the mother of three children when the British troops landed on Long-Island. She was hoeing corn during the battle of Long-Island, within a short distance of the scene of action.

The Postmaster of Bangor has commenced suits in the U. S. District Court, against some individuals there, for using postage stamps a second time. He had remonstrated with them (knowing the individuals,) but to no effect, and on violating the law again, he took the legal course in the matter. The penalty is $50 for each offense.

Fifty-one negroes, emancipated by the will of the late John W. Houghton, left Augusta, Ga., recently, for Savannah, on their way to Liberia. They will leave in the packet which is expected to sail from that port for Liberia in a few days. Ample provision is made by the will for an outfit for them, and for their support for a reasonable time after reaching the Colony.

The next semi-annual meeting of the New York State Temperance Society will be held at Albany on the afternoon of Tuesday, the 27th instant, to continue through that and the following day. The afternoon of the 28th (Wednesday) will be devoted to a Mass Meeting of the several Temperance Associations of the State and the friends of Temperance generally.

Among the articles added to the British Museum by Layard's researches, are several curious bowls, made of Terra Cotta, and found buried some twenty feet deep amid the ruins of Babylon. The inscriptions on them, which have only just been deciphered, make it probable that they were written by the Jews during their captivity.

The telegraph brings the details of another dreadful affair, in the explosion and burning of the steamer George Washington, near Grand Gulf, on the way from Cincinnati to New-Orleans; sixteen persons were killed, and ten badly injured. After the explosion the steamer and the barges she had in tow took fire and burned up.

Mr. Thomas, a recent writer on China, says that the term "barbarian," as applied by them, is intended for a compliment, and that the word so translated means simply "southern merchant." They consider it a special compliment also to call a man a "red-haired devil."

Heavy snow storms were experienced about Buffalo and Dunkirk last week; the train going west was 22 hours in getting from Batavia to Buffalo on Wednesday night. On the Erie Railroad there were no trains between Dunkirk and Hornellsville for three days, owing to the great depth of snow.

A dispatch dated Louisville, Thursday, Jan. 15, 1852, says: The steamer Martha Washington, bound to New-Orleans, was burned yesterday at Island No. 65, below Memphis. A man, his wife and two children, passengers in the ladies' cabin, and one deck passenger, were burned to death.

Dr. Charles T. Franz, a distinguished German philologist, died at Breslau lately, aged 45. The University of Berlin has lost six of its Professors by death within the last year.

An arrival from Chagres and Jamaica reports that the British Admiral had ordered a Court of Inquiry on the brig-of-war Express, on account of her firing into the Prometheus.

During a severe storm, the house of Dr. N. Q. Poindexter, near Macon, Mississippi, was blown down, and his wife and a son of Capt. J. N. Poindexter were killed.

The health of Thomas Moore, the poet, is very feeble, and his death is daily looked for.

The Watertown Railroad Company has declared a semi-annual dividend of 5 per cent.

The cholera is still fatal in some parts of Jamaica.

A dispatch dated Philadelphia, Friday, Jan. 16, says: The 9 o'clock train from New York this morning, owing to a switch being turned wrong at Bristol, ran into a small brick car-house, driving an empty car through the gable end, and through the dining room of Wm. Stewart, in the adjoining building. Mr. Stewart, his wife, three small children and a girl were sitting around the dinner table, and were all buried in the ruins, but with the exception of one child, whose head was severely cut, they only sustained slight bruises.

The brig Albert Perkins, Thompson, from the Cape de Verds for Boston Nov. 23, put into Newport on the 15th in distress, with loss of masts, sails, boat, &c. &c. The Captain and crew were all sick with the African fever; had not had an observation since leaving the Islands. Died on board at St Anthony, Nov. 21, Charles Graham, of Pawtucket. He was interred on the Island. Charles T. Lambert, of Charlestown, cook, and Daniel, a seaman, died on the 4th of January.

By a table published in The Commercial Advertiser of Buffalo, we learn that the number of accidents which occurred on the Lakes last season was 263, thus shared by the respective months: April 34, May 94, June 12, July 9, August 15, September 34, October 33, November 51, December 11. Five steamers, 2 propellers, $730,575 worth of property and 79 lives have been lost. The year before 395 lives were lost.

The steamer Tappan, bound to New Orleans, with a cargo of 720 bales of cotton, was burned to the water's edge, a few days since, twenty-five miles from Vicksburg. Several persons are supposed lost—among them the second engineer. The Captain's wife jumped into the river, and succeeded in swimming ashore. The papers, books and baggage on the boat were all lost.

The Cincinnati Gazette says: The Colonization Agent for Ohio, Mr. David Christy, informs us that a lady of this city offers about twenty-eight slaves to be sent to Liberia, by the first vessel sailing from a Southern port with emigrants; and that, besides their clothing, &c., they will receive about $800, on setting sail, as a means of giving them a little start in their new home.

D. E. Williams, of this city, says the Albany Journal, has just returned from a fortnight's hunting in the woods of Hamilton County. He has been very successful, bringing home three large deer, a huge panther, which he shot through the neck under circumstances which tried his nerves, several baskets of delicious trout, and any quantity of other legitimate game.

A small brig belonging to Havana, with a large number of men on board, was recently captured off Cabo Rogue, by the authorities of that place, under suspicion of intended piracy. After her capture, the captain was not to be found, and the mate attempted suicide by cutting his throat. On the 13th Dec. she was brought into Mayaquez, when the crew were put in prison, and the affair was undergoing an investigation by the Government.

Kossuth last week visited Baltimore, Annapolis, and Harrisburg, at each of which places he was very cordially received. A splendid banquet was given him at Harrisburg on Sixth-day last. The report of his mother's death is contradicted by foreign papers which the last steamer brought.

The Senate of Ohio has passed resolutions declaring that the United States ought to interfere should Russia, or any other power, meddle with the internal affairs of other nations struggling for freedom.

A dispatch dated Louisville, Ky., Saturday, Jan. 10, 1852, says: Four coal boats from Pittsburgh sunk yesterday while crossing the Falls, and three lives were lost. The boats cantained nearly 50,000 bushels of coal.

The snow-storm of last Sunday appears to have extended almost throughout the country. On that day there was no arrival at the port of New York from a foreign port, the lower bay being completely filled with ice.

Great preparations are making in the Western States for emigration to California. Northern Ohio and Michigan are about sending strong detachments to the golden regions.

It is stated that a large number of French artisans, principally from the Industrial Associations of Paris, are about to emigrate to the United States.

In Buffalo, on the 18th inst., there was a fire which destroyed a large number of buildings, and caused the loss of two or three lives besides the serious injury of several persons.

In Kane County, Ill., on the 24th ult., the thermometer was 14° below zero.

The town of Brandon, Miss., was nearly destroyed by fire on the 16th inst.

MARRIED,

In Westerly, R. I., on the 15th inst., by Eld. O. M. Lewis, Mr. William O. Stanton, of Stonington, Ct., to Miss Sarah A. Berry, of the former place.

DIED,

In Leonardsville, Madison Co., N. Y., on the 11th instant, after an illness of three days, Mr. Benjamin K. Platts, in the 55th year of his age. Mr. P. was much esteemed, as a kind-hearted and benevolent neighbor, as a most affectionate husband and father, and as a devout Christian. For many years he was an active and useful member of the first Seventh-day Baptist Church in Brookfield. In all these relations, his loss is severely felt. Though taken suddenly away, he was, unquestionably, fully prepared for his change; and we trust he is now enjoying the blessed fruits of a well-spent life.

In Brookfield, Madison Co., N. Y., January 15th, of erysipelas of the head and face, Mr. Benjamin West, in the 81st year of his age. His disease, though of short duration, was of a painful nature, which he bore with Christian fortitude, and with entire resignation to the Divine Will.

Two Living Aztec Children.

A NEW AND ABSOLUTELY UNIQUE RACE OF MANKIND—The most extraordinary and inexplicable phenomena that the history of the human race has yet produced, can be seen for a few weeks at the large Exhibition Room of the Society Library, corner of Broadway and Leonard-street. They were recently taken from a newly-discovered and idolatrous people in Central America, by whom they were kept with superstitious veneration, distinct and secluded as a caste of their priesthood, and employed as Mimes and Bacchanals in their Pagan ceremonies and worship.

They are male and female. The latter measuring 29½ inches in height, weighing 17 lbs.; the former is 33 inches high, and weighs 20 lbs.

From repeated and careful examination, the best Physiologists state the older to be 12 or 13 years of age; the younger about 10 years.

They differ altogether from examples of the dwarf kind, and from children; affording complete and undeniable illustration of a Piamean variety of the Human Race!

Miscellaneous.

Poultry Houses near Horse Stables.

I notices in a late number of the Rural, in an article from the Germantown Telegraph, that a writer recommends building hen houses behind, or adjoining horse stables, in order that the manure might be thrown in for the fowls to scratch and work over.

Now, so far as throwing in the manure is concerned, I agree with the writer, but if farmers or fowl fanciers wish to rid themselves or their horses of an almost everlasting pest, by all means let them keep their hen roosts away from behind or adjoining the horse stable. I can speak from experience in this matter; and there are those about here of my acquaintance, who can bear testimony to what I have stated. Yes, keep your hen houses a proper distance from your horse stables. And for the benefit of those who desire it, I will briefly give my reasons for making the statement.

During the early part of my keeping fowls, I had their roosting place adjoining the stall where I kept my horse, with a partition between. I think it was the second year after I kept my hens in this manner, that I discovered there was something the matter with my horse. He showed a disposition to rub and bite himself, but for a long time I paid little regard to it, thinking he would soon get over it; but it seemed to increase upon him. I could fit up no stall or partition of sufficient strength to resist his efforts. I could leave him no where unhitched, and if I hitched him he would soon break loose, and get to some place where he could rub. For six months or more, he continued in this manner, before I ascertained what ailed him. I tried various remedies for humors in the blood; bled him copiously—drenched him with physic till he could hardly stand, and all to no effect. He was a large and valuable horse commonly, but at this stage of matters he was truly a sight to behold. He was minus his mane, and was in nearly the same condition with his tail—his sides lacerated and naked in consequence of his continual rubbing and biting. At last the thought struck me that the animal might be lousy—and on close examination. I found he was literally covered with small hen lice, and they adhered so closely to the skin, that it was almost impossible to comb out one with a fine comb. I now changed my course of doctoring, and by dint of perseverance—by the application of various remedies for the cure of lice, in the course of six or eight weeks, I succeeded in effecting a perfect and lasting cure.

The first thing I did after this was to remove my hen roost, and scald and whitewash my horse stable. I have not been troubled with hen lice getting on my horse since. I have heard of similar cases where horses have been afflicted in the same way; hence I conceive it to be the safest way not to build a hen house behind the horse stable.

If it should so happen that this article fall under the eye of any one who has a horse that has become lousy from the same cause, I shall be happy to inform him how they may be destroyed. [Rural New Yorker.

Care of Stock.

The season of the year admonishes farmers to look well to the state of their flocks and herds. Cows especially that give milk, require attention and care. The following hints for the season on the keeping of milch cows, are well said. We copy from the Farmer and Rambler, a well conducted Agricultural paper, issued from this city:—

They [cows] not only require food and shelter, but good nutritious food and such a degree of warmth as will enable them to remain in their stalls in a quiet and comfortable manner. Without these they will do you no credit as a skillful manager, and yield no profit in the stock department of your farm operations. Well protected, then, so as to be comfortable ourselves, let us take a look at one of our most valuable animals, the kind and patient cow. Milk, one of the most wholesome and nutritious articles of food that we possess, has come to be an important item of trade in all the large cities. The amount consumed has been wonderfully increased within a few years. It has become a common article of food among many thousands who never have enjoyed this luxury before. It is called for at the tables of the public hotels, and at the common eating-houses, almost as freely as for "roast beef." Consequently the price of good cows has increased in a corresponding ratio, and they have become one of the most expensive, as well as profitable, part of the farmer's stock.

It is hardly worth while to feed meadow hay to milch cows, as it will not supply the heavy draught made upon them while yielding eight or ten quarts of milk a day. Let that cheap fodder go to the young cattle, or the herdy oxen, for their first foddering in the morning and their last at night, during the sharp and frosty weather. With the milch cows, a full and generous supply of milk depends entirely upon a full and generous supply of the right kind of fodder. For this purpose, carrots among the roots stand pre-eminent, if richness, rather than quantity, is desired. The various kinds of turnips, beets, and parsnips, are good, especially the latter root, and, fed with dry fodder, keep the animals healthy and yielding a full flow of milk.

Cows should always be treated with gentleness, not exposed to sudden extremes by being turned from the barn to a bleak place to drink, where the sharp wind pierces to their bones, and only suffered to remain out through the middle of the day when the weather is mild and sunny. Their stalls ought to be dry, clean, and free from dust and accumulations of every kind. A strong draft should not be permitted to pass up through the floor upon which they stand, as it is liable to give them colds, rheumatism, and injure the udder.

After proper sheltering and feeding, much may be done for the cow by a judicious use of the curry-comb or card. No accumulations of filth should be allowed to rest upon the skin, even if washing is sometimes found necessary. Cattle will thrive better, and require less food where the skin is kept soft and loose by proper care. An eminent physician, Dr. Rush, stated in a lecture upon the advantages of studying the diseases of animals, that there is an improvement in the quality of the milk, and an increase of the quantity, which are obtained by currying the cow. No farmer who has been in the habit of properly attending his cows, and has been familiar with the products of some of his less careful neighbor's stock, will doubt the correctness of the doctor's statement. Indeed, a high degree of thrift and health is as necessary in the cow in order that she may yield a full flow of milk, as it is in the ox or horse, that they may be able to perform well their labor.

On the other hand, care must be taken that the feed is not too concentrated and high. Severe losses occurred in some neighborhoods from this cause during the last winter. Milk sales were quick, and when the failing green feed and cold weather cut off the quantity, a forced feeding was resorted to in the form of corn and oil meal, shorts, &c., which, by over feeding, generated disease, and often an entire loss of milk, with an occasional loss of the animal itself. These remarks are particularly applicable along the line of railroads, where milk is collected in large quantities for the city markets. Little or no danger of this kind is to be apprehended where milk is not produced for this purpose.

Cows that are to "come in" in the spring should be kept in good flesh constantly, for the most careful management after calving will fail to make them yield so large an amount of milk through the season as they would have furnished, had they been kept in good condition through the winter.

Indian Interview.

On Tuesday, Jan. 6, the Indian Delegates at Washington had an interview with Col. Lea, at the Indian Bureau. The Indians were three Arrapahoes, three Cheyennes, five Sioux, two Ottoes, two Iowas, and some squaws. Col. Lea addressed them with respect to some difference that was said to prevail among them, and afterward accompanied them to the White House, where the President received them.

Wahdoshomanye (Ottoes) advanced, shook hands, and addressed the President. His speech was brief. He had come to see his Great Father, and was indeed glad to see him. He would not now say more than how glad he was; he would wait till the others had spoken, and would speak last. The President replied by saying he also was glad to meet his red friend, he hoped the Great Spirit had smiled upon him and blessed him since he had been in Washington with good health and happiness; he would gladly hear him after the others had done.

Nacoubatha (Arrapahoes) advanced, and said he had come to see his Great Father from a long, very long, distance. He had come to shake hands, to be friendly, to be at peace. The Arrapahoes were poor; they had nothing in their country; they were not like the whites; and he hoped their Great Father would take pity upon them. He hoped his Great Father would give him some emblems, in order to show his people when he got home that his Great Father would do something for their nation. He was glad to see so many meeting here as friends who had formerly been enemies, and hoped that the Superintendent and Agent will be able to keep peace hereafter. After his long visit here, his people will be very glad to have him home again.

Wambalupe Luta (Sioux) said, that he did not come here of his own accord. (This was probably a hit at poor Magha.) He was invited here. He had been well received and kindly treated, and he would in his own country return this kindness to the whites he might meet there. A treaty had been made—a treaty of peace. All the Indians had shaken hands; they were no longer each other's enemies. He was poor, had no learning, but he was somebody in his own country; he had made peace, and he hoped it would be good. He hoped he would be sent back on horseback, and have something given him to show that he had been here. He hoped he would find his children alive, and that all would be well when he got home. He repeated his wish for something to take home.

Voki Vokomast (Cheyennes) was under many obligations for the pleasure of this interview. He was proud and rejoiced to meet so much company. He had no idea of the distance he had to travel to see his Great Father. He had left wife, children, and property to come here, in the hope that all would be right. The distance he had come was very great. My Great Father, (said he,) look at us all; we are very poor, we are all in skins; we must come to you for help; we hope you will give us some emblems to prove to our people that you will take compassion on us. When he left home he had many animals; does not know if any are left. Hoped he would be sent home on horseback. Also, he hoped he would get a little pocket change to pay his way with. Major Fitzpatrick and the Superintendent knew that they would want some little money. Did not know till he had seen Major Fitzpatrick and some others what the whites were, but now he had seen greater than they. He hoped he would not be sent back the way he came, but up the Arkansas, for it was on that river his people lived, and not on the north fork of the Platte.

The President told them how happy he was to see them all; hoped they had spent a pleasant time in Washington; was glad that they had made treaties of peace, and said that the Great Spirit would always bless them if they faithfully observed these treaties. We know you are poor, but in order to be better off it will be best for you to lay aside the chase and have recourse to agriculture. The Government of the United States looks upon you as its children; it will send persons to teach you to cultivate the soil and to manufacture cloth to wear instead of skins. [Here a loud ugh, ugh, from the Indians.] Our people desire a road through your country to California and Oregon; they might also want to purchase some of your lands, but in every instance you shall be paid a fair compensation. If in any case they misbehave or refuse to pay you, make known the matter to the agents, and if our people are in the wrong they shall be punished. Some of you have asked to go home on horseback; this we cannot grant; you will return with the Indian agent, partly by the railroad cars, which go as much faster than a horse as the wind does than a buffalo. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs will provide you with money to pay all your expenses till you return home to your own people. "And now," said the President, "as a token of my regard for you, and as a testimony to take home to your own people, I give each of you my likeness on a valuable medal."

The medals were then placed on the neck of each of the Chiefs by Major Fitzpatrick.

The President then pointed them to the American flag which was held up before them. Addressing them, he said, "I shall present each of you a flag like this. When you raise it at your homes you must remember that you are one with us; that you are a part of the same people, for one people have only one flag. This flag is only for the American people and their friends. If you ever listen to wicked advisers who would turn you against us, and you become our enemies, you must destroy this flag. Remember this. And now, my red children, I have done speaking to you. I have said all I wished to say. May the Great Spirit bless you all, and may you find your families and your people happy, and glad to see you on your return."

The President admonished them that, though the medals were for each as an individual, the flags were given to each tribe or band. He had given them because of the confidence he reposed in them, and in their friendship and faithfulness to the people of the United States. "If you want anything else, make known you wants to your friend Commissioner Lea, and he will take care to supply you with whatever is necessary."

A general shaking of hands then took place, during which Madame Kossuth and Countess Pulszky showed particular interest in the squaws present, much to the satisfaction of the latter.

Cranberry Culture.

A correspondent of the Boston Cultivator, gives the following, as his experiment in the cultivation of cranberries:—

I own about an acre of meadow, covered with cranberry vines; last year I gathered about twenty bushels, this year none, owing to a frost in June, which destroyed the blossoms. In the year 1849, I set out forty bunches of vines on a high bluff of ground, elevated about forty feet from a piece of intervale near by, and on which I have apple and quince trees growing luxuriantly. The soil in which I set the vines was very thin and poor, the amount of ground occupied by the vines being about one rod. The first year these vines produced one quart, the second year four quarts, third year eight quarts, these vines having had no labor bestowed on them since setting out. The same year, 1849, I tried a piece of bog meadow, from which I took off the turf and then set the vines, which were of an extra kind, and they have not done any better than those on the upland; but the fruit this year has been destroyed by frost. The day before the frost occurred, I took up some vines and set them on the upland, where they produced a few cranberries. I prefer upland to meadow for the cultivation of the cranberry, for the following reasons:

On upland they grow larger and ripen earlier, the quality is better and keeps better. The freedom from frosts, and from being flooded with water insuring a regular crop, and they can be cultivated in any situation which is desirable, being gathered with greater convenience. On meadow, in very wet seasons, the expense of gathering is near the value of the crop. They will grow on any kind of land, as well on poor soil as rich. The best time for setting the vines is in April or May. I have half an acre prepared for setting in the spring, and have selected the plants from a bog meadow which bears cranberries of good size and quality; I shall strike out the ground in furrows, four feet apart each way, then set the vines without manure. A friend of mine in the year 1849, set a few bunches of vines in a light soil, with a subsoil of gravel and sand, and they have done well, this year bearing cranberries of as large size as I ever saw, and very full. I have been informed of a gentleman residing near, who owned a lot of meadow and upland; on the upland there was a gravelly knoll which he removed to the meadow, and when he had taken off all the elevation, he set out some cranberry vines in the gravel and sand, which flourished remarkably well.

Heat and Cold.

Cold is supposed to be a negative property—the absence of heat—and the terms heat and cold are only relative, as compared with the sensations of animal heat; yet cold has some singular effects upon vegetable matter and fluid compounds. The peculiar properties of wines and vinegar are destroyed by freezing, as are many other articles. Many of the seeds of fruit and forest trees, will not vegetate until they have undergone the action of frost, while seeds of the locust and a variety of others, will not grow the first year they are planted notwithstanding they are exposed to cold, unless they are scalded. All of these peculiarities may be owing to some mechanical effect, rather than to any radical change on the chemical decomposition or composition of its constituents. Many vegetables may been tirely frozen, and if the temperature is raised slowly under water, or even in an air-tight vessel, no change can be discovered. A singular change takes place in freezing the pumpkin. The saccharine principle is so developed, that the concentrated juice is a very fair molasses, and as such, was extensively used during the Revolution. The effect of both heat and cold upon the potato is altogether the most singular, and we began this article to mention this fact.

The potato contains a great deal of body—of positive animal nutriment, composed, like the breadstuffs, of farina—starch and gluten, and a large portion of water. A potato, if frozen, and instantly put into cold water, does not recover; but is totally changed, and becomes a flaccid sack of unsavory, gummy matter, of a very disagreeable odor; its original properties entirely changed and lost; but if while in the frozen state they are thrown one by one into water constantly boiling, they are in no way affected, and are as edible as when first taken from the earth. This is an anomally in the action of cold, which may also be true when applied to other vegetables, of which we are not advised; but it is a fact worth knowing, as it may on some occasions meet the necessities of almost any family—especially in those flat countries where cellars are difficult of construction. The Russian Army.

Translated from the Trieste Zeitung.

The actual strength of the entire Russian army is known to no one, not even to the Government, because the numbers in the lists are always greater than the corresponding numbers of the troops. If, then, we make a statement on the subject, it is with the understanding that it is what ought to be, and that what is must be a great deal less. The number of the foot (Guard corps, Grenadier corps, six Infantry corps, special Caucasian corps, Recruits, Cossack Infantry on the Black Sea, Greek Battalion,) is 640,384 men. The regular active cavalry (Guards, Grenadiers, six Infantry corps, Reserve cavalry, Caucasian corps,) is 101,692 men. The artillery in activity counts 41,902 men. Adding the engineers, (pontonniers, pioneers, workmen, &c.) and the staff, &c., the entire active army will amount 810,000 men. A calculation made before the campaign in Hungary is said to have shown that there were on paper 230,000 men of all arms, who could be employed to cross the European frontiers. This number was diminished by 10 per cent. when the march actually begun. On the other hand, by calling out the reserves and the men at all the depots, there are 240,000 men additional, on paper. After all, it may be assumed as certain, that for a European war beyond the western frontiers between the Baltic and the Danubian Principalities, Russia has not more than 300,000 men, and of these a quarter must be kept in Poland."

Wisconsin, 7 per cent.; by contract 12; forfeit thrice the excess.

Iowa, by agreement, and enforced by law.

On debts or judgments in favor of the United States, interest is computed at 6 per cent.

The Whale Fishery.

From the New-Bedford Whaleman's Shipping List, Jan. 6.

We present to our numerous patrons this morning our annual review of the whale fishery for the past year.

The amount of tonnage employed in the trade has been considerably increased during the last year, in spite of numerous losses in the Arctic seas. The number of vessels employed in the service at present is as follows, viz: 558 ships and barks, 27 brigs, and 35 schooners, being an increase over last year of fifty-six ships, three brigs, and eight schooners. This number is large, but it still falls below that of 1846, when there were 678 ships, 35 brigs, and 22 schooners in the trade.

The intelligence from the Arctic fleet in 1851, has been of a disastrous character; for, in addition to a very considerable loss of shipping, the average catchings have been smaller than in any previous year. This will seriously affect the importations of whale oil in 1852; and from the best estimate which we can now make, the amount during the present year will hardly exceed 100,000 bbls., and may fall considerably below that figure. In addition to this, the accounts from the sperm whale fishery are not encouraging, and there is a probable prospect that importations during the year to come will not exceed 65,000 bbls.

The general conclusion to which we come is, that the business has been pushed by the enterprise of our merchants to nearly, if not quite, its utmost limits, unless new grounds are discovered, which does not at present seem probable. Still the prospect of a fair remuneration and return to those now engaged in it, is good; though the policy of extending investments would be very doubtful.

The American ships before mentioned lost in the North Pacific, were all vessels of the first class, fitted in the most substantial manner, and probably sailed at an aggregate cost of $270,000. The losses are attributed to the incorrectness of the charts of the Northern Seas, unknown currents, ice, and an unusual prevalence of severe gales and foggy weather through the summer of 1851. We are happy to learn that our Government, in consequence of these disasters, have in contemplation to send one or more national vessels into those seas, to explore and mark more correctly the position of the reefs and headlands upon which these vessels have been stranded, and to render aid to such as require it.

Influence of a Smile.

It is related in the life of a celebrated mathematician, Wm. Hutton, that a respectable-looking country woman called upon him one day, anxious to speak with him. She told him with an air of secrecy that her husband behaved unkind to her, and sought other company, frequently passing his evenings from home, which made her feel extremely unhappy, and knowing Mr. Hutton to be a wise man, she thought he might be able to tell her how she should manage to cure her husband.

The case was a common one, and he thought he could prescribe for it without losing his reputation as a conjurer. "The remedy is a simple one," said he, "but I have never known it to fail—Always treat your husband with a smile."

The woman expressed her thanks, dropped a courtesy, and went away. A few months afterwards she waited on Mr. Hutton, with a couple of fine fowls, which she begged him to accept. She told him, while a tear of joy and gratitude glistened in her eye, that she had followed his advice, and her husband was cured. He no longer sought the company of others, but treated her with constant love and kindness.

Eating and Drinking in Poland.

The Poles seldom eat any breakfast, and are not fond of cold meat. In the morning, both men and women generally drink ginger, yolks of eggs, and sugar, boiled in beer. They are extravagantly fond of roast pig; but their sauces, to foreigners, are far from being agreeable. The great men seldom dine without a dish of peas and sliced bacon.

When the Poles make a feast, the host seldom furnishes the table either with spoons, knives, or forks; but each guest, or his servant, brings them with him, and after the banquet is over, carries them home. Each one at the table has a napkin, made of a broad piece of starched linen, which is sewed to the table-cloth, to prevent it from being stolen by the servants. After the guests are seated at the table, the gates of the house are immediately closed, and are not opened till the table is cleared, and an inventory taken of the plate, as a precaution against the peculiar failings of the footmen, who are always sure to diminish the number of the plates and other valuable articles, every opportunity.

Every person of rank and means has his banquet-hall in his house, devoted exclusively to feasts and entertainments. In these halls is found a large table, always loaded with both victuals and drink, adorned with a great variety of valuable plate, from which the cloth is seldom removed, until its original color is lost in the accumulated dust of months, equally offensive to sight and smell. The banquet-hall is furnished with a gallery for a band of music, which generally consists of violins and portable organs.

The invited guests always bring their footmen with them. As soon as the masters are seated at the table, they immediately give half the bread and meat to their servants, who stand behind them eating and drinking over their shoulders, while at the same time they wait on their lords when they call. When the master asks twice for wine, the servant brings a double quantity, which they both drink alternately from the same glass without rinsing. The large quantities of victuals brought from the kitchen are seldom returned, for the reason that the servants generally steal what they do not eat. After the cloth is removed, the Poles retain their seats for a long time, while they excessively indulge in wine. They are very dexterous at carving, and will cut a partridge into six parts almost with a single blow of the knife, holding it on the end of a fork. While eating, they dismiss all other care and business; and when sent for, they seldom leave the table until they have finished their meal. [Saxton's Fall of Poland.

Variety.

The Harlem Railroad extension to Chatham is to be opened on Monday the 19th inst. to the public. An ample supply of new machinery has been received, to perform the additional service required, including two locomotives of the best make and most powerful description, calculated for high speed with the express trains. The citizens living on the east side of New York will probably find this road the most convenient route for travel between this city and Albany.

A person was released from the New Jersey State Prison, recently, after a servitude of twenty years. We do not wonder that the poor man was unable to realize his situation, or that he was dumb with astonishment to witness the mighty changes that have taken place in the busy world since he has been the lone occupant of a gloomy cell. He had gone into the institution when a young man, and came out, bearing the marks of age and premature decay upon his features.

The entire capital invested in the various manufactures in the United States on the 1st of June, 1850, not to include any establishment producing less than the annual value of $500—amounted to, in round numbers, $530,000,000. Value of raw material, $550,000,000. Amount paid for labor, $240,000,000. Value of manufactured articles, $1,020,300,000. Number of persons employed, 1,050,000.

The entire deposits of gold at the Philadelphia Mint in December, were $5,561,000, of which all but $76,000 was from California. The gold coinage of the month, five hundred and seventy-six thousand one hundred gold pieces of the aggregate value of $6,004,405. The total coinage of all kinds, $6,006,341; total gold coinage of the year, $52,143,446; silver, $446,797; copper, $99,605; total, $52,689,846.

Sergant Davy was once accused of having disgraced the bar by taking silver from a client. "I took silver," he replied "because I could not get gold; but I took every farthing the poor fellow had in the world, and I hope you don't call that disgracing the profession."

A wit is not easily silenced. Mr. Sadhir, the Viennese humorist, demanded, on his trial, whether it was treasonable to repeat the Lord's Prayer, for the words, "deliver us from evil," might be construed into a prayer to get rid of the Government?

A little boy, more thoughtful than boys generally are, but not more so than they should be, on being tumbled into the mud by a comrade, was asked why he did not serve his abuser in the same manner, when he replied—"If I should, there would be two suits of clothes to clean."

Dr. Gerry, of Townsend, Mass., received poison into his system through a slight cut on his hand, from a tumor of a child, and it operated with such virulence and rapidity as to cause his death in two days.

Active measures are about to be taken to secure a Submarine Telegraph between England and Ireland. It will require about 60 miles of cable, or three times the length of that between Dover and Calais.

The entire amount of funds in the the U. S. Government Depositories subject to draft is $12,784,924. The Treasury Notes outstanding are $161,811.

"Eljen Kossuth!" means "Live, Kossuth!" or, as the French would say, Vive, Kossuth! The word eljen is Magyar, and pronounced like the English word alien.

The Legislature of South Carolina has adopted a Homestead law, exempting dwelling-house, fifty acres of land, one horse and $25 worth of provisions from levy.

Let a man be treated as a brute, and he will become more brutish than a brute; but as a rational being, and he will show that he is so.

"Isn't the world older than it used to be?" said a young hopeful to his senior. "Yes, my son." "Then what do folks mean by old times?"

LEAVES New York at 9 A. M. and 4½ P. M., foot of Cortlandt-st.; at 11 A. M. (freight) and 4.10 P. M., Pier No. 1 North River—for Elizabethport, Elizabethtown, Westfield, Scotch Plains, Plainfield, Boundbrook, Somerville, Raritan, White House, Easton, &c.

Daguerrean Gallery.

GURNEY'S Daguerrean Gallery, No. 189 Broadway, has been known for years as one of the first establishments of the kind in the United States, and the oldest in the city of New York. He has recently greatly enlarged his Gallery by the addition of more rooms and large skylights, and other improvements, rendering it one of the most extensive establishments in this country. Mr. G. attends personally to his sitters, and from his great experience in the art he is enabled, at all times, to give perfect satisfaction. The large-sized pictures recently taken by his new process are universally acknowledged superior to any heretofore taken in this country. A large collection can be seen at all hours of the day. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to examine them.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year commences the last Wednesday in August, and closes the last Tuesday in June of each year.

Board of Instruction.

Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress.
Rev. J. W. MORTON, } Assistants.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, }

The Terms for 1851 and 1852 are as follows:—
The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.
" Second " Dec. 3 " " March 16.
" Third " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one of two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term. Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.

Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS.

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00
Drawing,	1 00
Monochromatic Painting	3 00
Oil Painting,	5 00
Writing and Stationery,	0 50
Vocal Music, Elementary,	1 00
Advanced Class,	2 00
Instrumental Music,	8 00

Use of Organ or Piano, $2 00 per quarter.

BOARD, in private families, per week, from $1 25 to $1 50; in clubs, from 60 to 90 cents.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall Term, and at the middle of the Winter Term, and continue seven weeks. The course will embrace a thorough review of the common school branches, with daily lectures on "The Art of Teaching," Chemistry, Physiology, Laws of Health, School Laws, &c., &c. Tuition $2 50.

Students should not be furnished with unnecessary pocket-money, neither should minors be allowed to contract debts in the village. Either member of the Faculty will superintend the financial affairs of pupils placed under their care, by special direction from parents and guardians, if funds are furnished in advance.

THE SABBATH & THE RESURRECTION.

From "An Examination of the Authority for a Change of the Weekly Sabbath at the Resurrection of Christ; proving that the Practice of the Church in substituting the First Day of the Week for the appointed Seventh Day, is unsanctioned by the New Testament Scriptures." By JAMES A. BEGG, Author of a Connected View of the Scripture Evidence of Christ's Speedy Return, &c." [Continued.

Now, for Christ's truth, it was not more essential that His resurrection should be "on the third day," than that He should be in the tomb "until the third day." The attestation of His enemies that the body was still there, even "late of Sabbaths," would, then, truly be of value; and God, in the overruling of His Providence, may have so ordered that it happened so. Indeed, the Jews had nothing to fear in regard to the security of the tomb at an earlier period, and this they, on reflection, may have discovered; for, had the disciples removed the body before "three days and three nights" had elapsed, the enemy would only need to point to the fact of an already empty tomb, as the demonstration of Christ's having been a deceiver—evidence, although of a different kind, yet quite as much to their purpose, as if their seal had remained unbroken, and their guard undisturbed, after the third day had passed away. Christ had fixed a period for His continuance in the tomb, as the very sign of His Messiahship—given not to His disciples, nor apparently remembered by them; but given to His enemies, who confessedly knew and remembered it — until which time He must be in the tomb, and beyond which He must not be so. The eventful and critical period, as they regarded it, His enemies knew, and they, therefore, would also know, that even "late of Sabbaths," or at the close of the second day, they were not behind time in making secure, by seal and guard, the body of Him who had given it as their great—indeed, their ONLY sign—"that as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." If, "late of Sabbaths," they saw the body still entombed—and doubtless they set not their seal without being assured that it was so—the truth of the whole matter would then speedily be determined. The later, indeed, the guard was placed, the better would their purpose seem to be served, while it would render their evidence of this truth to others, the more satisfactory.

But whether in this respect Griesbach is, or is not, correct, still the fact remains, and is not to be overlooked, that Matthew thus speaks twice of Sabbaths in the plural, in close connection with the event of our Saviour's Resurrection, while, in other cases, he speaks of the Sabbath, when, obviously, a single Sabbath is meant. If there were even no difference, then, between the plural and singular form, still we are entitled to ask for a satisfactory reason, why, in any individual case, the plural form of the Original should be translated as a singular—why, when it is written "Sabbaths," we should read it "Sabbath?" The fact, if it were established, that the Evangelists made no difference between the plural and the singular form, would necessarily throw a burden on the reader or interpreter of making, for himself, at least, the required difference; for a difference must be made by us or for us, if the author himself has done so. It must be determined, in every case, if we wish to ascertain the sense, whether we are to read it as a singular or as a plural. Now, not only have all the Evangelists here written Sabbaths in the plural, but we know of no satisfactory reason having ever yet been offered why we should seek to read them in the singular. On the contrary, as a matter of absolute truth, we believe Christ's sign. Two entire days must He have lain interred, and the first of these two we know to have been the Annual Passover Sabbath; the second day was, therefore, the sixteenth of the month, the day of typical first-fruits—not, as such, a Sabbath—yet, from the texts quoted, we believe it must also have been a Sabbath of some kind. Whether or not it really was the weekly Sabbath, we do not certainly know, for God has not expressly informed us. We are content thus far to remain in ignorance, until His time and His light shall remove the obscurity.

It is true, however, that although we have "Sabbaths" in the narratives of all the Evangelists, when relating the discovery by the disciples that their Lord was risen, we have no word in the Greek correspondinding with "from," or "after," or "next to," which have been supposed or supplied by critics to determine the sense. But we cannot entirely dispense with supplements; for the words, as they stand in this, and other cases, convey no precise or perfect meaning. The real question—the only question—seems to be, What should we supply, that we may have the meaning intended to be conveyed? As formerly noticed, the difference of gender in the Greek between "one" and "of Sabbaths," is generally regarded, correctly or incorrectly, as rendering indispensable a supplementary word, agreeing with "one;" and "day" is the word so adopted. Still, as in English here, it would give an indeterminate sense where a determinate meaning seems designed by the Evangelists, a change of the expression "one day of the Sabbaths," to "one day after the Sabbaths," or some equivalent phrase, has been regarded as the truest expression of the meaning designed.

The choice of the phrase, however, it will be observed, has not been made by us to supply a defect occasioned by ourselves, or to obviate a difficulty peculiar to the view presented in this Examination. On the contrary, we have, in this, adopted simply the supplements which opponents have, for their own purposes, supplied—as necessary, indeed, in any view they could take, and which, as critics, they have seen, or supposed, to be not inconsistent with grammatical accuracy. We have thus far accepted their aid, because we had nothing that seemed better to propose; and, in addition, we have given, when we could, a more accurate translation of words important to the sense, which, in the several texts, are expressed—though never without giving the grounds on which the proposed emendations rest. And if these supplementary words be by any rejected—words equally necessary to the views of others as to ours—let those presented be equally or better fitted to give the meaning, and, in every respect, to meet the great requirements of the texts, without changing the true and obvious import of the language divinely employed, or subjecting it to violence, with the design of extorting from it a sanction to cherished customs.

By listening to the language of the Original, and studying it in the light of God, reflected from those ordinances with which the writers and the early readers of the Gospels were familiar, difficulties felt to be otherwise insurmountable are obviated; and obscurities, created by inattention to important particulars, far too much overlooked, are removed. By the examination now made of the statements of the Evangelists, especially by attention to the fact, that, if they speak of the Resurrection morning having at all succeeded any Sabbath, they speak of its having succeeded more than one, there is evidently found a more perfect harmony of the Saviour's "sign," as uttered by Himself in word, with the facts which form its fulfillment. Let us review these, and apply them.

It will be remembered, that in fact, and of necessity, the death of Christ, our Passover, took place a day later than that of the Paschal sacrifice, which, with His disciples, He ate the previous night. This, necessarily led to a similar postponement in His fulfillment, as the Antitype, of each following corresponding part of the great solemnity, and, therefore, to His Resurrection being a day later than that of the offering of the typical first-fruits. The eating of the Passover lamb being, then, fixed to the night of the 14th of the month Nisan, Christ's interment, a day later, took place on the night of the 15th, the commencement of the Passover Sabbath. The night following was the commencement, therefore, of the 16th, or appointed day of First-Fruits, which, as such, was not a Sabbath, but which may have been the weekly Sabbath, and if so, thus making two "Sabbaths." The night of the 17th next followed; and the morning of the day to which that night belonged would, therefore, be that of the Resurrection, on "the third day." So the Evangelists show that, after the crucifixion, when the even was come which commenced "the Great Sabbath," Christ was laid in the grave. This day, when completed at the commencement of the succeeding evening, would be one "Sabbath." If, then, we understand them as intimating that this Sabbath was immediately followed by another, thus constituting a plurality of "Sabbaths," as expressed, we have in this likewise two days and two nights, and the third night, following, would, at its close, usher in the morning of the third day, "the one day after the Sabbaths." The Saviour's own prediction of His being three days and three nights in the heart of the earth, and typical analogies, are thus, again, better reconciled with what obviously is, at least, a more natural meaning of the statements made concerning the time of the Resurrection; and we clearly see how the sign of Jonas may have been fulfilled with perfect exactness, in what we can understand of

THE EVANGELISTS SHOWING CHRIST RAISED THE THIRD DAY.

Nights.

1. 15th, Pertaining to the Passover Sabbath.
2. 16th, Pertaning, possibly, to the weekly Sabbath.
3. 17th, Pertaining to the Resurrection morning.

Days.

1. 15th, The Passover Sabbath.
2. 16th, Typical first-fruits; possibly, the weekly Sabbath.
3. 17th, Resurrection morning, "one day after the Sabbaths."

In thus seeking, and, haply, finding, the meaning of these varied and numerous statements of the divine word, do we impair the significancy of the Resurrection itself? Surely not. On the contrary, the whole tendency and result of our inquiry is to present this blessed truth in a most attractive light. It has lost its lustre by man's misplacing; this is regained by its being restored to the designed connection with a redeemed people. Glorious, indeed, was the day, whose dawn beheld the stone rolled away from the sepulchre of the Son of Man. The joy is ours, and great it should be, that, "Now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the First-Fruits of them that slept." 1 Cor. xv. 20. "If Christ be not raised," exclaims Paul, in the same chapter, "your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. Then, they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." Ver. 17, 18. But He "was declared to be the Son of God, with power, according to the Spirit of holiness, by the Resurrection from the dead." Rom. i. 4. We are, therefore, called by this apostle to "remember that Jesus Christ, of the seed of David, was raised from the dead, according to my gospel." 2 Tim. ii. 8. [To be continued.

THE BOARD OF NATIONAL EDUCATION.

The Board of National Popular Education held an annual meeting at Cleveland, Ohio, on the 8th inst., over which Ex-Gov. Morrow presided. The Treasurer's Report stated that the receipts of the past year, including balance on hand January, 1851, had been $7,299 24; expenditures, $6,646 13—leaving the balance on hand, $653 11. The expenditures exceed those of the preceding year about $1,800, arising principally from the expenses of the Teachers sent to Oregon. The Fifth Annual Report was read by Gov. Slade, the General Agent and Corresponding Secretary. We copy from a statement in the New York Tribune the following facts developed by the Report:—

Forty-nine female teachers have been sent out the past year, making the total number sent out by the Board two hundred and forty-eight. Of those sent the last year, five have gone to Oregon, arriving there April 28, and in their religious faith they represent the Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist, and Congregational denominations. Four more are engaged to follow, and will be sent the present winter, either to Oregon or California. The teachers to Oregon have met with signal success, and many children, formerly taught by Catholic Nuns, are now gathered into their schools. Thus these Protestant Sisters of Charity are doing a great work in that distant Territory, in molding the hearts and enlightening the minds of the rising generation.

The entire number of teachers under the patronage of the Board, have been drawn from the following States:—

Massachusetts	70	Vermont	66
New York	34	Maine	27
Connecticut	20	New Hampshire	18
Ohio (Western Reserve)	5	Rhode Island	4
Pennsylvania	3	Virginia	1

Vermont has sent forth the largest number in proportion to her population. These teachers have been distributed as follows:—

Indiana	69	Illinois	69
Wisconsin	24	Michigan	18
Ohio	13	Iowa	12
Missouri	10	Tennessee	8
Pennsylvania	5	Minnesota	3
North Carolina	4	Kentucky	3
Alabama	3	Texas	2
Oregon	5

And one now teaching at the Shawnee Misssion, but destined for New Mexico.

It is expected by the Board that every teacher sent out shall continue to teach at least two years, and this expectation has rarely been disappointed. Fifty-four of the number have been married. Of these, 12 were of the first class, sent out in the spring of 1847; 13 of the second class, sent out October, 1847; 6 of the third class, sent out May, 1848; 4 of the fourth class, sent out October, 1848; 5 of the fifth class, sent out May, 1849; 6 of the sixth class, sent out October, 1849; 5 of the seventh class, sent out May, 1850; and 1 of the eighth class, sent out October 1850; and 1 of the ninth class, sent out May, 1851. Six of the number still continue to teach. Thirty-eight teachers in all have returned to their homes, (after having, in most instances, taught two years or more,) some of them by reason of ill health, and some from sickness or death in their families. Of these, fourteen have indicated a desire to return to their labors, and one has gone as a Missionary to Persia.

Among the entire number, there have been six deaths the past year, most of whom had been engaged for years in the work.

THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

The Christian historian sees in the movements that are now going on among the nations more than merely the passing events. Revelation throws a ray of light across the scene; and while, as a member of the community, and with regard to the social duties he owes to his fellow-men, he may feel deeply interested, he also feels an interest in the future, revealed events, which they foreshadow.

The image representing the principal successive monarchies of the world—"the head of gold, the breast of silver, the belly and thighs of brass, the legs of iron, and the feet and toes of iron and clay"—as explained by the prophet Daniel, have been very satisfactorily understood by historians; and according to the most reasonable conclusion, we now live in the time of the kingdoms forming the feet and toes. Every movement which disturbs the quiet of despots, is observed with interest, because the kingdom of the STONE cut out of the mountain without hands, is at the present time advancing, and the vulnerable nature of the pedestal of the image is made visible and apparent to the world. As blow after blow has been struck at the principles of despotism, and as we have observed the crumbling masses cleft from the base, we have become satisfied that its fall is inevitable, and await with interest the blow that is to complete its ruin.

The advantages gained by intelligence and the principles of Protestant Christianity, will never be relinquished; for although the contest may be sanguinary, prophecy has foretold the result. The principles of despotism and liberty are at issue, and the issue is in the hands of Him whose kingdom shall never be destroyed, but shall stand for ever. In many of the States of Europe, now so much enlightened, and leavened with Protestant Christianity, though under despotic rule, the signs of disrupture are evident. A moral and political earthquake is maturing, and the heaving of the earth shows that the elements are in motion. It is the preparation and commencment of the great battle of "Armageddon"—the breaking up of absolute powers, and the undermining of Anti-Christian predominance. It must and will terminate in a triumph for civil and religious liberty; for the war is equally waged against Antichrist, and the powers that sustain him, and the trophies will be liberty and fraternity, justice and humanity.

This great change is evidently pre-millennial, for the man of sin is to be consumed by the Spirit of his mouth, or the Gospel, but will be destroyed by the brightness of his coming. The Scriptures describe this conflict as terrible, and those who read their Bibles know it is described as a time of great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world. And the Saviour says, "Except those days shall be shortened, there should be no flesh saved." But the great day of decision is at hand. The final blow will fall on the crumbling pedestal of this proud Colossus, which has held the world in perpetual servility from the rise of the Assyrian Empire, and the time of Nimrod, to the present. Popery and paganism, which have succeeded in holding the world in superstition, and have sustained the claims of despotism, and in their turn been sustained by it, are being consumed by the gospel, and will sustain a ruinous shock by the fall, which will terminate their power. The fall of despotism and legalized oppression—the fall of popery and legalized superstition—the triumph of liberty, civil and religious, with the principles of Christian fraternity and equality—will open a new era on the world. A government conducted by the people for their own interests or happiness—no advantage to be hoped for by extending empire—no temptation for one nation to intrude on the rights and privileges of its neighbors—no aspirants who seek advantage in preferment or oppression by power—the system of non-intervention in the affairs of other nations respected from principle, and strictly observed. Such is the necessary consequence of the termination of the present contest of the people of Europe with those who tyranize over them. Without a doubt, the cause is the cause of God, in establishing the kingdom of his Son, that is destined to become a great mountain, and fill the whole earth.

The picture drawn is no fancy sketch, but the natural and necessary consequence of popular government established on the principles of justice, equality, and brotherhood, and the removal of all temptation to extend empire. It is predicted, it is insured, by the triumph of the kingdom of the STONE, even in the present condition of men.

The Jews have no interest to oppose the advances of his kingdom thus far. They have no interest in the nations in which they are scattered. As a people, they will find themselves enlisted in the cause of their King, although they have not recognized him. When the people have no motives and governments, no interests in monopolizing empire, what will prevent them from establishing themselves in the land of their former inheritance? Individual and private claims can form no barrier, as their wealth is equal to the enterprise. They will then rebuild Jerusalem and their Sanctuary, and literally build houses and inhabit them, and plant vineyards and eat of the fruit of them. They will no more build and another inhabit, and plant vineyards and others eat the fruit. But they shall sit under their own vine and fig tree, and none shall make them afraid. This state of things will be principally before their conversion to Christianity. What a field will then be opened for missionary enterprise! And who shall be the happy people that shall secure their confidence, and introduce to them the pure Gospel of the Son of God? May we not anticipate the proclamation of the Master, "Whom shall I send, and who will go?" J. M.

THE LAW MADE HONORABLE.

On a former occasion (says the Independent) we presented our readers with an illustration of the principles of moral government from the conduct of Governor Hunt in refusing to pardon a criminal convicted of arson. A similar illustration from the same source has just been given in reply to an application from sundry "ladies," for the pardon of Hiram Knickerbocker, now under sentence of death for murder. The Governor says:—

"Be assured my heart responds to the affecting emotions which you so eloquently express. Moved by warm personal sympathies to grant your request, yet restrained by a controlling sense of official obligation, my spirit is oppressed with sadness. You must remember, that the law has prescribed the penalty for murder. Awful as the penalty is, it is not established or enforced in a spirit of vengeance. It was adopted by our lawmakers as the only punishment sufficiently fearful to restrain the depraved and evil-minded from shedding innocent blood. The severity of the law, in this respect, may be attributed to an anxious solicitude for the protection of society. Its object is to warn and restrain. It is intended to shield you and yours, and every fellow-being, from the hand of criminal violence. You may conceive that the law is too severe; and I confess it appears so to a compassionate mind, when the hour arrives for enforcing its terrible decree. The legislative power has fixed the penalty, and it is not competent for me to change it. The most sacred of all my duties is to see that the laws are executed. The pardoning power conferred upon the Executive is not designed to defeat the law, or frustrate its execution. It is a power to be exercised in cases where it is made to appear that there was a serious doubt of the guilt of the person convicted; or where the enormity of the crime is mitigated by extenuating circumstances."

The Governor then reviews the evidence of Knickerbocker's guilt, and shows from the testimony in the case, and the affirmation of his sentence by the Supreme Court, that "there can be no doubt of the justice of the decision." Upon this careful review of the whole case he arrives at the decision, that to mitigate the penalty would virtually be to abrogate the law.

"I consider the killing of Harkner was not only unjustifiable, but it was wanton, and admits of no palliation. To interpose the pardoning power, in such a case, would virtually be to proclaim that the crime of murder shall no longer be punished with death; or to substitute the will and caprice of the Executive, for the positive injunctions of the law. In substance, it would be an assumption of the legislative power. I have made an earnest effort to find in the evidence some mitigating incident to justify me in the exercise of that clemency which you so feelingly invoke. But I can discover none. Three reprieves were granted to enable Knickerbocker's counsel to appeal to the Supreme Court for a new trial. After a careful deliberation that tribunal confirmed the sentence. There can be no doubt of the justice of the decision.

"It is not without long and anxious reflection that I have come to the firm conclusion that there are no sufficient grounds for interposing to avert the execution of the law. Entertaining this conviction, my official responsibility allows me no alternative. Painful as it is to your feelings and mine, the penalty must be enforced. Several similar applications are pending before me. I cannot grant yours without recognizing a principle which would compel me to extend the same clemency to all.

"I am, with sincere respect, yours truly,
"WASHINGTON HUNT."

NIGHT.

BY HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.

The day is done, and the darkness
  Falls from the wings of night,
As a feather is wafted downward
  From an eagle in his flight.

I see the lights of the village
  Gleam through the rain and the mist,
And a feeling of sadness comes o'er me,
  That my soul cannot resist:

A feeling of sadness and longing,
  That is not akin to pain,
And resembles sorrow only
  As the mist resembles the rain.

Come, read to me some poem,
  Some simple and heartfelt lay,
That shall soothe the restless feeling,
  And banish the thoughts of day.

Not from the grand old masters,
  Not from the bards sublime,
Whose distant footsteps echo
  Through thec orridors of time.

For, like the strains of martial music,
  Their mighty thoughts suggest
Life's endless toil and endeavor;
  And to-night I long for rest.

Read from some humble poet,
  Whose notes gush from his heart,
As showers from the clouds of summer,
  Or tears from the eyelids start.

Who, through long days of labor,
  And nights devoid of ease,
Still heard in his soul the music
  Of wonderful melodies.

Some songs have power to quiet
  The restless pulse of care,
And come like the benediction
  That follows after prayer.

Then read from the treasured volume
  The poem of thy choice,
And lend to the rhyme of the poet
  The beauty of thy voice.

And the night shall be filled with music,
  And the cares that infest the day
Shall fold up their tents, like the Arabs,
  And as silently steal away.

THE PASTOR OF RESOLIS:

OR, SEEDS SOWN BY THE WAYSIDE.

About a century ago, in one of the remotest districts of Scotland, there lived a pious clergyman, whose memory is still revered in the spot which witnessed his labors and retains his grave. Often, in the wild forests and glens of Badenoch, was the pastor af Resolis seen pursuing his solitary way to minister to the sick and dying of his scattered flock—a shaggy white pony the only companion of his wanderings.

On the occasion to which this story refers, this faithful animal had a more arduous journey to perform than crossing the defiles and mountain passes of its native Ross. It was near the end of the month of May, when the good pastor was called to proceed to Edinburgh to attend the General Assembly, (the yearly meeting of the clergy of the Church of Scotland.) And as, in those days, both public conveyances and roads in the Highlands were few and bad, and the expenses of traveling considerable, he selected his trusty little steed to convey him to the Scottish capital.

Traveling at the rate of from thirty to forty miles a day, his journey would occupy a full week, and would frequently oblige him to pass the night in the then by no means comfortable inns upon the Highland road. It will not surprise any of my readers to be told that it was the invariable practice of that man of God to hold family worship in these houses, and to insist upon the attendance of every individual inmate. Resting one night at a little inn amid the wild hills of Inverness-shire, he summoned, as usual, the family together for devotional purposes. When all had been seated, the Bible produced, and the group were waiting the commencement of the devotions, the pastor of Resolis looked around him, and asked whether every inmate of the house were present. The landlord replied in the affirmative.

"All?" again inquired the minister.

"Yes," answered the host, "we are all here; there is a little girl in the kitchen, but we never think of asking her in, for she is so dirty that she is not fit to be seen."

"Then call in the girl," said the good man, laying down the Bible which he had opened; "we will wait till she comes."

The landlord apologized. The minister was peremptory. "The scullery-maid had a soul, and a very precious one," he said, "if she was not in the habit of being summoned to family worship, all the greater was the need of her joining them now. Not one word would he utter until she came. Let her, then, be called in."

The host at length consented; the kitchen-girl was taken in to join the circle, and the evening worship proceeded.

After the devotions were concluded, the pastor called the little girl aside, and began to question her about her soul, and its eternal interests. He found her in a state of the most deplorable ignorance.

"Who made you?" he asked, putting the usual introductory question to a child.

The girl did not know.

"Do you know that you have a soul?"

"No; I never heard that I had one. What is a soul?"

"Do you ever pray?"

"I don't know what you mean."

"Well, I am going to Edinburgh, and I will bring you a neckerchief if you promise to say a prayer that I will teach you. It is very short; there are only four words in it:

'LORD, SHOW ME MYSELF;'

and if you repeat this night and morning, I will not forget to bring you what I have promised."

The little kitchen-maid was delighted; a new piece of dress was a thing she had rarely witnessed. The idea was enchanting; the condition was easy; the promise was given with all the energy of young hope; and the pious traveler, after explaining, no doubt, the meaning and force of the prayer, retired to rest, and the next morning resumed his journey.

We need not follow him in the rest of his journey. On reaching Edinburgh, his thoughts and time were fully occupied with the duties which had taken him there. Nevertheless, he did not forget the Highland inn, and its little menial, but, relying upon the fulfillment of her promise, purchased the trifling present that was to make her happy.

Again, then, we accompany the devoted minister to the wild mountains of Badenoch, and at the close of a mild June evening, reached the lonely Highland inn. The white pony, now sleek and shining with better fare and a whole fortnight's idleness, is safely housed, and the minister, ere he permits supper to touch his lips, summons the household to the worship of God. Again, however, the little kitchen-maid is absent, and again he inquires the cause. But it is now a different reason that withholds her.

"Indeed, sir," replied the hostess to the pastor's inquiry, "she has been of little use since you where here; she has done nothing but sit and cry night and day, and now she is so weak and exhausted that she cannot rise from her bed."

"Oh, my good woman, let me see the girl immediately," exclaimed the minister, instantly suspecting the reason of her grief.

He was conducted to a hole beneath the stairs, where the little creature lay upon a straw bed, a picture of mental agony and spiritual distress.

"Well, my child," said the amiable man, affectionately addressing her, "here is the neckerchief I have brought you from Edinburgh. I hope you have done what you promised, and said the prayer I taught you."

"Oh, no sir, no; I can never take your present; a dear gift it has been to me! You taught me a prayer that God has answered in an awful way. He has shown me myself; and oh, what a sight that is! Minister, minister, what shall I do?"

I need not say how rejoiced the faithful man of God was to see that the Spirit of Jehovah had been dealing with this young soul, and that, although still operating as a "Spirit of bondage," in the production of a true though partial and imperfect faith, there were yet such hopeful signs that, ere long, he would exhibit himself as the "Spirit of adoption," leading her to cry, "Abba, Father." But whence had this child derived, in the course of little more than a fortnight, and through the use of such a prayer, this acquaintance with her own heart? Read the Bible she could not; her lot was cast in a careless household. Whence, then, that mysterious ray which all at once shone into her once darkened heart, and exposed in all its barrenness the deformity of self? It was the "Spirit of Truth, whom the world cannot receive because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him;" but she knew him, for he dwelt with her, and was in her. In no other way can we account for the fact that one, but a few weeks ago, so totally ignorant that she had asked, "What is a soul?" should now have been able to pursue that most difficult of all tasks—to know her own heart. Psa. cxxxix. Who that reads this simple narrative can deny the absolute necessity of the special work of the blessed Spirit, sent forth into the soul in answer to the prayer,

"LORD, SHOW ME MYSELF."

After some further conversation, the pastor of Resolis opened up to the distressed girl the great gospel method of salvation, and closed the interview by recommending the use of another, and equally short prayer:

"LORD, SHOW ME THYSELF."

Next morning the minister was once again on his way to his still distant home. But he had "cast the bread upon the waters;" did he ever "find it again after many days?"

Many years had past since this memorable journey, and the vigorous man of God, who could ride forty miles a day for a week, without fatigue, was now become an old and feeble man, worn out in his Master's service, scarcely any longer spending, because already spent for Christ. One day his servant intimated that a stranger was desirous to speak with him. Permission being given, a respectable matronly woman was ushered into the study, carrying a large parcel in her hand.

"You can scarcely know me, sir," said the person, with a modest, deferential air.

The minister replied that he certainly did not recognize her.

"Do you remember the little scullery-maid at ——— inn, in whose soul you once took a deep interest upon your journey to Edinburgh?"

The aged clergyman had a perfect recollection of the events.

"I was that little girl. You taught me two short, but most expressive prayers. By the first I was brought to feel my need of a Saviour; by the second I was led to behold the Saviour himself, and to view Jehovah in the character of a reconciled God and Father in Christ. I am now respectably married, and comfortably settled in life, and although the mother of a numerous family, have traveled far to see your face, and to cheer you, by telling with my own lips the glorious things which by your means the Lord has been pleased to do for my soul."

Before parting with the good pastor, she entreated his acceptance of the parcel she carried, which contained a large web of linen of her own spinning, made long before, for the purpose of being presented to the blessed and beloved old man, should she ever be permitted to see his face in the flesh once more.

She lived for many years, not only a consistent character, but an eminently holy Christian.

Reader! I have one short question for thee ere I close. Hast thou ever seen thyself? Has the hidden pollution of thy inner self ever been disclosed to thee in its real intensity and guilt? If not, thou hast never felt thy need of a Saviour from sin, and we have yet to begin with thee at the very starting-point of experience, and to teach thee the prayer,

"LORD, SHOW ME MYSELF."

Reader! I have one closing request to thee. Try the power of the shortest prayer. In the case of the poor Highland girl, how beautifully did God fulfill His own promise, and the promise remains for thee also: "He shall deliver the needy when he crieth; the poor also, and him that hath no helper." Psa. lxxii. 12.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, January 29, 1852.

"FOREKNOWLEDGE."

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

The sum of your proof that God cannot certainly foreknow an undecreed or contingent event, seems to be this:

A contingent event is neither self-evident nor provable by any thing else;

But God cannot certainly foreknow an event which is neither self-evident nor provable by any thing else;

Therefore, God cannot certainly foreknow a contingent event.

I object to the first proposition of the syllogism. Why are not all things self-evident to God? Or why are they not provable to Him or by Him? No event can ever take place but, whenever or however it may come to pass, it must be a reality. Now, if God is capable of comprehending the future, He can thus render all future realities self-evident to Himself, even were they to take place absolutely without any cause to produce them. But if it be said that no event can take place without a cause to produce it, I reply, that if such be the case, then God's power of comprehension would enable Him to trace and ascertain the strength of each cause, and the resistance to be overcome, and so foreknow the result or event; or, in other words, have evidence of it.(1)

The error of the argument of President Edwards is, that he conceives of God as looking into the distance where there is nothing, instead of regarding Him as possessing and employing an attribute by which the future, with all its events, is brought into present view; or, if you please, an attribute by which He passes onward to the future, and at once surveys and penetrates its infinite extent and depth. If Edwards had conceived of God as possessing and exercising such an attribute, he would not have talked of God's sight or understanding being directed or employed to 'discern evidence where there is none,' or of its enabling Him 'to discern with great certainty that there is none.' For that future which God surveys must contain its own realities. And it is by virtue of God's capability of examining the future, to which future events belong, that He foreknows those events; and not simply by examining the present, to which they do not belong.(2)

You may answer, True, indeed, Edwards did not attribute any such power to God, because there was, or is, no reason to think He has such a power. But why not? I ask. 'All things are naked and open unto the eyes of Him with whom we have to do,' and I suppose, through the exercise of an attribute by the direct use of which all things are manifest and known to Him. If you ask how that can now be manifest to God which does not now exist, I answer, Just as a world can be brought into existence from nothing. If you say that this comparison supposes God to have ways of knowing things that we know not of, and involves a contradiction, I answer, To say God can speak a world into being from nothing, supposes God to have ways of doing things that we know not of, and involves a contradiction. But I think that there is no contradiction in the one case or the other, but that the incomprehensibility of God, simply, is admitted alike in each. The conception that I have of this subject is, that all duration, and events, past, present, and to come, lie in and are girded around by God's eternity and infinity, as the ocean lies in the bowl His hand has scooped for it. But to reduce God to the necessity of decreeing all things from eternity, or that He must arrive at the knowledge of future things by our method of ascertaining facts, (as your views and Edwards' do,) is just like saying, God could not make a world unless He had the materials furnished at His hand before he commenced the work. The moment, however, that God is invested (in the mind,) as He should be, with the attribute of knowledge, parallel with His infinity, eternity, and omnipotence, the theory of Edwards, it seems to me, is effectually undermined.(3)

But I wish to notice a few other things in your 'Remarks,' more particularly. You admit, that all second causes are as much decreed as the final result. And, if I understand you, the final result is so decreed that it is impossible for it to fail of taking place. And yet you speak as if, because physical force may not be implied in the decree, man's duty may not be affected by the decree or force. And more, you profess not to question that certain decreed events ought to be avoided. Well, then, if God has secured all second causes and final results by a decree, so that He knows, not only that they will take place but that it is impossible for them to fail of taking place, what does it signify to say, or intimate, that it is not physical force, that is implied in the decree, or is employed in the case? What if it be moral, intellectual, spiritual, social, or any other kind of force, which is employed? Or, suppose it is not called force at all, but some nameless kind of influence, which, however, makes it impossible that any other events or conditions of things should exist, except those which are decreed, as your doctrine most manifestly does? I beg to be informed, how the employment of some other influence, or, force, than physical force, to bring all these things about, can abate the resistlessness of the force employed? What truth can there be in the doctrine that such decreed events ought to be avoided? Who ought to resist God's decrees, and defeat Omnipotence, and that, for the simple reason, that He exerts His power in some other way than by physical force? Can God make it man's duty to perform such deeds? I have understood you to hold that God possessed moral omnipotence. If He does, I should think this would furnish just the theater for the display of that attribute. And should He once show Himself equal to the task, who could doubt, afterward, His capacity to see evidence where there was none?(4)

One thing more. Though God infallibly knew beforehand that Benedict Arnold would turn traitor, and though He also knew that any proposition affirming that Benedict Arnold would not turn traitor was not true, and could not possibly be true, I maintain still, that God, notwithstanding all that, might know to an infinite certainty, that Benedict Arnold could remain true to his trust. For the proposition, that Arnold would not turn traitor, and the proposition that he could remain true, are altogether different things, in so much that the latter can be absolutely true, while the former may be positively false; for this reason. A man may in fact do a thing that he can avoid. If, then, I say he will not do that thing, what I say is false; but if I say he can avoid it, what I say is true, and perfectly consistent with the nature of the thing, all taken together. Whoever denies this, must take the position, that the fact simply of a man's doing a thing, proves that it was impossible for him to avoid it.

You think you have shown it to be impossible that God can have certain evidence of a contingent event—that such an event can have neither self-evidence nor proof, and must be without evidence, and therefore unknowable to the understanding of God, or any other being. But, as I look at the subject, considerable remains to be done yet, before your proofs will command the assent of many who desire to know the truth pertaining to this matter.

I should like to speak of the practical tendencies of your views; but as it is my way to go for truth first, (unless the known consequences of a doctrine are such as to demonstrate its falsehood, which I strongly suspect to be the fact in regard to the ground you take, though I am confident you would be as unwilling to advance a doctrine which should practically have a hurtful tendency as myself,) I say, as I wish to go for truth first, and consequences afterwards, I will leave that subject till another time. L. CRANDALL.

Remarks.

(1.) That all things are evident to the Divine understanding—either self-evident or evident by proof—is a proposition which we have not denied, nor do we now deny it. Our denial is, that events strictly contingent are or can be evident to any understanding, before they come to pass or have an existence. The very fact that "all things are naked and open to the eyes of Him with whom we have to do," is conclusive to our mind that, in accordance with the plan which He has laid down for the government of the universe, nothing comes to pass contingently. Every thing was distinctly foreseen from all eternity, and its futurition secured, or made sure, by the operation of some previous cause; "for no event can take place without a cause to produce it." Now as, in the language of our correspondent, "God's power of comprehension would enable him to trace and ascertain the strength of each cause, and the resistance to be overcome, and so foreknow the result or event, or, in other words, have evidence of it;" the conclusion is overwhelming, that "the result or event" is not contingent.

Our correspondent reasons so strangely, that we must dwell a little on this point. The term "contingent," in all controversies upon free-will, is used as opposed to necessity. If we say, therefore, that such or such an event was contingent, we mean that there was no necessity that it should take place. If Bro. C. uses the term in any other sense, we hope he will explain himself; for we have no wish to "fight as one that beateth the air." In the presumption that he uses it in the received sense, we say that a strictly contingent event is an event without a cause. For if there was a cause sufficient to produce it, the event was necessary, inasmuch as an effect always necessarily follows it cause. We say necessarily; because, if an event or effect is not necessitated by its cause, it is the same as to say, it is not caused by its cause, which is a contradiction.

Now, if "God's power of comprehension enables him to trace and ascertain the strength of each cause, and so foreknow the result or event," he foreknows the result as necessary, and not as contingent. Moreover, each causing act is an event, and therefore must have a cause which necessitated it; and so it runs into an infinite series of acts causing one another, every one of which is brought about by some antecedent necessity, till we reach the First Cause of all things.

(2.) The import of this paragraph seems to be this: that, strictly speaking, there is no foreknowledge in God—that all his knowledge is present knowledge—and that past, present and future, are now all present in the Divine mind. "He possesses and employs an attribute by which the future, with all its realities, is brought into present view." Grant it; and what follows? Not that God sees the future, with its realities, to be present to creatures and in their view; but that his view of all things, so far as relates to himself, is the same as it will be when they shall have come into existence in the view of his creatures. He sees that their existence is as to us yet future. This is all that we mean by foreknowledge. But our position, so far from being invalidated by this view, is the rather strengthened. For if God sees now, that the future, with all its realties, will at some time come into existence in the view of his creatures, it follows, that there is with him now a certainty—an absolute and unfrustrable certainty—that future realities will thus come into existence. And if there is with him now, or previous to the existence of those things in the view of his creatures, an absolute and unfrustrable certainty that they will thus come into existence, it is because he can now "trace and ascertain the strength of each cause" by which the effect will be necessitated.

Bro. C. says, that "it is by virtue of God's capability of examining the future, to which future events belong, that he foreknows those events; and not simply by examining the present, to which they do not belong." But what does he mean by this? Future events do not belong to the present, it is true; but have they no connection with the present? Are not the past, the present, and the future, all connected by a regular chain of dependencies? If they are—and Bro. C. will not venture to deny it—this connection is the object of God's knowledge. It is distinctly present to his view. It amounts to nothing, therefore, to say that God possesses "an attribute by which he passes onward to the future, and at once surveys and penetrates its infinite extent and depth." In fact, as Bro. C. employs this language, it has very much the appearance of being designed as an evasion of the obvious truth that the future is connected with the present.

President Edwards, it seems, fell into a great "error." "He conceives," says our correspondent, "of God as looking into the distance where there is nothing, instead of regarding him as possessing and employing an attribute by which the future, with all its events, is brought into present view." Such a charge shows that our correspondent has never read Edwards with any close attention. We refer him to Part II. Sect. XII. of Edwards' Inquiry, and about the ninth paragraph from the close of the section. He is speaking of that objection urged by some: "That when we talk of foreknowledge in God, there is no strict propriety in our so speaking; and that although it be true, that there is in God the most perfect knowledge of all events from eternity to eternity, yet there is no such thing as before and after in God, but he sees all things by one perfect, unchangeable view, without any succession." And in the course of his remarks on this objection, he says: "If, strictly speaking, there is no foreknowledge in God, it is because those things which are future to us are as present to God as if they already had existence; and that is as much as to say, that future events are always, in God's view, as evident, clear, sure, and necessary, as if they already were. If there never is a time wherein the existence of the event is not present with God, then there never is a time wherein it is not as much impossible for it to fail of existence, as if its existence were present, and were already come to pass." Again, a little farther on, he says: "The very reason why God's knowledge is without succession, is because it is absolutely perfect, to the highest possible degree of clearness and certainy; all things, whether past, present, or to come, being viewed with equal evidence and fullness; future things being seen with as much clearness, as if they were present; the view is always in absolute perfection; and absolute, constant perfection, admits of no alteration, and so no succession; the actual existence of the thing known, does not at all increase or add to the clearness or certainty of the thing known; God calls the things that are not as though they were; they are all one to him as if they had already existed. But herein consists the strength of the demonstration before given, of the impossibility of the not existing of those things whose existence God knows; that it is as impossible they should fail of existence, as if they existed already. This objection, instead of weakening this argument, sets it in the clearest and strongest light; for it supposes it to be so indeed, that the existence of future events is in God's view so much as if it already had been, that when they come actually to exist, it makes not the least alteration or variation in his view or knowledge of them." Now, whether President Edwards failed to regard God "as possessing and employing an attribute by which the future, with all its events, is brought into present view," let the reader judge.

(3.) Our correspondent speaks of "an attribute, by the direct use of which all things are manifest and known to Him." In his former communication, he appeared to advance the same idea—though we passed no remark upon it at the time—when he charged that our doctrine was "the same as to say, that God is destitute of any attribute of the nature of prescience by which he can certainly foreknow any thing which is not otherwise, that is, by some other attribute first certainly made known." Here our correspondent speaks of foreknowledge, as if it were an essential attribute of the Deity. We do not so understand it. Knowledge in general is an essential attribute, and the characteristic of this attribute, as it exists in the Deity, is that it is infinite. Ps. 147: 5. But foreknowledge is a simple perception of those things which are to have an actual existence. God foreknew that Adam would sin; that Pharaoh would oppress the Israelites; that Cyrus would take the city of Babylon; that Judas would betray his Lord. But he does not now foreknow these events, they being all past. But if foreknowledge were an essential attribute, the actual accomplishment of these events would not make any such alteration but what it would be foreknowledge still; because every essential attribute of God is like his own nature—immutable.

Our correspondent supposes us to ask, "How that can now be manifest to God, which does not now exist?"—and then attempts to show, that "to suppose God to have ways of knowing things that we know not of," involves no greater absurity than "to suppose him to have ways of doing things that we know not of," as in the case of creation, when a world was "brought into existence from nothing." But the comparison does not hold good; for the very term 'create' supposes such an exertion of power as brings into existence that which had no existence before; whereas knowledge always supposes that there is something to be known. Little as we know of the way in which the Omniscient comes at the knowledge of things, yet this much we know about it, that where there is nothing to be known, He can know nothing.

(4.) We have already said, (see our last reply to Bro. Hull,) that though there is a necessity that the events which God foreknows should come to pass, there is nevertheless no other kind of necessity that they should come to pass, except that which is requisite to make the connection between their occurrence and God's foreknowledge of the same, absolutely perfect. Now, what kind of necessity is this? It is not a physical or natural necessity; at least, so far as the volitions of rational creatures are concerned. It is a moral necessity. And when we say of any past action of a person, that "he might have avoided it, or refused to perform it," we mean that he had a natural power to omit the action. Judas was under no natural necessity to betray his Lord, notwithstanding he acted "according to the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God." He had a full natural power to do otherwise. But there was that moral necessity for it, which was requisite to make the connection between the act and God's "determinate counsel and foreknowledge" of it absolutly perfect. Now, Bro. C. need not misunderstand us here, unless he chooses to do so. And we think it but fair that he, and all others who oppose moral necessity, should take the explanation which we give of the term, and oppose it in the sense in which we hold it, and not in some sense altogether different. We have given reasons enough to show, that if God foresees an event as certain—so certain "that any proposition affirming that it will not take place, is not true, and can not possibly be true"—then the certainty of that event is established in his mind; for an unestablished certainty is no certainty at all. And the establishing of the certainty of the event is the decreeing of it. But how, or in what mode, the decree operates to make the event certain, without any compulsion, co-action, or constraint, such as is implied in physical force, we do not pretend to comprehend. But that the volitions of rational creatures are put in motion by compulsion, co-action, or constraint, we do not pretend, we have not pretended, nor have we written one line which, fairly construed, would imply any such thing.

And now as to the question, "Who ought to resist God's decree?" If God's decree necessarily implied his approbation of the act decreed, nobody ought to resist it. But before any one confidently asserts that it does imply such approbation, he ought to know something about the mode in which the decree operates. If it operates by force or compulsion, so as to lay one under a natural necessity of doing the thing decreed, it may be fairly presumed, that the thing decreed is approved by the Almighty. But while the mode of its operation is a profound mystery, and while it lays the creature under no natural necessity to perform the act decreed, nor under any other necessity except that which is requisite to make the connection between the act and God's foreknowledge of it absolutely perfect, it is a stretch of temerity, little short of presumption, to say that God's decree implies his approbation of that which is decreed

A PROTESTANT ALLIANCE.

An English correspondent of the Independent gives the proceedings of a large meeting which was recently held in London, for the purpose of adopting resolutions respecting the papal persecutions on the Continent, and petitioning Parliament for the repeal of the act endowing the Jesuit College at Maynooth, in Ireland. The Earl of Shaftsbury (late Lord Ashley) presided, and was sustained by a highly respectable body of gentlemen and clergymen of various denominations. The Chairman, after explaining the circumstances which led to the projection of the Alliance, said that the time had come when events of magnitude in any nation could not be viewed with indifference by the people of any other nation; and he appealed for sympathy and co-operation to the Protestant brethren of the United States, to the Waldensian Christians, and to the people of Sardinia.

Mr. Colquhoun, M. P., moved the first resolution, which he sustained by stirring appeals, founded upon extracts from leading Catholic journals, showing the intolerance of Romanism. The resolution runs thus:—

"That the revival, on the part of the Church of Rome, of the loftiest pretensions and most intolerant doctrines of the papacy of the middle ages, renders it the duty of all Protestants to unite, both for the defense of their religious liberties, and for the maintenance of that revealed truth on which depend alike the temporal and eternal happiness of mankind."

The following resolution was moved by Rev. Richard Burgess of the Episcopal Church, and seconded by Rev. W. Chalmers of the Presbyterian Church, both of whom delivered set addresses upon the subject:—

"That the recent movements of the Romish priesthood throughout Continental Europe, coupled with their late aggressive proceedings in England, prove the existence of a settled purpose to overthrow religious freedom; while their success in France, in prosecutions for the sale of controversial tracts, and in preventing the circulation of the Holy Scriptures, shows to what an extent that freedom may be curtailed, even under a Constitution framed to secure both civil and religious liberty. That this meeting, therefore, approves of the purpose of the Committee of the Protestant Alliance to interpose, whenever practicable, in behalf of those suffering wrong at the hands of that priesthood; and it calls upon the Protestants of all countries, and especially upon those in the United States of America, to unite with the people of Great Britain in defense of those principles of the glorious Reformation for which our ancestors labored and suffered."

Sir Culling Eardley delivered an address communicating facts of great interest, drawn from most of the countries of Europe—two which marked the rigorous tyranny of President Napoleon; one which showed Baden, the nominally Protestant capital of a Protestant Grand Duchy, to be unsafe for a Protestant advocate; others showing the cruel despotism of the Austrian and the priest in Italy. He closed by moving the following resolution, which was sustained by Rev. J. Close of Cheltenham, viz:—

"That this meeting desires to express its sense of the contrast afforded to this retrograde movement in France and elsewhere, by the protection recently given by the Government of Piedmont to the ancient Church of the Waldenses, and by the firmness with which that Government has withstood the arrogant pretensions of the Papal priesthood. It trusts that the House of Savoy may have the honor of carrying on to completion the work of liberty of conscience, the surest guaranty of civil freedom and national prosperity. And it desires to express its firm conviction, that in maintaining the independence of the Sardinian Crown against the aggressive claims of Rome, the Piedmontese Government may rely on the warmest sympathy of the people of Great Britain."

The last resolution had reference to the Maynooth grant, and was moved and seconded by Rev. C. Prest, Wesleyan, and Dr. Begg, of the Scotch Church.

THE RELIGIOUS NEWSPAPER.

In redeeming our promise to furnish the readers of the Recorder with occasional extracts from our exchanges showing in what light they regard the religious newspaper, we copy this week a portion of an article which appeared in a recent number of the New York Recorder, the leading Baptist paper of this city. We most heartily commend its suggestions to our readers:—

Within the last twenty years, a religious power has grown up which was unknown in the earlier ages of the Church, and even in the stirring times of the Reformation. That power is the religious periodical press. The idea of the religious newspaper seems to have grown out of the demand for religious intelligence consequent upon the revival of the missionary spirit at the end of the last century. It was found necessary by the leaders of that movement to provide for the dissemination of information on religious subjects, in order to meet a demand, and also to give life and energy to the missionary spirit. From small beginnings, maintained at a great sacrifice, the religious press has risen to be an institution and a power for good, that in each denomination rivals any of its great agencies of benevolence. In order to form an idea of the space that the religious press fills in the public mind, let any one attempt to realize the state of feeling which would exist if some ecclesiastical Napoleon should, by a stroke of his pen, silence the religious newspapers and periodicals in the United States. The managers of our organizations of benevolence would find themselves utterly at a loss for their most efficient means of influencing the public mind. That delightful intercommunication of the people of God which is maintained through the columns of the weekly paper would cease, and we should be reduced to the slowest and most imperfect modes of communication. * * * *

We ask the intelligent pastor, Who are those most ready to support the institutions of religion and the honor of God's house? Who are those that are most keenly alive to the demands of the age upon the Christian professor? Who are those that lend the most respectful hearing to the teachings of the pulpit, and are most ready for all those works and labors that rightfully devolve upon the Christian? Is it not those whose minds, from childhood, have been imbued with the facts that mark the progress of the Redeemer's kingdom in every clime? Is it not those whose recreation has been sought in conning the pages of some well-conducted religious newspaper? Is it not those whose minds have been enlarged, and whose hearts have been warmed, by frequent surveys of what Christians, speaking every language and dwelling in every clime, are doing for the recovery of the world from the dominion of Satan? The religious newspaper is a silent pastor, presenting instruction, warning, consolation, and support to the eye on the counter, in the workshop, in the rail-car, and, above all, amid the quiet joys of the "household nook, the haunt of all affections pure." We ask the agents of our benevolent institutions, Who are those who meet them in their difficult, self-denying, but necessary labors, with kindness and attention, with the open hand and warm heart, but the habitual readers of those religious papers which, with abundant facts and strong arguments, have prepared their heads and hearts for the blessing of the cheerful giver?

As an educational institution, the religious press is of the greatest importance. Let any one, who has been from infancy a reader of religious newspapers, attempt to abstract from his mental furniture all the facts, suggestions, arguments, knowledge of the world, and of men and things, that he has thus acquired, and how great would be the vacuum displayed to his conceptions! What an amount of geography, of history, biography, statistics, political economy, criticism, and, above all, of interpretation and systematic theology, are gleaned from the pages of religious newspapers in the course of a lifetime!

We claim for the religious press that it does the work of a benevolent institution. Immense sums of money are contributed yearly to Tract and Publication Societies, for the distribution of religious books at a cheap rate, by the means of colporteurs. In this work we sympathize, and we do all in our power to carry it forward. But the fact seems to be lost sight of, that the religious newspaper press is doing the same work, and in a most cheap and efficient way. Each number of the largest-sized religious papers contains, exclusive of advertisements, on an average, an equal amount of matter with a 16mo volume of one hundred and fifty pages, such as are ordinarily sold at prices ranging from twenty-five to thirty-seven and a half cents. The cost of binding such volumes will not average more than from six to nine cents each. The letter-press of fifty-two such volumes is furnished by the newspaper publisher for the sum of two dollars, or at the rate of a trifle less than four cents apiece. Subtracting the cost of binding, the reading matter of the religious newspaper is furnished to subscribers from twice to four times cheaper than is done in the volumes of any benevolent publishing society within our knowledge. Again, the work of distribution is accomplished at an exceedingly low rate by the post office, which becomes the cheapest colporteur in the world. The religious newspaper has an advantage over the volumes of the Tract Societies, in the readable character of its contents. It is read with eagerness by all the members of a family, whether religiously disposed or not. The fact that what is written and extracted bears directly upon the moving, living present, wins attention to religious reading which would be passed by in a set treatise on a special subject. We believe that religious newspapers are read, on an average, by more persons than ordinary books of the character published by the religious book societies.

We have been unconsciously led to make these remarks, not from any disposition to undervalue the work of the book societies. We have labored in their behalf, and contributed our mite to their funds in the past, as we hope to do in the future. Scarcely a week passes, but some article is published in our columns, calling public attention to their claims. We only wish to set before our readers the unrecognized fact, that the religious newspaper furnishes one of the readiest, cheapest, and most practical means of bringing gospel truth, and the great facts referring to the cause of Christ, before the minds of men. Yet, strange to say, the idea of the gratuitous distribution of religious newspapers has hardly been recognized, much less acted upon, except for the accomplishment of some special party purpose, or by publishers themselves. * * * * * * *

There is one way in which this work of benevolence can be carried forward. Let each subscriber to the Recorder, for instance, obtain among his friends one additional subscriber, and collect and transmit the payment, and it would result in the circulation of near half a million 16mo volumes of religious reading, of the size which we have above indicated. When we bear in mind that we may calculate, with a good degree of certainty, that each of this immense number of volumes would be read by at least five persons, it gives a still clearer idea of the good which might thus be accomplished. * * * * *

Again, this work of benevolence can be carried on by prompt payment of dues to the publisher, and a little labor in inducing others to transmit theirs in like manner. The publishers of this paper have thousands of dollars, justly their due, for which an equivalent has been given, lying in the hands of subscribers living so far distant, or so remote from the great lines of travel, that the expense of sending a man to collect it will be greater than the amount of the debts. For every one of the papers which we have sent to such subscribers, we have paid the printer and the paper-maker, and given our own labor in addition. This neglect to meet newspaper debts is, we believe, not so much from a disposition not to pay, as from neglect and inattention, or the habit of deferring the payment of debts until they are called for personally. Besides, the great majority of these debts are in the hands of professing Christians, and we would not believe that these sums are withheld from dishonest intentions.

Among our Methodist brethren, every minister is an agent for the publications of the Church, and we believe it is made, in some sense, their duty to collect and transmit all dues for books and periodicals published by the Methodist body. And this practice, we believe, accounts for the immense circulation of the Methodist periodicals, and also for the hold which that Church has upon its own members and the community at large. We do not ask any such labor as this of our brethren in the ministry, but a word, or a hint, would often save the publishers from great annoyance and expense.

THE MAINE LIQUOR LAW.—The Mayor of Portland, Me., in his report to the Common Council of that city, gives the most gratifying accounts of the effects of the Liquor Law on the morality, prosperity and order of the city. So quiet, peaceable and orderly are the streets, that watchmen have been altogether dispensed with, although several were indispensable before the passing of the law. Public houses or grog shops have utterly disappeared, and liquor is only sold in very small quantities, and with the greatest secrecy, by a few foreigners. No more than one-quarter the amount formerly used is now consumed in the State. The number of persons requiring relief from the Alms-House is greatly reduced, and the House of Correction is entirely empty. The Mayor says:—

"I have reason to believe, that the law is every day becoming more firmly fixed in the favorable regard of the people of this city and State, and I am confident that no retrograde step will be taken here in relation to this subject."

MISSIONARY CONTRIBUTIONS.—We wish every Seventh-day Baptist Church could be induced to appoint a missionary committee of male and female members, who would take each one a district, and personally ask every member of the Society for a subscription every year. The incidental benefits of such a plan, effectively carried out for a series of years, would be more than equivalent to all the labor it involves, and the impulse it would give to missions would be clear gain. A circular from the Foreign Mission Society of Brooklyn and New York, says on this subject:—

"A system of contributions in each church, which shall operate universally and steadily, which shall search out all the members, and create an interest and a sense of responsibility in all, which shall honor the offering of the poorest as well as that of the richest—such a system, we feel, is absolutely essential to future success and progress."

NEW MOVEMENT IN THE METHODIST CHURCH.—An exchange says that a movement is on foot in the Methodist denomination, the object of which is to give the Laity a share in the legislative councils of that Church. Large and respectable meetings have been held at Philadelphia, claiming that the Church suffers from the exclusion of lay members from all share in making the laws by which they are governed, and that new energy and efficiency will be infused into it, and a new spirit be awakened, by the admission of something of the democratic principle into its organization. Multitudes of valuable men are now driven out of the Church, and others are prevented from joining it, by the objectionable features of the present system. It is not proposed to change the fundamental institutions of the Church—Itineracy and the Episcopacy—nor to do any thing which shall separate the clergy from the people, but the contrary. It is proposed to hold a Convention at Philadelphia on the 3d of March next, to consider the propriety of petitioning the next General Conference to make the proposed change.

Fugitive Slaves in Canada.

A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune, writing from Toronto under date of Jan. 9 says:—

The condition of the fugitive negroes, who have sought an asylum in Western Canada, has attracted the attention of many benevolent persons, and charity has supplied the more pressing wants of these strangers. The Anti-Slavery Association of Canada, of which the head-quarters are at Toronto, has done its share. Their mode of relieving the distress of the fugitives is this: There are two houses provided for those who have recently come in a destitute condition, where they are boarded for one week, at the end of which they are usually able to find such employment as they are capable of, and they are supplied with wood-saws, axes, washing tubs, smoothing-irons, &c., according to their capabilities.

Last night a promenade concert in behalf of the fugitives was held at St. Lawrence Hall. The number present was about five hundred, and the proceeds will be $200. This concert was attended indifferently by persons of both colors. The number of blacks present was considerable, and, as a general thing, they took up a position by themselves in a particular part of the room, though to some extent they were interspersed through the audience. In some instances white persons, to show their freedom from all prejudice of color, would make a point of taking up a position in the very midst of the colored persons.

FREE SCHOOLS IN CANADA.—A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune, writing from Toronto, Canada, January 16, says: "Many years ago, our Legislature copied the School system of the State of New York, with more or less of modification. Since then the New-York system has changed. The Free School pinciple has not been long in operation in the State of New York before the eyes of our people are anxiously turned toward its working. It is in the option of School Trustees, elected by the people, to adopt the Free School system or not as they shall judge proper. The result is, that the election of School Trustees is beginning to be made the means of deciding the question of "Free Schools" or no "Free Schools." In Toronto, the thing has just been tested; and the advocates of Free Schools have carried everything before them. So it is in many other places."

COST OF MINISTERS.—In the United States it is estimated that there are 16,682 preachers of the various Christian denominations. At an average salary of $375 each, the cost of the whole number would be about $6,000,000. This, according to Dr. Todd's calculation, is but about half the cost of 16,000 criminals in prison in the country. The heathen must pay very differently for their priests, since, at the lowest estimate, every thirtieth man among them is a priest; in many places, every twentieth, fifteenth, and even tenth man, for instance in Ava, the capital of Burmah, in India.

INFORMATION WANTED.—Did the Wisconsin Association have the Minutes of its last meeting printed? If yes, will the Clerk send us a copy? If no, will he favor us with the Statistics of the Churches? We want, also, to learn the present condition of the two churches on Hughes' River, Va., and of the churches at Madison and Fredonia, Ia., Woodbridgetown, Pa., and Pike, O. Any person having information upon these points, would confer a favor by communicating it to G. B. Utter, N. Y.

A CARD.—I have been assured by some friends, of ample means, and every way desirable persons in such a colony as has been proposed, that if fifty families can be relied upon to go, with the means to plant themselves on the Pacific shore, they will go; and I have been requested to call on all such to communicate their wishes, that steps may be taken to organize. My impression now is, that more than that number are ready to decide upon going under those terms.

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST MEMORIAL.—The first number of "The Seventh-day Baptist Memorial: a Quarterly Magazine, devoted to History, Biography, and Statistics," was issued last week. In mechanical execution, it has few equals. Of its contents, the following table will give the best idea:—

BIOGRAPHICAL DEPARTMENT:	Page.
William Hiscox	2
William Gibson	4
Joseph Crandall	6
John Maxson	9
William Bliss	14
HISTORICAL DEPARTMENT:
The Seventh-day Baptist Church in Newport, R. I.—Settlement of the Colony of Rhode Island—Providence and Newport—Establishment of the first Baptist Church—Narrative of the Controversy in relation to the Sabbath	22
MISSIONARY DEPARTMENT:
History of Missions	40
STATISTICAL DEPARTMENT:
List of Seventh-day Baptist Ministers, with their Post-Office Address	48
ILLUSTRATIONS:
Portrait of William Bliss.
Engraving of the Seventh-day Baptist Meeting-House at Newport, R. I.

Copies of the Memorial have been sent to brethren in the various churches of the Denomination, who are requested to consider themselves specially invited to act as agents in getting up a list of subscribers in their respective neighborhoods.

THE SABBATH-SCHOOL VISITOR.—The January number of this publication, being the first number of the second volume, was sent to all subscribers for the first volume from whom no word had been received in relation to it, with a request, if they wished it continued, that they would send the money immediately, and if not, that they would at once return the papers, directed to The Sabbath Recorder. Returns have reached us from only a small part of the subscribers. There should be no farther delay in attending to this business.

The receipts of the American Tract Society for December last were $38,207 99; of which $26,533 04 was for publications sold.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, JAN. 19.

In the SENATE, Mr. Fish presented the petition of the New York State Colonization Society, praying for the establishment of a line of Mail Steamers between the U. S. and Africa, which was referred to the Naval Committee. Mr. Sumner offered a resolution directing inquiry into the expediency of abolishing spirit-rations in the Navy, and increasing the monthly pay of enlisted men. Mr. Clark introduced a joint resolution declaring adherance to the present long-establishing policy of the United States against all entangling alliances.

The joint resolution making Land Warrants assignable, was taken up. Mr. Underwood offered a substitute, which in substance provides, first, that all warrants for military service, and all locations of the same, be assignable. The second section allows and fixes rates of compensation to land officers, payable out of the Treasury, for locations of military warrants heretofore made. The fourth section extends the act of 1850 to militia, State troops, and volunteers, who were called into military service, and whose services were paid for by the United States. The fifth section allows compensation of time of service; a soldier shall be allowed for every 20 miles he may have marched to be mustered into service. Mr. Sebastian offered an amendment repealing the proviso in the 9th section of the Act of February, 1849, which withheld bounty land from those troops who did not march to Mexico, which, after a debate, was also adopted. Mr. Downs offered an amendment, which, after debate and numerous modifications, was also adopted. It provides that a preëmptionist may pay for his land in warrants. Mr. Walker offered an amendment, providing that any person over 21 years of age, or the head of a family, who will settle upon public lands and cultivate the same for 5 years, shall have 150 acres without any charge. The amendment was ordered printed, and the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Briggs presented the resolution of the New York Common Council, tendering the General Government without charge a site for a Mint in that city. A resolution was introduced, to have printed for the use of the House 100,000 copies of a condensed census report, which appeared in the Globe of Jan. 1, 1852. After long talk upon the subject the resolution was adopted, and the Senate adjourned.

THIRD-DAY, JAN. 20.

The SENATE disposed of quite a number of private bills, claims, and memorials, and several Senators presented bills on various subjects. Mr. Seward presented an amendment which he proposed to substitute for Mr. Clarke's Joint Resolutions introduced yesterday. The amendment embodies a protest against Russian intervention in Hungary, and a solemn pledge that should it be repeated, the United States would interfere to prevent it. Gen. Cass presented one substituting for that of Mr. Seward a warning that the United States would regard the intervention with concern.

The Joint Resolution, making Land Warrants assignable, was taken up, and Mr. Walker's amendment, granting land to every actual settler, after five years' actual occupancy, in quantities not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, free of all charge, was debated and rejected. Ayes, 8; Noes, 35. The Joint Resolution was then ordered to be engrossed, and the Senate adjourned.

The HOUSE spent the whole day in talking about the manner of paying the Mexican installment claim, and in listening to a personal controversy between Mr. Giddings and some others.

FOURTH-DAY, JAN. 21.

In the SENATE, several messages were received from the President, among them one communicating the correspondence between our Minister at Paris and the State Department relative to Louis Napoleon's usurpation. The action of the Commissioners on claims against Mexico was the subject of a long talk, growing out of a complaint in the form of a petition which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Mr. Seward, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a joint resolution authorizing the exploration and reconnoisance of the course of navigation used by whaling vessels in the regions of Behrings Straits, and also of such parts of the China Seas, Straits of Gaspar, and Java Seas, as lie in the route of vessels to and from China. The bill making Land Warrants assignable, was passed. After ordering several other bills to be engrossed the Senate, adjourned.

The HOUSE spent the morning hour in talking about the bill explanatory of the Bounty Land Law of Sept. 1851. The remainder of the day was spent in Committee of the Whole, talking about the Mexican installment bill.

FIFTH-DAY, DEC. 22.

The SENATE passed the bill extending time for selecting land granted to Wisconsin for saline purposes; the bill for the relief of widows and relatives of officers and seamen lost overboard from the U. S. brig Washington in a hurricane; and the bill authorizing Illinois to select the residue of lands to which she is entitled, under the act of March, 1827, in aid of opening a Canal to connect Illinois River with Lake Michigan. Mr. Sumner's resolution as to the propriety of abolishing the spirit ration, and of increasing the monthly pay of enlisted men in the Navy, was adopted. The resolution of Mr. Norris, authorizing a contract with Mr. Rives for the publication of Senate debate in The Daily Globe at $7 50 a column, was taken up, debated and passed.

In the HOUSE, there was a brisk debate on a resolution of Mr. Briggs (N. Y.) referring it to the Committee on Elections to inquire whether the return of Mr. Bernhisel, as Delegate from Utah, was not in violation of law, fraudulent and corrupt. After this discussion or dispute, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the Mexican claim, which it debated briefly, and then adjourned.

SIXTH-DAY, JAN. 23.

The SENATE passed several private bills, of no interest to any body but the parties, ordered several others to a third reading, and then adjourned over to Second-day.

In the HOUSE, copies of the communications sent to the Senate the day before yesterday relative to the late revolution in France, were received, as was also a message advising an appropriation of from $70,000 to $90,000 to build seven new revenue cutters, which were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. Several attempts were made to prolong the time to which the Mexican claim debate was limited by the resolution of the day previous, but without success. Finally, the House went into Committee, and resumed the debate. Several members spoke, and Mr. Webster's conduct was severely censured by some. After a protracted discussion, the Committee rose, when the Speaker presented a communication from the Secretary of State in reply to the resolution of the day before, respecting the payments made last year, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole.

SABBATH-DAY, JAN. 24.

The HOUSE spent the whole day in discussing the Mexican installment question, and passed no vote worth recording.

European News.

The steamer Arctic, with four days later news from Europe, arrived at New York on the 22d inst.

From England, we hear that Lieut. Pim's scheme of a search for Sir John Franklin in the icy sea north of Kamschatka, will not be executed. The Russian Government, assured by its own men of science that the undertaking would be impracticable, refuses its countenance, and the plan falls to the ground.

From France, we have the particulars of the consecration of Louis Napoleon at the Cathedral of Notre Dame. It is said that Louis Napoleon has dropped for the present the idea of assuming the title of Emperor. A marriage is said to be in contemplation between the President and a Princess of Sweden. The proscription of the press in France has given an extraordinary impulse to publication in Belgium, where it is proposed to print a great number of pamphlets, which could not possibly, under present circumstances, issue from the press at Paris. The speculators who have set this enterprise on foot undertake to smuggle the pamphlets and journals so published into France.

The Finance Minister of Austria has resigned, broken down by the bankruptcy of the Government and the opposition of the stock-gamblers whose speculations he thought to hinder. The new Fundamental Laws for Austria are published; the system they establish is complete Centralization.

STEAMER BURNT, AND GREAT LOSS OF LIFE. —The following painful intelligence was received by the Arctic:—

The R. M. S. Packet Amazon, from Southampton to the West Indies, took fire at about 1 A. M., on Sunday, 50 miles west of Scilly, and was entirely consumed, with the mails, officers, crew, passengers, except 21 persons, viz.: Mr. Vincent, Midshipman, seventeen of the crew, and two passengers, who succeeded in getting off in one of the boats, were picked up after being by her twelve hours. The total number of persons on board is said to have been 155. The fire is supposed to have originated from spontaneous combustion.

The Amazon was the first prepared for sea of a gigantic fleet of mail steamers intended for the West Indian route. She is said to have been far the largest mail packet afloat, and accordingly her departure from Southampton created no small excitement. Immense crowds attended to witness so magnificent a vessel walking the water for the first time, and among them some of the first naval and scientific men of England. The greatest pride was felt in her symmetry, speed, and beauty. She sailed amid cheers, having on board 1,100 tons of coal and 100 tons of cargo, including £20,100 specie, and fifty passengers. "The Amazon will proceed," says the Daily News, "to Greytown, by way of St. Thomas, Santa Martha, Carthagena, and Chagres, and will return to Southampton, nearly by the same route, early in March next."

Three Days Later.

The steamer America, with three days latter news, arrived at Halifax on Sunday morning last, whence the news was sent to New York by telegraph.

The report of the destruction by fire of the West India Royal Steamer Amazon, is fully confirmed. The Amazon, under the command of Capt. Simons, sailed from Southampton, with mails and passengers, on the 2d inst., and when two days out, and about 110 miles south-west of Scilly Islands, was discovered to be on fire. The flames burst out at an early hour on the morning of the 4th inst., and in twenty minutes after, so rapidly did the flames spread, the ship was completely gutted. She subsequently burned to the water's edge, when her boilers exploded and the hull immediately sunk. By this terrible disaster 41 passengers and 69 of the officers and crew of the steamer are known to have perished. Capt. Simons, his four chief officers, the Surgeon, and Elliot Warburton, the celebrated author of the "Crescent and the Cross," were among the sufferers. Many of the passengers, from the appalling rapidity with which the flames spread, were either burned or suffocated in their berths. As soon as every effort to subdue the flames had failed, the boats were attempted to be launched, but owing to the consternation which prevailed on all sides, a desperate and despairing rush was made for them, and before they could be got well into the water, two were swamped alongside of the steamer, and every soul in them was lost. Two other boats were successfully launched, and thus nine passengers and 37 seamen succeeded in escaping from the burning wreck. They were shortly after picked up—one party by an English and the other by a Dutch vessel, and were safely landed respectively at Plymouth and Brest. The Amazon was a new and magnificent boat, and very richly freighted. The loss, therefore, is immense. The origin of the fire remains a mystery.

The day previous to the departure of the America, intelligence reached Liverpool of the total loss of the new ship Columbus, Capt. McCerron, owned by D. & A. Kingsland of New York, on the 7th inst., off the Irish Coast, near Waterford. Two ladies and two steerage passengers, together with eight of the crew, perished; but Capt. McCerron, his officers and the remainder of the passengers and crew succeeded in reaching the shore.

France continued steadfast and tranquil. The President gave a grand banquet at the Tuilleries on the 5th, to four hundred of the delegates of the Departments.

Intelligence from the Cape of Good Hope announces that a severe skirmish had taken place on the 6th of November, between large bodies of rebel Hottentots and and Caffres and a detachment of British troops, in which the latter had been obliged to retire, with the loss of one colonel, three other officers, and seven men.

Another reverse had been sustained by the English troops at the Lagos, on the Coast of Africa, in an attempt to chastise the native King for slave-dealing. The force, consisting of 260 officers and men were repulsed with considerable loss.

THE AZTEC CHILDREN.—Horace Greeley, in an article over his own signature, in the Tribune of the 26th inst., says:—

It was with some reluctance that I obeyed a polite invitation to visit the Aztec Children, and ratify or dispute the commendations hitherto bestowed on them. I did not expect to find ogres nor anything hideous, but, among all similar exhibitions, remembering with pleasure only Tom Thumb, I could not hope to find gratification in the sight of two dwarf Indians. But I was disappointed. These children are simply abridgements or pocket editions of humanity—bright-eyed, delicate-featured, olive-complexioned little elves, with dark, straight, glossy hair, well-proportioned heads, and animated, pleasing countenances. That their ages are honestly given, and that the boy weighs just about as many pounds as he is years old, (twenty,) while the girl is about half his age and three pounds lighter, I see no reason at all for doubting. That they are human beings, though of a low grade morally and intellectually, as well as diminutive physically, there can be no doubt; and they are not freaks of Nature, but specimens of a dwindled, mannikin race, who almost realize in bodily form our idea of the "brownies," "bogles," and other fanciful creations of a more superstitious age.

THE PROMETHEUS AFFAIR.—A Washington telegraphic correspondent of the Courier and Enquirer says:—

Advices have been received at the State Department from London, to the 2d inst., to the effect that Mr. Lawrence had obtained from Lord Granville a reply to his letter sent to Lord Palmerston, in regard to the attack upon the Prometheus, in which reply it was declared, that in the present state of information, the conduct of the captain of the Express was disapproved of, but that further intelligence must be received before a final decision could be rendered.

Mr. Lawrence rejoined, and obtained from the British Secretary a positive assurance that, if the full British report should, in all essentials, correspond with the American representations, the acts of the captain should be fully and promptly disavowed. A copy of that report has been received in Washington, and it conforms substantially with the American statements. Consequently the affair may now be regarded as settled.

SIXTY YEARS AGO.—Sixty-nine years ago the 4th inst., a party of adventurers from the Eastern States, after a long and toilsome journey, descended the Ohio River, encamped upon the spot where Newport Barracks now stand. They were separated from the several "stations" in Kentucky, and turned their steps through the wilderness, first pledging each other to meet upon the same spot, or such of them as might survive, in fifty years from that day. The agreement was made on the 4th day of November, 1782. In the year 1832, on the 4th day of November, precisely fifty years after the time of the agreement, four of the old band met upon the spot to fulfill the promise! One of them was over ninety years of age; and the rest were under three score and ten. After remaining a few days, they turned their steps homeward—not through a wilderness as they did half a hundred years before, but through scenes of busy life, and the hum of industrial millions; nor did they promise another meeting, as that was an event fixed by a higher will; and it has taken place! They are all dead! [Nat. Int.

DEATH OF A BRITISH NOBLEMAN.—On the 30th of December, John Baron Loughborough, a British nobleman, was found dead on board of a schooner lying at the wharf in New Orleans. He had been addicted to excessive drinking, and his death was owing to that terrible habit. With a friend and a servant, he had embarked a few days before at Havana for New Orleans, and his death occurred as the vessel ascended the river. The British Consul took possession of his effects. The grandfather of the unfortunate scion of nobility was Alexander Wedderburne, a celebrated lawyer, cotemporary and on intimate terms with Dr. Johnson, Pitt, Burke, Fox, and all the great statesmen and scholars of that brilliant period. His uncommon abilities as an advocate, lawyer, and statesman, raised him to the dignity of Chief Justice of the King's Bench, and obtained for him the peerage. The freshly acquired nobility of the family has found a mournful setting. [N. Y. Times.

A CAUTION TO BOYS.—A few weeks ago, a youth of sixteen arrived in this city to prosecute his studies with a view to professional life. He came from a distant State, and was to remain here for some years. A week or two after his arrival, he was seized with a paralysis in both legs, which advanced upward, till nearly the lower half of his body was benumbed, and apparently lifeless. The most distinguished physicians in New York attended the case, but, no relief being afforded, the unfortunate young man has been taken on his way home, and there is but little hope of his recovery. The cause of his disease is stated by the physicians to be tobacco-chewing—a habit which he early acquired, and persisted in to the time of his attack.

CURIOUS CAUSE OF DEATH.—On Saturday, Jan. 10, Dr. Ray, Coroner of Newtown, Long Island, was called to hold an inquest on the body of a negro man named Reuben, who had died very suddenly. From the facts elicited at the inquest, it appears that the deceased, while in a partial state of intoxication, drank a pint of brandy on a bet, which completely stupefied him, in which state he remained some fourteen or sixteen hours, when he partially revived and called for water, which was given to him, and he drank very freely, but soon after died. A verdict was rendered that the proximate cause of his death was from the drinking of cold water.

The Synod of New York and New Jersey has appointed Friday, the 30th inst., to be observed by the Churches under its care, as "a day of fasting, humiliation and prayer, with special reference to the revival of religion."

SUMMARY.

A HINT.—One of our exchanges says, that "the Tennessee Baptist has been running behind in its receipts for some time past, until it is now in debt six thousand dollars. This is owing to negligence and dishonesty on the part of its subscribers. One would think that if any debt were paid, it would be for a newspaper, especially a family paper, and that, too, a religious one, and when the debtor is a professing Christian."

The National Temperance Society have determined to present a splendid Gold Medal to Hon. Neal Dow, for his eminent services in securing the enactment of the Maine Law for suppressing the liquor traffic, and for his energetic and successful efforts, as Mayor of Portland, in the execution of that law. The Medal will be presented by Gen. Houston, of Texas, at the Grand Banquet, in Metropolitan Hall, New York, Feb. 18.

A few cakes of the newly invented solidified milk have found their way to this country. The article resembles, in color, consistency, weight, and feel, cakes of pale yellow soap. One pound, grated into boiling water, will make several gallons of very good milk. It is warranted to keep any number of years. Price, in England, one dollar per pound.

Within the past few days there has been a very important rise in the price of coal, which cannot fail to bear oppressively upon the poor. The Delaware & Hudson Canal Company have made two advances of 50 cts. per tun each, and of course all other dealers have either led or followed suit. The retail price now usually demanded is $6 per tun.

The condition of the Common Schools in Indiana is most prosperous. The fund now applicable to the purposes of education amounts to $3,640,000, a fund which will be continually increasing, the interest only being expended for the advancement of the schools.

On Tuesday morning, Jan. 20, the East River was frozen over, and many persons passed from Brooklyn to New York upon the ice. A change of tide, however, broke up the ice, and put a stop to their proceedings.

The Syracusans indicted for helping off the fugitive slave Jerry, were on trial at Albany last week. At last accounts, the probability was that the indictment would be quashed, because no evidence was taken by the Grand Jury who found the indictment to prove Jerry a slave.

A new Railroad route from New York to Albany was opened last week, which is by the Harlem Railroad to Chatham Corners, and thence to Albany on the track of the Western Railroad. This is said to be a very pleasant and quick route.

The Divorce Case between Edwin Forrest and his wife, which has been on trial in New York for more than a month past, was decided on the 26th inst. A divorce was granted the wife, alimony $3,000 per year.

It is proposed to raise, by subscription, a monument of the purest Parian marble to the memory of the little school-children who perished at the New York school catastrophe.

Two Living Aztec Children.

A NEW AND ABSOLUTELY UNIQUE RACE OF MANKIND.—The most extraordinary and inexplicable phenomena that the history of the human race has yet produced, can be seen for a few weeks at the large Exhibition Room of the Society Library, corner of Broadway and Leonard-street. They were recently taken from a newly-discovered and idolatrous people in Central America, by whom they were kept with superstitious veneration, distinct and secluded as a caste of their priesthood, and employed as Mimes and Bacchanals in their Pagan ceremonies and worship.

They are male and female. The latter measuring 29½ inches in height, weighing 17 lbs.; the former is 33 inches high, and weighs 20 lbs.

From repeated and careful examination, the best Physiologists state the older to be 12 or 13 years of age; the younger about 10 years.

They differ altogether from examples of the dwarf kind, and from children; affording complete and undeniable illustration of a Piamean variety of the Human Race!

Miscellaneous.

The Common Schools of New York.

Extracts from the Report of the State Superintendent.

I. CONDITION OF THE COMMON SCHOOLS.

The returns contained in the annexed table show the condition of the Common Schools for the year ending on the 31st day of December, 1850, covering nearly the entire period during which the Free School act of 1849 remained in operation; a period characterized beyond any other in the history of our Common School system, for the agitation and excitement of the public mind consequent upon this measure; a period of transition between a system, nearly unanimously adopted by the people, but which in its practical operation had proved in many respects eminently disastrous, and a system more in accordance with the popular will; a period, consequently, peculiarly calculated to test not, only the strength of the public sentiment in favor of our elementery institutions for popular education, but the stability and value of those institutions themselves. The unequal pressure of local taxation for the support of the schools, arising from an injudicious provision in the act referred to—a provision, the operation of which, in this respect, was almost entirely unforseen—had originated a strong feeling of hostility against a system which a few months previously had received the deliberate sanction and approval of an immense majority of the people of the State. This hostility was manifested not only by a very general demand for the entire and unconditional repeal of the act itself, but by a virtual refusal, on the part of the inhabitants of a large proportion of the school districts, to carry its provisions into effect, beyond the point absolutely required as a condition for the receipt of their distributive share of the public money. The schools which had, for a period of more than thirty years, uniformly been kept open for an average term of eight months during each year, were reduced in many instances to four, and the provisions for their support limited to the avails of the public funds. So strong and general was the current of opposition to the obnoxious details of the law, that the most powerful efforts were required, on the part of the friends of education generally, to prevent an entire abandonment of the great principle involved in its enactment, and which, wholly irrespective of the particular mode of its execution, had received the clear assent and full approbation of the people.

Pending a conflict so embittered and extensive, embracing within its range nearly every district and neighborhood of the State, and effecting so many and such powerful interests, it could scarcely have been expected that the prosperity and welfare of the schools should not have been seriously and generally affected. A careful inspection of the returns herewith submitted will, however, show that while in some few respects the statistical tables compare unfavorably with those of preceding years, their general results demonstrate a steady, reliable and gratifying improvement. And now that a crisis so perilous to the interests and the advancement of our noble system of primary education, has been safely passed, and the irritating causes of complaint which induced it, effectually removed, we may not unreasonably look forward to an uninterrupted progression and expansion of this most important department of our free institutions.

The whole number of school districts in the State on the first day of July last was 11,479, of which 8,507 are composed of territory wholly situated in the respective towns in which the school-houses are located, and the remaining 2,972 are joint districts, comprehending portions of two or more towns. As the trustees of each of these latter districts are required to report to the town superintendents of each of the towns from portions of which the districts are composed, the number of parts of districts included in these reports is stated at 5,651. Returns in accordance with law have been received from 8,318 whole and 5,524 part districts, leaving 189 whole districts and 127 parts of districts only from which no reports have been received. Assuming, as has hitherto been customary, each of these joint districts to consist of territory situated in two towns, it will appear that reports have been received from 11,080 districts, leaving 399 from which no returns have been made.

The average period during which the schools were kept open, under the charge of duly qualified teachers, was seven months and seventeen days.

The whole number of children between the ages of 5 and 16 years, residing in the several districts, on the 31st of December, 1850, was 753,047; and the whole number of children reported by the Trustees as having been under instruction, for a longer or shorter period, during the year, was 726,291. From the more detailed statement, however, made up from teachers' lists of attendance for the different periods required to be stated for the information of the department, the accuracy of which may safely be relied upon, it appears that the whole number of children under instruction during the year was 800,430. Of this number, 7,037 were under instruction during the entire year; 43,306 for a period of ten months and less than twelve; 59,962 for eight months and less than ten; 110,981 for six months and less than eight; 170,005 for four months and less than six; 212,578 for two months and less than four, and 196,561 for a less period than two months.

The number of unincorporated Select and Private Schools within the limits of the several districts, during the year reported, was 2,277, and the number of pupils in attendance on such schools was 45,840.

The number of schools for colored children in the State is 105; and the number of children between the ages of 5 and 16 taught in said schools during the year reported, was 5,305.

The number of volumes in the several district libraries, on the 31st day of December, 1850, was 1,507,077, showing an increase during the year reported of 57,127 volumes.

Returns of the whole number of children between the ages of four and twenty-one years, residing in the State on the first day of August last, as required by the twelfth section of the act passed at the last session, have been received from only 46 of the 59 counties; and so defective are these returns which have been received, that it has been found impracticable to submit any estimate under this head in the present report. As the apportionment of public money among the several school districts will be made in accordance with the enumeration of such children, made on the 31st of December last, no injurious consequences can result from the omission to make the special returns required by the act referred to.

II. ESTIMATES AND EXPENDITURES OF SCHOOL MONEY.

The whole amount of public money received and expended by the several districts during the year embraced in the reports of the Trustees, for the payment of teachers' wages, was		$782,469 29
Raised by District tax under the provision of the act of 1849, for the same purpose,		385,836 53
Raised by rate bills voluntarily levied,		136,949 54
Local funds applicable to the same purpose,		20,117 66
		$1,325,373 02
In addition to this amount, the sum of		7,335 57
is reported as having been raised, (voluntarily, it is presumed,) to meet the expenses arising from the exemption of 1,254 children from rate bills; and as raised by District tax to supply deficiencies in rate bills made out previously to the act of 1849,		15,915 08
There was also paid for teachers' wages in colored schools, over and above public money applicable to said schools,		1,925 25
Adding these two items, the total expenditure for teachers' wages during the year reported will amount to		$1,350,345 92
Amount of public money expended for District Libraries,		89,104 96
Total amount for teachers' wages and libraries,		$1,439,650 88
The following additional sums were raised by District taxation for the purposes specified:
For purchasing School-house sites,		$58,855 91
For building School-houses,		125,913 36
For hiring School-houses,		6,439 00
For repairing School-houses,		79,183 55
For insuring School-houses,		5 153 29
For fuel,		71,455 51
For book-case, books and school apparatus		15,643 15
For other purposes,		82,520 51
Aggregate amount of expenditure for school purposes during the year,		$1,884,826 16
The whole amount of public money received from all sources, by the several Town Superintendents, during the year ending on the first day of July last, was		$1,052,923 70
Of which there has been apportioned for teachers' wages,	$854,422 33
For libraries,	95,698 50
		950,120 83
Leaving unappropriated,		$102,802 87

III. APPORTIONMENT OF STATE TAX AND ITS AVAILS.

By the 2d section of the "Act for the establishment of Free Schools throughout the State," passed at the last session of the Legislature, the sum of eight hundred thousand dollars was directed to be annually raised by tax on the real and personal property of the State for the support of Common Schools; as it was made the duty of the State Superintendent, on or before the tenth day of July, in each year, to apportion the amount thus directed to be raised among the several Counties of the State, according to the valuations of real and personal property therein, returned by the Assessors of the several towns and cities in accordance with the law, and to certify the amount thus apportioned to the Clerk of each County, whose duty it was made to lay the same before the Board of Supervisors of such County on the first day of its annual session. This apportionment was duly made and certified to the several County Clerks within the time drescribed by law; and an abstract thereof, containing the valuations of real and personal property of each County, and the share of the State tax apportioned to each, is herewith transmitted.

By the 4th section of the same act, the Superintendent of Common Schools was directed, on or before the first day of January in each year, to apportion and divide one-third of the aforesaid sum of eight hundred thousand dollars, together with one-third of all other moneys appropriated to the snpport of Common Schools, equally among the several School Districts; and to apportion the remaining two-thirds of both these funds, after making a specified provision for separate neighborhoods, composed of territory adjoining other States, among the several Counties, towns and cities of the State, according to the existing standard of apportionment of the School Money, on the basis of population as ascertained by the last preceding census. No returns having been made from separate neighborhoods, the whole amount of the State tax, and of the revenue arising from the Common School Fund, amounting in the aggregate to $1,100,000, has been appropriated in the mode prescribed by the act; the sum of $366,666 66 having been equally divided among the 11,479 Districts, (giving $31 94 to each,) and the remaining sum of $723,333 34 apportioned among the several counties, cities and towns in the ratio of the population of each, as ascertained by the United States Census of 1850, just completed. A table containing a full abstract of the sums apportioned and divided under each of these heads, is also appended to the present report.

Some further legislative action will, it is conceived, be necessary to enable the department to carry into full effect the existing provisions of law in reference to the application of these funds. The several amounts directed to be raised by tax in the respective counties, are required, when collected, to be paid over to the County Treasurer, and to be held by him "subject to the order of the State Superintendent." If these amounts correspond substantially with those apportioned to the County as its share of the State tax and School Fund combined, the transfer could easily be made; but as there is no definite relation between the sum raised upon, and the sum apportioned to, the several Counties, it becomes necessary that the avails of the former shall be concentrated in order to be re-distributed with the latter. The revenue of the Common School Fund is also required by law to be paid over by the State Treasurer, on the warrant of the Controller, on and after the first day of February, annually, to the several County Treasurers; but as no separate apportionment to this fund is required by the existing law to be made by this department, neither the County Treasurers nor the Controller have any means of ascertaining the shares due to the respective Counties. The State Superintendent might, it is true, order the avails of the State tax in each County to be paid into the State Treasury, whence the entire fund might be disbursed according to the apportionment made in accordance with law; and this would seem to be the most convenient and practicable mode of accomplishing the object in view. To authorize this, however, a specific appropriation of the fund to this purpose by the Legislature is necessary under the provisions of the Constitution, the Controller being prohibited from paying over any money from the State Treasury, except by a direct appropriation by law. Such an appropriation is therefore respectfully recommended, in season to enable the several County Treasurers to make their drafts by the first day of February ensuing, for the whole amount due their respective Counties.

Yankee Forethought.

An acquaintance of ours was up in Connecticut one day last winter, to visit a friend who was a manufacturer. The shaft of the manufacturer's water-wheel had been broken that afternoon, under the great accumulation of ice, and he was in great trouble, for he had searched long to find a suitable stick, and he knew not where to find another. If he could find one, it would be green, and unfit for use. Very early in the morning, while the day had scarcely drawned, the manufacturer and his guest were at the mill, to see what should be done.

A farmer, who lived two or three miles off, was already looking on. As the manufacturer looked painfully at his catastrophe, the farmer said: "Bad break that, Mister."

"Yes, very bad," said the manufacturer.

"Can't mend that stick, can you?" said the farmer.

"No," said the manufacturer, "and the worst of it is, I don't know where to get another."

"Well," said the farmer, "I thought that shaft would break, likely as not, some time or other, and I had a tree in my woods I thought would make a stick to suit you, and I cut it down and snaked it home, and it has been seasoning more than a year. So, when I heard your shaft was broken, I thought I'd come over and let you know."

"You're just the man I wanted to see," said the manufacturer, "if it was only light enough. How much do you ask for the stick, if it will suit me?"

"Oh! I'm sure 'twill suit you, or I shouldn't cut it down; and about the have price, I guess you and I can agree. It's a nice stick, you'll see, if you've a mind to come over."

It was some time before the farmer would set a price, but at last he guessed one hundred dollars would be about right.

"I'll come over and see it after breakfast," said the manufacturer. He did so, and told his visitor afterwards, that under the circumstances the stick was worth five hundred dollars to him. And are not such people able to take care of themselves?

The Air Rendered Visible.

The Paris correspondent of the Washington Republic says: "At the last sitting of the Academy of Sciences, a very remarkable paper was read. It was presented by a well-known engineer, M. Andraud, who has made many public experiments on compressed air, as a substitute for steam on railways. I give you a resume of the contents of this paper. It is entitled Æroscopie, or the Visibility of the Molecules of the Air. Some of the deductions made, in a medical point of view, are in the highest degree curious. M. Andraud proves, that, by a very simple contrivance, the air is rendered visible. By taking a piece of card, colored black, and piercing it with a fine needle, this interesting fact is established. If we look through this hole at the sky, on a fine day, or at a strong lamp, having a ground glass, we see a multitude of little transparent globes moving in the midst of confused nebulosities. These little globes, some of which are more transparent than others, are molecules of air. Some of them are surrounded with a kind of halo. These latter, says M. Andraud, are the elements of oxygen, whilst others are elements of azote. After continuing the observation for some time, we shall see small points detach themselves and disappear in falling; these, says M. Andraud, are atoms of carbon. This phenomenon of vision, it is essential to remark, passes within the eye itself; the molecules of air which are observed are those which float in the liquid which occupies the anterior part of that organ. According to the author of this paper, the discovery is not interesting merely as a phenomenon, but may be applied to important purposes in medicine. He says: 'The physician will one day make use of the æroscope as an important means of diagnosis. Vertigo, giddiness, which are the forerunners of apoplexy, will be announced by perturbation in the molecules. Fever always exists when the molecules under the action of a magnetic current circulate on a vertical ground—sometimes in one sense, and sometimes in another; and when this movement or gyration becomes more precipitate, the patient experiences the singular sensation of turning, as it were, upon a wheel of ixion.'"

Executions in Canton.

At a recent meeting of the Asiatic Society, the Secretary read a paper of great interest, by Mr. T. T. Meadows, translator to Her Britannic Majesty's Consulate in China, descriptive of the execution of 34 rebels, or bandits, which took place on the 30th July last. After a description of the place of execution, which was secured by a strongly guarded door, and after stating that more than 400 human beings have been put to death in the same place within the past eight months, Mr. Meadows states that he entered the place accompanied by two English residents at Canton, and found there a few of the lower officials. The only preparation visible was a cross, fixed up for the infliction of the highest legal punishment practiced in China—cutting up alive. There was a fire of fragrant sandal wood burning before the shed where the Mandarins sit to superintend the executions, in order to conceal the horrid stench arising from the decomposing heads remaining there. After waiting a considerable time, all the criminals were introduced, most of them walking to their places, but many carried in baskets, and tumbled out on the spot appointed for them, where they lay powerless, either from the excess of fear or from treatment inflicted during the trial and imprisonment. A man stood behind each criminal, and placed him in a kneeling position by grasping his hands, which were bound behind his back. In case of resistance, which happens very rarely, the criminal's queue is held by a second assistant, and dragged forward by force, so as to keep the neck extended. When all the criminals were placed in the required positions, the executioner seized a sabre with both hands, and proceeded to his work. In the present instance, the man was a mild-looking soldier, selected from the ranks of the army. The sword was a common sabre of three feet in length, and one of those employed on the occasion was laid on the Society's table. It appears that there is no official weapon required, for the officers of the army, anxious to "flesh their swords," send them for the purpose to the executioner, who has thus a sufficient supply for his most extensive operations. The number decapitated on the occasion described was 33; and the executioner took up a fresh sword as soon as he felt the edge of the one employed becoming dull, which was usually the case after cutting off two or three heads. When all was ready, the man stood firm, with his legs somewhat apart. On hearing the word "Pan" pronounced by the officer superintending, and after a sharp order, "Don't move!" he raised his sword straight up, and brought it rapidly down with the full strength of both arms, giving additional force to the blow by dropping his body perpendicularly to a sitting posture. The horrid task was soon done; after cutting off the head of one victim, the man threw himself, by a bound, into position by the side of the next; and in somewhat less than three minutes the whole 33 were headless—the head in every case but the first being completely severed at one blow. In three or four cases, where the criminals retained their full strength, the bodies, after decapitation, rose quite upright, and Mr. Meadows is satisfied that unless restrained by the man behind, they would have sprung into the air. When this part of the tragedy was over, the more horrible work of slow death was carried into effect upon the remaining criminal, who was bound to the cross mentioned above. He was a strongly-built man, apparently 40 years old, who had escaped in the first instance, but who had voluntarily surrendered himself to certain death in order to save from torture his wife and family, who had been seized by the Chinese Government, with the cruel policy usual on such occasions. In this instance, the flesh was cut from the forehead, breast, and extremities of the sufferer, with a short knife, which was on the table before the meeting; the body was immediately taken from the cross, and the head cut off. The duration of the punishment was about four or five minutes. The bodies were then packed up in coffins and carried away.

The Mormon Region in Iowa.

A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune, writing from Kanesville, Iowa, says:—

"This town is situated in a narrow valley among the Missouri Bluffs, about four miles from the river, and is quite a business place even in the winter. The place is full; many are here spending the winter, to be ready to go to California or Oregon in the spring. The Mormons are making active preparations to go to Salt Lake Valley. They have received from their leading men there imperative orders to emigrate to Salt Lake next season, if they can get there by any possible means. Deputations have been sent here from Salt Lake to assist and urge forward the people in their preparation to emigrate, and probably five or six thousand will emigrate thither in the spring. The improvements which the Mormons have made will very much facilitate the settlement of this part of Iowa. They have brought a good deal of land into cultivation, and much of it is well fenced: this they will sell for what it has cost them to break the prairie and inclose it. It is all Government land now, but will be brought into market next spring. The present occupants sell simply the improvements and claims. Surveyors are now out surveying the land preparatory to bringing it into market. The houses which the Mormons have built are miserable log cabins, designed only to serve them during their temporary sojourn. Kanesville has not more than two or three frame buildings, but doubtless may better buildings will be erected another season. This the most beautiful and best watered portion of the Western country; small but clear and beautiful streams are numerous, and they are quite rapid. There are no sluggish streams in this part of the State. Timber for building purposes is the great want in this portion of the State. Settlements are now being extended forty or fifty miles above this on the Missouri River, and forty miles below is a very prosperous colony from Northern Ohio."

The Courts in California.

Thomas C. Hambly, Esq., formerly of York, Pa., but now a resident of California, in a letter to the editor of The York Republican, speaking of professional visit to the town of Jackson, in Calaveras County, says:—

"Two courts were in session, the County and the District Courts. My case was in the County Court, before Judge Smith, and was disposed of at, I believe, the very table on which Collyer, the County Clerk, died, who was shot by this same Judge Smith, a few weeks ago, perhaps very excusably too. The counsel opposed to me, Gen. Anderson, a fine looking old gentlemen, was armed with a huge bowie knife, that hung like a broadsword by his side, and I was perhaps the only unarmed man in the body. The Judge had his Colt revolvers buckled on—the spectators had theirs—the grand jury, &c., and, as I said, the sheriff and his assistants, theirs. In fact, Colt's revolvers and raw brandy are a part of every day's dress. The County Court was held in the clerk's office, as the District Court occupied the Court-House. The latter was built of posts set in the ground—no windows—the collar beams a few inches higher than my head, one end of the house entirely open, and no floor but the earth (which was trampled into a deep dust) except four or five boards for the Judge to sit on. The building was about 25 feet long and about 15 wide. Yet in this simple building the most perfect order reigned. Everything transpired with dignity, and the law looked as much if not more majestic than in brick and mortar with granite pillars in front."

Gossip about Royalty.

Since the late visit of the Royal family to Balmoral, many anecdotes of Her Majesty have been told in the small dwellings of the mountaineers in the locality. A correspondent of the Banff (Scotland) Journal says:—"Taking a walk on the hills a day or two ago, I entered a small dwelling, where I had not been long entered before the inmates discovered me to be a Southron. Having acknowledged such to be the case, a long 'crack' followed; not only the departure of our beloved Victoria, but also her external habiliments, were discussed by male and female occupants with the most rigid exactness as to forms and appearance. They informed me, with expressions of surprise, that 'many a laird's daughter is more grandly dressed;' and then they repeated with great warmth, 'Aye, and she has nae pride either; for she enters a' the houses of the poor in the neighborhood of Balmoral; and should it happen to be diet time when she visits them, she always partakes of a small quantity of their homely fare, no matter how homely it be.' The old man assured me, that, on an occasion of her doing so, he himself was present, and had the dignified honor of handing bread and cheese to his sovereign, of which she partook most heartily. On expressing my astonishment, he continued, 'Aye, and that's no a'. She thinks naething, when she is out on her visits, o' making purchases in the shape of butter and eggs, and taking them home herself.' He informed me, that, in no few cases, the Royal table was furnished by dairy articles, not only purchased by herself, but taken home in her own hands."

$3,000 Reward.

TO MECHANICAL INVENTORS AND OTHERS.—In view of the many accidents occurring on Railroads, and with a desire to promote the safety and comfort of railway passengers, the undersigned proposes to offer for competition the following premiums:—

$1,500 for the best invention for preventing loss of life from collisions, and from the breaking of axles and wheels.

$800 for the best method of excluding dust from cars when in motion.

$400 for the best railroad brake.

$300 for the best sleeping or night seat for railroad cars.

The premiums will be open for competition from this date until the next annual Fair of the American Institute, where they are expected to be on exhibition, and no invention already introduced to the public will be entitled to compete for the prizes. It must be understood, that these inventions are to be such as can be adopted and put into general use, the inventors in all cases retaining their right to patents.

The above will be left to the decision of competent judges, appointed by a Committee of the American Institute, to whom all applications on the subject must be addressed.

Canine Sagacity.

A gentlemen, resident in Lincolnshire, was traveling about eighty or ninety miles from home, and left a favorite little dog at an hotel while he visited another town in the neighborhood. On his return, the landlady, in dismay, told him his dog had been attacked by a large dog of her own, and had run away from the house. He left; but returned again to the same hotel, after the lapse of a few weeks; when the landlady informed him that his little dog had returned in the interim, accompanied by a large dog, who had attacked her own dog so fiercely that he had nearly killed him. From the description given of the animal, the gentleman entertained no doubt but that it was his own house-dog from Lincolnshire; and on his return home he learned from the servants, that shortly after his departure, his little favorite dog returned one day, bearing marks of much ill-usage, and, after apparently consulting with the larger animal, the two dogs set off together, and were absent several days; presenting evidences on their return, of having traveled a considerable distance.

Variety.

The Galena (Ill.) Advertiser states, that Mr. Hester has finished a daguerreotype for a gentleman in that city, in which the metallic appearance of the plate is wholly destroyed, and its place supplied by a background as agreeable to the eye as India paper. At first glance, says the Advertiser, the picture looks like a fine line engraving, but the second shows you that there is, if not a grace, a delicacy of touch and penciling beyond the reach of art. This picture, unlike any other daguerreotype the editor of that paper has examined, can be seen, like a painting or drawing, from any angle, the metallic tints being destroyed.

When the library in the Capitol was in flames, and clouds of smoke were rolling out and enveloping the building, Chief Justice Taney, of the Supreme Court, appeared in his seat at the usual hour, looking quite tranquil and undisturbed. "May it please your Honor," said an officer of the Court, "will the Court sit to-day?" The Chief Justice looked up, and coolly and significantly asked, "Is the court-room really on fire?" "Oh no, not yet," was the answer. "Then we'll sit till it is," added the Chief. And the Court did sit, and transacted business as usual, amid all the confusion about it.

The Boston papers describe a new bank security, called the Chronometer Lock, now on exhibition in that city. The lock in fastening is set by a scale at the number of hours required, the door then closed, and cannot be again opened until the time expires, unless the works should stop, in which case it may be unfastened by means of the said improvement, the same not operating at any other time, either to cause the movement to stop or allow the door to be opened while it is in operation.

Mr. Montague, editor and publisner of the Pittsfield Eagle, has invented a power-press, on which he now prints his paper. We understand it will print 2,000 sheets the hour, the forms being fastened in an upright position, and the impression given by a cylinder. It may be worked by steam or hand-power, and can be made at a cost of $650 for single cylinders, and $750 for double cylinders.

The Illinois coal-mines are near the surface, much more so than most of the English, many of which require excavation to an immense depth; the English coal-mines abound with water, and the pump is always going; the Illinois coal-mines are comparatively dry. From all this, it results that the Illinois mines are worked at a far less cost. The quality of the coal improves as the mine is dug deeper.

Mr. John Henderson, one of the contractors for erecting the Crystal Palace, and the originator of that most beautiful part of it, the transept, came to London a very young man, without a shilling in his pocket, having performed the feat of walking from Perthshire (nearly five hundred miles) in fourteen days; and has raised himself entirely to his position by industry, perseverance, and ability.

A cultivator of fruit, whose example is referred to in the New England Farmer, keeps a circle of several feet about every tree clear of grass, and enriches with chip-manure, bones, ashes, and other fertilizing substances. He has large crops of excellent fruit, which bring him more money than any of the neighboring farmers obtain from all their crops.

"Coup d'Etat" literally means "Stroke of State"—any violent usurpation by a government or ruler of illegal powers, is a coup d'etat.

THE FIFTH EDITION OF

New-York; Past, Present, and Future,

THE Academic Year commences the last Wednesday in August, and closes the last Tuesday in June of each year.

Board of Instruction.

Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress.
Rev. J. W. MORTON, } Assistants.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, }

The Terms for 1851 and 1852 are as follows:—
The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.
" Second " Dec. 3 " " March 16.
" Third " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one of two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term, Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.

Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS.

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00
Drawing,	1 00
Monochromatic Painting	3 00
Oil Painting,	5 00
Writing and Stationery,	0 50
Vocal Music, Elementary,	1 00
Advanced Class,	2 00
Instrumental Music,	8 00

Use of Organ or Piano, $2 00 per quarter.

BOARD, in private families, per week, from $1 25 to $1 50; in clubs, from 60 to 90 cents.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall Term, and at the middle of the Winter Term, and continue seven weeks. The course will embrac a thorough review of the common school branches, with daily lectures on "The Art of Teaching," Chemistry, Physiology, Laws of Health, School Laws, &c., &c. Tuition $2 50.

Students should not be furnished with unnecessary pocket-money, neither should minors be allowed to contract debts in the village. Either member of the Faculty will superintend the financial affairs of pupils placed under their care, by special direction from parents and guardians, if funds are furnished in advance.

THE SABBATH & THE RESURRECTION.

From "An Examination of the Authority for a Change of the Weekly Sabbath at the Resurrection of Christ; proving that the Practice of the Church in substituting the First Day of the Week for the appointed Seventh Day, is unsanctioned by the New Testament Scriptures. By JAMES A. BEGG. Author of a Connected View of the Scripture Evidence of Christ's Speedy Return, &c." [Continued.

A very special interest have we in Christ's Resurrection; for "if the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead, dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies, by His Spirit that dwelleth in you." Rom. viii. 11. Christ, in His Resurrection, stands not alone. "He is the Head of the body, the Church; who is the beginning, the first-born from the dead; that in all things He might have the preeminence." Col. i. 18. For "God hath both raised up the Lord, and will also raise up us, by His own power." 1 Cor. vi. 14. "We also believe, and therefore speak; knowing that He which raised up the Lord Jesus, shall raise up us also by Jesus, and shall present us with you." 2 Cor. iv. 13, 14. "Therefore we are buried with Him, by baptism, into death; that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life. For if we have been planted together in the likeness of His death, we shall be also in the likeness of His resurrection." Rom. vi. 4, 5. "God, who is rich in mercy, for His great love wherewith He loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ, (by grace ye are saved;) and hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus; that in the ages to come He might show the exceeding riches of His grace, in His kindness toward us, through Jesus Christ." Eph. ii. 4—7. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to His abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively hope, by the resurrection of Christ Jesus from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time." 1 Peter. i. 3—5.

The ordinance of first-fruits, as we have remarked, was given to Israel in the Wilderness, an intimation or assurance of God's purpose to bring them to the promised land, and give them the harvest in its season. Not until they should have come thither were they to observe it. So also are we gladdened now with the promise of a glorious resurrection, made sure to those who believe, by the earnest enjoyed in Christ. But it is not till our wilderness state shall have passed away. "A better country, that is, an heavenly," "an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away," is in reserve for us. Our title is secure; and we enter into possession at the same time as those who have died before, "God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect." Heb. xi. 16, 40; 1 Peter i. 4. Christ will come, and receive us unto Himself. A harvest there will be; but "the harvest is the end of the world, [or, of the age,] and the reapers are the angels." Matt. xiii. 39. When the Son of man shall come in a cloud, with power and great glory, "He shall send His angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together His elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." Luke xxi. 27; Matt. xxiv. 30, 31. John prophetically descried that day, "and behold a white cloud, and upon the cloud one sat, like unto the Son of Man, having on His head a golden crown, and in His hand a sharp sickle. And another angel came out of the temple crying with a loud voice to Him that sat on the cloud, Thrust in thy sickle, and reap; for the time is come for thee to reap; for the harvest of the earth is ripe. And He that sat on the cloud thrust in His sickle on the earth; and the earth was reaped." Rev. xiv. 14—17.

Herein, then, is the importance of Christ's resurrection, that "now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the First-Fruits of them that slept. For since by man came death, by Man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order; Christ, THE FIRST-FRUITS; afterward, they that are Christ's at His coming. Then cometh the end, when He shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father." 1 Cor. xv. 20—24. Thus His resurrection is the earnest, and the pledge, of our own. Why, then, must the gladdening scene, thus brought into view, be overlooked or perverted. An important place, indeed, truly belongs to Christ's resurrection. God raised Him from the dead, and set Him at His own right hand, and gave Him glory, that our faith and our hope might be in Him.

Israel's right-hearted men rejoiced, as from the field the sheaf was gathered, that sanctified their yearly harvest. All were interested in the offering, and distant cities had present their representatives on the occasion. Jerusalem was joyous, as, publicly, in grateful procession, the sheaf was borne through her streets, toward the Temple of the Lord. By the very manner of presentation, the First-Fruits, being waved to and fro, and lifted up, in name of all the after-fruits still remaining in the fields, the worshipers were reminded of the connection existing between the two. The acceptance of the oblation removed the hindrance to the entire harvest being reaped, nay, gave assurance that the whole would, in due time, be gathered in. Previously, neither bread, nor parched corn, nor green ears, could lawfully be used; but the command of God to His people was, that the consecrating First-Fruits of the harvest should be brought to the priest, and be waved by him before the Lord, "to be accepted for you."

That natural sheaf and harvest were designed, and were well adapted, to foreshow the more important relation subsisting between the Redeemer and those he came to redeem—primarily, between "Christ, the First-Fruits," and "they that are Christ's, at His coming." He was raised from the dead, and accepted for us. The full harvest, thus consecrated, by His Resurrection, will, in due time, follow. As if to furnish additional evidence of the meaning, and give farther assurance of its future fulfillment in regard to the whole, part of that spiritual harvest followed immediately, we might almost say prematurely, the reaping of the true Sheaf. In the account of His death, we read that "the graves were opened; and many bodies of the saints which slept arose, and came out of the graves after His Resurrection, and went into the holy city, and appeared unto many." Matt. xxvii. 52, 53. To those enlightened rightly to discern the relationship, each of these arisen saints, a part of the spiritual harvest, would be a witness to the fact that Christ was indeed risen from the dead—that saint's own Resurrection having depended thereupon.

These witnesses, ransomed from the grave, "appeared unto many;" but the acceptance of the true sanctifying Sheaf must be well attested. A harvest field, wide as the world, and of the duration of an age, was dependent upon it; and, therefore, during, yea, beyond, the forty days of His continuance among men, ample testimony was afforded. The great Apostle of the Gentiles, writing to a Gentile church, which might not be perfectly familiar with the instructive type, sets before them, in the language we have quoted, its important meaning. But he introduces that argument concerning the Resurrection, derived from the resurrection of our Lord, by recounting evidence in certification of the truth that Christ indeed, "was buried, and that He rose again the third day, according to the Scriptures." It was established by the personal evidence of many. "He was seen of Cephas, then of the Twelve; after that He was seen of above five hundred brethren at once; of whom the greater part remain unto this present, but some are fallen asleep. After that, He was seen of James, then of all the Apostles. And, last of all, He was seen of me also, as of one born out of due time." 1 Cor. xv. 3—8.

This enumeration, large as it is, does not include absolutely the whole number of witnesses, neither does it specify the occasions on which Christ was seen. There is no note here taken of the women at the tomb, of the disciples on the way to Emmaus, or of the manner in which the unbelieving Thomas "after eight days" was convinced. Nor are we furnished with much information of the nature or circumstances of His intercourse with the disciples during the period between His resurrection and ascension, "to whom also He showed Himself alive after His passion, by many infallible proofs, being seen of them forty days, and speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God." (Acts i. 3.) That intercourse does not, however, seem to have been continuous, as it was before His death. "Eight days" elapsed between the first and second meeting with the disciples generally at Jerusalem. (John xx. 10, 26.) Having given the account of that meeting, the Evangelist, after the intimation that "many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples," which are not written in his book, proceeds next to give account of the manner in which "after these things, Jesus showed Himself again to the disciples at the sea of Tiberias," while they were engaged in their avocation as fishermen, and which therefore was not upon a Sabbath. John xx. 26—31; xxi. 1—22. This is the interview of which we have the fullest account; and concerning it John adds, "This is now the third time that Jesus showed Himself to His disciples, after that He was risen from the dead." Ver. 14. The manner in which Paul also tells of His being so repeatedly "seen," seems to imply, that the privilege was limited to occasional sudden and unexpected appearances. In these may not we perceive the antitypical waving of "Christ, the First-Fruits?" There is such an evident accordance in so many particulars as may surely lead us to doubt whether so remarkable and prominent a circumstance, in the manner of presenting the typical oblation, had not some correspondence with what took place in the acknowledged acceptance of our glorious Head and Lord. Paul, by the manner in which he connects, in his argument, Christ's appearances with the intimation of His being our First-Fruits, seems to intimate this relation. 1 Cor. xv. 3—8, 20—24. On such a point, however, we need not insist.

But, surely, we are now entitled to inquire, What, or where, in all the History of the Saviour's Resurrection, is there any intimation, or indication, of a change of the weekly Sabbath? It may be true, that the Evangelists, speaking of "one day after the Sabbaths," and Matthew, intimating that the tomb was sealed in the evening, late or at the close of Sabbaths, do include the weekly Sabbath; but in doing so, what intimation, obvious or obscure, have they made of a purposed alteration of the Fourth Commandment? There is not a word of any such design in the accounts given by the Evangelists; (who all wrote some time subsequently;) neither is there any thing in the events related by them which can imply it. The Resurrection of Christ had relation to types in no way dependent upon the particular days of the week, but which were regulated entirely by the month, and days of the month. Even if the typical day of first-fruits fell that year upon the weekly Sabbath, and that Christ was then in the tomb, the Sabbath would no more be affected thereby than it was by the law which commanded circumcision to be performed on the eighth day, even if that should be the Sabbath also. [To be continued.

THE WAN REAPERS.

BY MRS. E. C. JUDSON.

I came from a land where a beautiful light
  Is slow creeping o'er hill-top and vale,
Where broad is the field, and the harvest is white,
  But the reapers are haggard and pale.

All wasted and worn with their wearisome toil,
  Still they pause not, that brave little band,
Though soon their low pillows must be the strange soil
  Of that distant and grave-dotted strand.

For dangers uncounted are clustering there;
  The pestilence stalks uncontrolled;
Strange poisons are borne on the soft, languid air,
  And lurk in each leaf's fragrant fold.

There the rose never blooms on fair woman's wan cheek,
  But there's a beautiful light in her eye,
And the smile that she wears is so loving and meek,
  None can doubt it comes down from the sky.

There the strong man is bowed in his youth's golden prime,
  But he cheerily sings at his toil,
For he thinks of his sheaves, and the garnering-time,
  Of the glorious Lord of the soil.

And ever they turn, that brave, wan little band,
  A long, wistful gaze on the west—
"Do they come, do they come from that dear distant land,
  That land of the lovely and blest?

"Do they come? do they come? Oh, we're feeble and wan,
  And we're passing like shadows away;
But the harvest is white, and lo! yonder the dawn!
  For laborers—for laborers we pray!" [Macedonian.

THE WAR OF ARMAGEDDON.

The study of the prophecies of Scripture, to aid our understanding of passing events, may be uninteresting to some; but to the believer and Bible student, it cannot fail to be interesting. It enables us to discover the hand of God in all that takes place in the physical as well as in the moral world or civil condition of society.

In my last communication, I took occasion to say, that the present agitation of the nations of Europe is the preparation or commencement—I might with equal propriety have said, the progress—of the war of "Armageddon." And I might have been expected to give my reasons for this assertion. Perhaps these may not be as satisfactory to others as to myself. The signification of the term Armageddon is, doubtless, expressive of a characteristic truth or fact, and it implies the "mountain of the gospel, or his precious fruit;" indicating, that where the war or battle is waged, the gospel and its principles prevail, or preponderate.

Here the question arises, Who are the parties to the war? On the one side, according to Rev. 12: 13, 14, are "the kings of the earth, and the whole world," of different religions or faith, gathered together to battle. They are instigated by the spirits of devils, proceeding out of the mouth of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet, or, according to common understanding of the figures, Paganism, Romanism, and Mohammedism. Among these kings, as described in the next chapter, are the "ten kings," which were the horns of the beast, and these make war with the Lamb, and the Lamb shall overcome them, for he is Lord of lords, and King of kings, and they that are with him (his forces) are called, and chosen, and faithful. These are arrayed on the other side. We observe, therefore, that the parties are the despots of the world, striving to perpetuate their power, and the forces of the Lamb to oppose their pretensions. The place is in the mountain of the gospel, and the Lamb shall overcome them.

After noticing the foregoing description, in the Apocalypse, we will turn to the consideration of the same subject as described by the prophet Daniel. After explaining the vision of the image, he interprets the feet and toes of the image, to the understanding of historians, to be the ten kingdoms into which the Roman monarchy was divided, which correspond in number and relation to Rome with those of the Apocalypse. This being the case, the descriptions are parallels. The stone cut out of the mountain [probably of the Gospel] without hands, represents the forces of the Lamb, and the result is the same—they overcome the monarchies of the world. It smites the image in the feet of iron and clay, partly strong and partly broken, and it falls, and is utterly demolished, and the stone becomes a mountain, and fills the whole world. As to whether these passages are intended to describe one and the same conflict, I think there can be but little doubt.

The time in which this conflict or war is to take place, is not so important, since it is in the days of those kingdoms, into which Rome was divided, that the kingdom of the stone was to be set up. This kingdom is to acquire strength—to become "forces"—and the image yet stands. Of course the conflict has not transpired. These kingdoms have been a thousand years, perhaps, in existence; and until the last century stood perhaps as firmly as they did in the dark ages. The right of despots to control the destinies of men was never questioned; and the capacity of the people for self-government, or the principle of civil and religious liberty, equality, and fraternity, was never entertained. Within the last century the question has been raised, and the problem solved; liberal principles are extending themselves over the world; but they are successful only where the Gospel principles of justice and equality have been diffused—in no case where Republics have been allied to Rome.

The present state of despotic governments resembles the dilapidated condition of the image of clay and iron—in a state of ruin. And the progress of liberal principles threatens to strike the blow that will demolish them. Can the fulfillment of prophecy be more completely in conformity with the prediction than these passing events up to the present time.

I think a reasonable doubt can not be entertained of the nature of the conflict, of the character of the combatants, or of the result. If it is literally the monarchs of the world and the people that are described, the conflict must also be literal. The triumph will literally be achieved, and the consequences literal war and conflicts, carnage and blood.

An objection will be raised, that the Gospel admits of no such contest—that its conflicts are moral, and not physical—that its triumphs are spiritual, not carnal—and that the Prince of peace leads no force to war. I leave the consideration of these objections to those who are better skilled in spiritualizing than I profess to be.

The Scriptures describe this conflict as terrible beyond all precedent in the experience of the world. Joel (chap. 3: 10) says, "Beat your plough-shares into swords, and your pruning-hooks into spears; let the weak say, I am strong." "Multitudes, multitudes, in the valley of decision; for the day of the Lord is near, in the valley of decision." I will not multiply thoughts on the details of this conflict, but will merely suggest, that when the war shall have transpired, the victory been achieved, God will have the honor, and peace and security will follow, as a matter of course, the triumph of justice and gospel principle. Christian brotherhood will then become national. Then will be witnessed peace on earth and good will toward men.

It cannot be expected, that every movement made in the name liberty is destined to be successful, or subserve the great object of human advancement. There are two principles in human government, and they are antagonistic. The one is for the support and gratification of rulers—the other for the interest and happiness of the people, who govern and rule themselves. Despotism is confined to no form of government. If self-aggrandizement at the expense of the liberty and happiness of the people predominates, it may as well exist in Republics as in other forms of government; as is the case in France, and the Republics of this continent—perhaps with the exception of the United States. In this country, though cleft from the feet of the image, and containing the iron as well as the clay in its composition, the principles of Protestant Christianity here in a degree predominate, and the principle of progress in reform is secured, so that we may hope it will arrive at the climax of human government without a mortal struggle. Failure is generally ascribed to the want of intelligence; but if the prophetic figures we have named are to be relied on, or the examples of revolutions in the name of liberty be observed, we must add also the principles of Christian virtue, and religious freedom, as well as civil liberty, which is only understood by Protestant Christians, as necessary to the triumph of rational liberty promised in the Bible. If this be also true, an additional duty devolves on the friends of humanity, so to diffuse instruction on civil and religious matters, as to shorten the conflict, and lighten the sufferings, as well as secure the consummation. J. M.

For the Sabbath Recorder.

COVENANT MEETINGS:

Who should attend them?—When should they be held?

I am accustomed to regard Conference Meetings as being among the most important of religious assemblies. Their object, if I understand it, is to accomplish what the apostle contemplated when he exhorted the disciples to "speak often one to another," to "exhort each other," and not to "neglect the assembling of themselves together." The same thing is also contemplated when he says, "Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly, in all wisdom, teaching and admonishing one another in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord." Meetings for conference and praise were frequent among the early Christians. From example and precept they are obligatory upon the children of God of the present day. They are founded on a principle in our nature. Among these are what our denomination styles Covenant Meetings. It is my purpose to enforce a duty which is plainly commanded in the Scriptures, viz. attending these meetings.

My first inquiry shall be, Who should attend these covenant meetings? First, then, is not the minister, stationed as he is, the watchman on the walls of Zion, obligated to attend? Does not the very nature of his calling demand it of him? Do not his people look up to him for an example? Will they not be likely to neglect them if he does? To all these questions I unhesitatingly reply in the affirmative. The universal experience of our church agrees with me. A minister may flagelate his people till he is weary, and if he does not conform example to precept, his preaching will surely fall powerless to the ground. Notwithstanding the plainness of this duty, still there are some ministers in our denomination who neglect it habitually. Let such ministers solemnly ask themselves if this is right. Deacons should attend, for similar reasons. Parents should attend, that their example may be right before their children. Children should attend, that they may be fed with "the sincere milk of the word." All should attend, because all may be highly benefited, and the interests of the church indefinitely promoted.

My next inquiry shall be, When is the best time to hold these meetings? This may seem a strange question. Has not the best time long been established? says one. I answer, It is questionable. I have long believed, that the reason why these meetings have been so much neglected, in some churches, is that they are held at an inconvenient time; that is, the day before the Sabbath, when all are naturally hurried with their work, it being a preparation day for the Sabbath. This, therefore, is absolutely the worst time for people to leave their business to attend. It seems to me that some other time could be selected which would be more convenient. I would be in favor of merging the meetings into our communion seasons. This arrangement would secure a much larger attendance, and the influence would be more widely extended. If such an arrangement were made, it would become necessary for the minister to omit preaching to give time for all. I would also have each member of the church called upon, and none excused from telling their feelings and trials on the subject of religion. By this arrangement, I think a much better state of religious feeling might be kept up in the church, and the world more effectually rebuked, than under the present arrangement. I submit this to the consideration of all lovers of Christ's kingdom on earth. MATHETES.

GEORGE WHITEFIELD.

A writer in the Christian Intelligencer, in an interesting communication upon Whitefield and the Wesleys, of their times and seasonable appearance, gives the following sketch of Whitefield's early days, and the effect of his preaching:—

He was an eminently gifted man; it is a question whether the world ever produced a man in whom all the attributes of eloquence were more equally blended, or in greater plenitude. The qualities of the orator made up his whole genius; they were among the first manifestations of his childhood; in his single soul was pent up a whole magazine of energies which, the moment they were kindled by the influence of religion, burst forth like the fires of a volcano, which nothing could resist. He had learned much of the Wesleys, and himself had earnestly sought and learned of Jesus Christ. But with all these gifts, who was he, and how was he raised up? He was the son of an inn-keeper of no great estate. He struggled with poverty; but his genius flashed forth, in the direction for which nature had formed it. Throughout his whole boyhood, his mind was filled with ministerial anticipations; and "while washing mops and cleaning rooms as a common drawer" in the tavern, he wrote two or three sermons! Such was his poverty, that he struggled hard to obtain his education by being a servitor at Oxford. Here he became acquainted with the Wesleys, and, joining with them, was one of the most rigid members of the Methodist Club. His powers of address were overwhelming; and had he combined with these the contriving powers of Wesley, he would have been considered the Augustine or even Chrysostom of modern times. But his attempts at legislation were failures, and his writings were so far from upholding his professional reputation, that Dr. Franklin told him he ought not to write at all. He was a man of boundless zeal. He was a host of sympathies. His very soul was passion. His whole course, and particularly his religious experience, showed the prevalence of mighty feelings. "God only knows," said he, "how many nights I have lain upon my bed groaning under what I felt. Whole days and weeks have I spent in lying prostrate on the ground, in silent or vocal prayer." It was this strong sensibility that gave such power to his preaching, and became the irresistible magic that drew the multitudes after him. Under his first sermon, says a late writer, it was reported to the Bishop of Gloucester that fifteen persons were driven mad; that is to say, were converted to God. His popularity was immediate and boundless. Speaking of one place, said he, "The whole city seemed alarmed, and the doctrine of the new birth made its way like lightning into the consciences of the hearers."

When he visited Bristol, multitudes came out of the city on foot and in coaches to escort him, and the people hailed him as he passed along the streets. The numbers that crowded to hear him were so great, that he could with difficulty make his way to the pulpit. "Some hung upon the rails of the organ-loft, others climbed upon the leads of the church, and altogether, made the church so hot with their breath, that the steam would fall from the pillars like drops of rain. Sometimes, after his preaching, the multitude, little children and old men, went home weeping and wailing through the streets.

When he visited Scotland the second time, the people crowded to the shore at Leith, weeping and blessing him; they pursued his coach to Edinburgh, pressing to welcome him when he alighted, and to hold him in their arms." We have it from authority, that the effect which he produced was maddening. At Cambuslang it was incredible. "I preached at two," says he, "to a vast body of people, and at six in the evening, and again at nine. Such a commotion surely was never heard of, especially at eleven at night. For about an hour and a half there was such weeping, so many falling into deep distress, and expressing it in so many various ways, as is incredible. The people seemed to be slain by scores. They carried off and came into the house like soldiers wounded in and carried off a field of battle. Their cries and agonies are exceedingly affecting. Mr. M. preached after I had ended, till past one in the morning, and then could scarcely persuade them to retire; all night in the fields might be heard the voice of prayer and praise. On returning to administer the sacrament, scarce ever was such a sight seen in Scotland. There were upward of twenty thousand persons. Two tents were set, and the holy sacrament was administered in the field. When I began to serve at one of the tables, the power of God was felt by numbers; but the people crowded upon me so that I was compelled to desist, and go and preach at one of the tents while the ministers served the rest of the tables. On Monday morning I preached again to near as many; such a universal stir I never saw before. The emotion fled as swift as lightning from one end of the auditory to the other. You might have seen thousands bathed in tears, some at the same time wringing their hands, others crying out and moaning over a pierced Saviour." So great was the effect of Whitefield's preaching, that the cool-headed Scotch divines were taken by surprise, and wrote a pamphlet to prove that they were diabolical, and actually appointed a day of fasting for his being in Scotland.

TELLING JESUS.

"Things always go smoothly with you," said a complaining disciple to Mr. F. "I never hear you make any complaints."

"I have found out an effectual way of guarding against that fault," said Mr. F.

"I did not know that you ever had any reason to complain."

"I don't know that I ever had; but I used to find myself doing it, until one day, in reading the Bible, I came across this: 'The apostles gathered themselves unto Jesus, and told him all things, both what they had done and what they had taught.' It occurred to me that, when I had any trouble, before I told any one I should first tell Jesus. And I found, on trial, that if I told him first, I seldom had any occasion to tell any body else. I often find the burden entirely removed while I am in the act of telling him about it, and trouble which has its burden removed is no longer trouble."

"We ought to pray for deliverance from our trials; but Jesus needs no information respecting them. He is omnipotent, and has no need that any thing be told him."

"That is true, and yet he listened with complacency and kindness when his disciples told him all things. In his sympathizing condescension, he permits us to repeat to him our troubles, cares and joys, though he knows them all. He listens to them with interest; just as the tender father listens to the narrative of his child, though it conveys no information. And he has connected great blessings with this exercise of filial confidence. It lessens one's sorrows, and doubles joys, and increases faith and love. The more assiduously we cultivate an intimate acquaintance with the Saviour, the greater will be our happiness, and the more rapid our progress toward heaven. If we should make it a rule to go to Jesus every night, and tell him all the events of the day, all that we have purposed, and felt, and said, and done, and suffered, would it not have a great influence on our conduct during the day? It certainly would. The thought that we should have to tell Jesus about it, would restrain us from many an unholy act. We could not willfully indulge in what caused the agonies of the garden and the cross, if we were to make it the subject of conversation with him before committing ourselves to slumber."

"It seems to me, that for me to tell him all my experience, would be occupying his attention with trifles; I should have nothing but sin and folly to tell him."

"Sin and folly are no trifles; and the way to get a right view of the evil of sin is, to speak it out before him in our confidential intercourse with him. You may depend upon it, my brother, that if you will go to Jesus every night, and tell him things that have occurred during the day, it will speedily lift you above the world. It will do much towards making the will of Christ your guiding, governing principle. It will enable you to bear your crosses without repining. It will make you in mind and temper like him with whom you hold this most intimate communion. O, that all Christians were in the habit of closing the day by going to Jesus, and telling him all the things that they have done, and omitted to do, during the day!" [Christian Miscellany.

ANOTHER KOSSUTH.

One of the most devoted and successful Protestant pastors in Bohemia, at the present time, is Rev. Frederick William Kossuth. He is said to be nearly related to the Governor of Hungary. In 1846, he undertook to gather a church of Bohemian Protestants at Prague, the scene of the labor of the Bohemian martyrs, Jerome and John Huss. Several converts were made from among the Papists previous to the year 1848. The revolutions of that year gave religious liberty to the Austrians, and Kossuth availed himself of the precarious boon. His preaching place was soon crowded, and hundreds of Papists became converts to his doctrine. In 1849, he commenced a periodical by the name of The Herald of the Bohemian Brethren, which soon attracted the notice of the Government, and was suppressed.

Very severe opposition, of course, has been excited on the part of the Papal priesthood. They have denounced him in terms the most bitter and uncompromising; setting him forth as the real Antichrist, and publishing the most absurd calumnies against him, so as to provoke the insults of the mob and to crush him as their fathers did the Bohemian martyrs. But they could not arrest the progress of the truth. His congregation numbered, last July, (as we learn from a correspondent of Count Valerian Krasinski at Prague,) eleven hundred souls, of whom seven hundred are converts from Popery, including three priests. At that time, he had purchased an old Hussite church, (which had been shut up since the year 1620,) for £2,750, of which sum he had, with great pains, collected and paid £600. The remainder was to be paid in annual installments of £300. It will be remembered that after the battle on the Wiessenberg near Prague, in 1620, "the Brethren were subjected to all manner of persecutions, their ministers banished, their churches closed, and they themselves, in 1624, expelled the country." Blessings on the man who labors for the restoration of those ancient sanctuaries! [New York Evangelist.

JUGGERNAUT'S HOUSEHOLD.—The "establishment" connected with the great temple of Juggernaut, in India, is immense. It includes thirty-six different kinds of offices, some of which are subdivided into several more. About 648 persons are required to fill the appointments, a few of which are the following: The one who puts Juggernaut to bed, the one who wakes him, the one who gives him water and a tooth-pick, the painter to paint his eyes, an officer to give him rice, and another to give him pan, one to wash his linen, one to count his robes, one to carry his umbrella, and one to tell him the hours of worship. Besides these, there are 4000 cooks, 120 dancing-girls, and 800 priests, many of whom are exceedingly rich.

LIBERTY OF OPINION.

While we have ever discarded the Utopian project of bringing all sorts of Christians together in one communion, whatever their varieties of belief, we are free to confess our strong aversion to that rigidness which demands uniformity of faith in a multiplicity of articles. We know no good reason why a church should frame a system of doctrine in some forty or fifty articles, and then require each of its members to subscribe to it on pain of excommunication. There is no account of any such course being taken by the primitive churches organized under the immediate supervision of the Apostles; and it is not probable, that the conditions of membership in them embraced any thing more than faith in Jesus Christ as the Son of God, and the observance of the institutions of the gospel.

We do not mean to intimate, by these remarks, that uniformity of views is not highly desirable. We are well convinced, that the genius of Christianity requires its disciples to be "perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment;" and any departure from this requisition, which leads to "envying, and strife, and divisions," shows that they are "carnal, and walk as men." 1 Cor. 1: 10 and 3: 3. It appears to us, however, that even in the primitive churches the Apostles did not contemplate a perfect coalescence of views on all points, from the beginning. The Church at Rome was expressly commanded to receive into fellowship "him that was weak in the faith," and not to make his unpreparedness to receive the creed of those who had grown stronger a matter of "disputation." Rom. 14: 1. In fact, the oneness contemplated seems to have been love for one another as the redeemed of Christ. Col. 3: 14. In the exercise of this love, they were expected to bear one another's burdens, to be kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, to compare their differences of opinion together in the spirit of meekness, to abstain from judging one another; in short, to keep it constantly in mind, that "the kingdom of God is righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost;" and that "whoever in these things serveth Christ, is acceptable to God, and approved of men." This was the pattern shown on Mount Sion, in the Jerusalem Church, where "the multitude of them that believed were of one heart, and of one soul." Acts 4: 32.

But we have no doubt that the Apostles contemplated the perfect coalescence of believers ultimately. Discrepancy of views cannot consist with a regular increase of knowledge. Babes in Christ may be unable to grasp the stronger points of doctrine; for the child will understand as a child, and think as a child. But as the child approximates the man, he puts away his childish views, and coincides more nearly with those who are 'perfect.' 1 Cor. 2: 6. No attentive reader can overlook the fact, that the Apostles earnestly enjoin a continued progress in knowledge, and that they highly censure those who are always lingering at the first elements. The ultimate perfection of believers in knowledge is kept steadily in view, and those who do not aim at it are regarded as indirectly countenancing schism in the body of Christ. The bringing about of this perfection, however, seems to be considered the work of the ministry, by the unceasing instruction it gives the church. Eph. 4: 12—16. A discrepancy of views, to some extent, is supposed to exist among those embraced in the same communion—a discrepancy very undesirable, it is true, as is evident from the expressions in which the Apostle sets forth the evil of it—but one grand object of instituting the ministry was to extinguish this discrepancy, and eventually bring the whole body, "in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ." An enlightened and faithful ministry is, therefore, a more scriptural, and consequently a more certain, method of bringing about uniformity of views, than any written creed embracing a great multiplicity of articles.

Such being our sentiments, we have always thought that difference of opinion on doctrinal points, not involving vital piety nor any difference of practice, ought not to be made a barrier to church fellowship. Calvinistic as we are, we know that there are thousands who hold the Arminian doctrine in all its rankness, upon whom Christ has stamped his own image. Notwithstanding we repudiate their doctrine, we love them as brethren, and can cheerfully sit down with them to commemorate the dying love of Him who bore the sins of us both; nor do we consider that, in so doing, we are chargeable with endorsing their views. "Who art thou that judgest another?" If God has received him, it is not for us to reject him. If God receives him in spite of his doctrine, we ought to do so too; and if God receives him with his doctrine, let us not make ourselves doubly guilty by rejecting him and his doctrine too.

We cannot say, however, but what there is some practical difficulty attending our scheme. Theoretically, we have no doubts of its correctness, and it ought to become a practical reality. But the difficulty is this; that Christians do not make it their first business to cultivate mutual forbearance, gentleness, long-suffering, goodness. They make little or no account of these graces as the divinely appointed means of "keeping the unity of the spirit." Eph. 4: 3. If they have differences of opinion, they discuss them in a dogmatical, overbearing, denunciatory manner, as if they thought they could not otherwise faithfully fulfill the injunction to "earnestly contend for the the faith." A brother undertakes to "instruct those that oppose themselves;" but being naturally hasty, and impatient of contradiction, he does not do it "in meekness." He comes out with a dictatorical 'I say so;' and perhaps before he is done, denounces his opposer as wanting in common sense, because he does not see just as he does. The consequence is the generation of envy and strife; and "where these are, there is confusion and every evil work." Who wants to live in such an atmosphere? Who would not rather separate himself, and join in fellowship with those with whom there would be less probability of collision?

Nevertheless, it is a poor experiment to run away from trouble. In some shape, quite as intolerable, it is sure to overtake us, go where we will. The very fact that a brother's lot is cast in a church where he meets with those who dogmatically and overbearingly oppose his views; the very fact that he is in communion with those who are wanting in meekness towards him, will serve to discipline him more completely in the exercise of those virtues which he sees to be wanting in them. It is perhaps the very kind of discipline which he most needs, however unpleasant it may be. "Tribulation worketh patience." Meekness, forbearance, long-suffering, are created, matured, consolidated, by the opportunity which the want of those graces in others gives for their excercise on our part. And though it may be altogether wrong for any portion of a church to neglect the cultivation of these graces, there may be nothing gained, on the whole, by resorting to organizations based upon such exact unanimity of views that the necessity of mutual forbearance shall no longer exist. Perhaps there may be more lost than gained by such a course; so that it is only a deceitful benefit, which is secured by the Procrustean creeds of modern churches. If this be the true view, the practical difficulty of our scheme in a measure vanishes, and the organization of churches upon the principle of tolerating such differences of opinion as involve neither vital piety nor difference of practice, acquires additional justification.

One thing is clear, however; that the organization of a church upon the principle here contemplated, creates certain necessities, which cannot be disregarded without peril. It throws the members upon the necessity of fighting resolutely against that propensity, so natural to all, to magnify knowledge above love. "Knowledge puffeth up, but love edifieth," says the Apostle. 1 Cor. 8: 1. It throws them upon the necessity of being candid in their inquiries after truth, not cherishing preconceived opinions with an overweening conceit of their own superior discernment. It throws them upon the necessity of being meek in the statement of their views, lest they should incautiously wound the feelings of those who differ from them. It throws them upon the necessity of walking in the light of the Lord, that in his light they may see light. Ps. 36: 9. And as it is by the instructions of the ministry that the church is to be brought ultimately into the unity of the faith, and as there can be no unity in a departure from the truth of the gospel, so the ministry is thrown upon the necessity of studying attentively and prayerfully the Scriptures, lest it should promote division rather than unity; the sin of doing which is, we fear, too lightly rated by most persons. But is not an organization which creates such necessities, more likely to be the divinely inspired one, than one which obviates them?

Our esteemed correspondent, whose communication is subjoined, appears to regard the Seventh-day Baptist churches as founded, in a good degree, on the foregoing principle. Perhaps they are; and if we would, as a denomination, give an illustration of the beneficial working of such a principle, it behoves us to aim at great tenderness in our treatment of one another; in short, to watch diligently, lest Satan make our discussions the occasion of rending us into parties. T. B. B.

For the Sabbath Recorder.

Whatever occasion I may have in other respects to regret having introduced the discussion now progressing in the Recorder, on the subject of God's "Foreknowledge," I certainly rejoice that it has given Bro. Brown the opportunity of "speaking out" upon the question of liberty of opinion, as enjoyed by the members of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. He says, "We certainly thought, that our connection with it involved no modification of the general system of doctrine which we had always held." So I thought with respect to Bro. Brown; and so I have always thought with respect to others who have been received holding sentiments adverse to those of Bro. B. And as an individual, I am free to say, that I should most deeply deplore any movement which might be made to change our denominational habits with respect to this thing. We are professedly a proselyting people, but more especially so with respect to the Sabbath question. Our publications are sent in every direction, and our views are thus pressed upon the attention of our brethren of the different branches of the Christian church around us. It also happens, that individuals of different predilections, from time to time receive our sentiments with respect to the Sabbath, and agreeing with us in other matters, so far as our denominational habits are concerned, come forward, and propose connection with us. And, so far as I know, these advances have been cordially met, and they have been most sincerely welcomed among us. And now what shall be done with respect to such brethren? Shall they be treated coolly, or their liberty of sentiment or expression abridged? Would that not be a breach of Christian confidence and charity? But suppose these hold sentiments which we consider wrong, how shall they be corrected? Should they not be brought to the test of Scriptural criticism? For my own part, I say, if a brother has sentiments which he wishes to lay before the public, let him "speak out."

But further, who dare say that there are no sentiments held in common by Seventh-day Baptists, which may be erroneous? Now, while we claim the right to examine and pass judgment upon the sentiments of our brethren, we ought certainly to give them the same privilege with ours. And pray why shall we be offended, when the truth of our belief is called in question? If we hold any sentiment that can be demolished by a course of fair argumentation, then let it be demolished! But if our sentiments will bear the heat of the trying furnace, then they are doubly valuable! We therefore say, in a proper way, at a proper time, and with a proper spirit, discuss all important matters of difference.

Perhaps it may be proper for me to say to the readers of the Recorder, that I design to write a few more articles on the subject of "God's Foreknowledge;" but my engagements are such, that some little time must necessarily be employed in getting them out.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

The New Year—French Affairs—Lord Palmerston—Popery in Ireland, &c.

Glasgow, January 2, 1852.

A new year has opened upon us, and thoughtful men express their apprehension, apart from the consideration of prophecy, or even the moral condition of the nations, that it is to prove an eventful year May the blessing of the Lord of the Sabbath rest upon the labors of the Recorder, in testifying for the glory of the Creator of the ends of the earth, and in seeking the sons of men to lay hold upon His Sabbath!

In addition to the censorship which the new French Dictator has kept upon the newspaper press, now that he is accepted by the nation, that censorship is extended to books. "The Prefect of the Nord, by virtue of a ministerial Circular, dated Dec. 18, has ordered every printer in his department to deposit for his perusal, two proofs of every book under ten sheets, and the publication cannot be made without the Prefect's sanction." This, therefore, is a power assumed, which may be made to work most effectually, not merely against political opponents, but for the suppression of the truth in religion also. And looking at the ascendancy which Popery has been gaining in that country, and the manner in which, as usual, it is playing into the hands of the man in power, we have little else to expect than that Protestantism must receive a farther check. Popery, of more pliant nature, accommodates itself to the times and seasons and circumstances in which it is placed, with little concern about consistency or the obligations of truth. In pagan lands, having, by force or by fraud, sprinkled water on the faces of its ignorant victims, it mingles its superstitions with their idolatries, and calls them Christians. So in civilized lands, it indulges vice, (while it frowns on true religion,) and is ever ready to play its part in the tumults of the people. It swims then with the flood, having the hope and the purpose of guiding the State-bark in accordance with its own interests. Thus in France, in 1848, its priesthood blessed the trees of liberty which were every where erected, and joined in the cry, then prevalent, of "Liberty, equality, and fraternity;" and now that same priesthood unite in prayers, and chant praises, and speak with lips of flattery of the divine mission of the man who, in the most despotic manner, orders the effacement of all these inscriptions, and consigns as fuel to the fire, those very emblematical trees, which for full three years and a half have borne Rome's blessing, though without yielding blossom or fruit of quality approved. Facile Popery is therefore likely to rise in favor with the man of power, while Protestantism, which has given no such expressions of satisfaction with the change he has effected, may expect, in like manner, to be frowned upon. May this issue in their more entire separation from all that is of mere Roman or human origin in the things of God, and a more devoted adherence to that only which is divine.

No light has yet been cast upon the circumstances connected with the resignation of Lord Palmerston, our own Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. It is, however, understood to have arisen in some way out of the French movement. Protestants, generally, regret the event, as his Lordship has generally interested himself in behalf of religion and humanity in his intercourse with foreign States. The latest instance of this was his successful interference, through the British consul, in behalf of Dr. Marriott, whose arrest at Rarlsruke, for distributing Anti-Popish tracts, we announced six weeks ago. Significance indeed seems to attach to the resignation of his Lordship, when we farther observe, that his successor in office, Lord Granville, is united to a French lady of great talent and influence, and who is a bigoted Papist.

In Ireland, the Pope's decree against the Government Colleges is taking effect. Clergymen of the Romish Church, holding office in these institutions, who at first seemed disposed to continue in their places, are one after another resigning; although there seems no diminution in the number of students of that communion, in the meanwhile at least. But great efforts are being made to procure funds for a Popish College in Dublin, and when the requisite amount is subscribed, and buildings are erected, and professors appointed, we may expect a new Bull anathematizing students also should they continue to attend those established by the government. The Dublin Evening Mail says an edict similar to that which has created so much domestic and social unhappiness in Belgium, has just been promulgated in many, if not in all, the Romish places of worship in Ireland. It not only interdicts the marriage hereafter (which would perhaps be a real blessing,) of Papists with heretics, but urgently enjoins upon those of the Romish communion who are already so united, to use the most strenuous and unintermitted means to gain over their partners to the same superstition—paying no regard to any previous contract, binding themselves to allow the up-bringing of any one of the children out of the Romish pale. Heavy penalties are stated to be denounced against recusants.

On the last Sunday of the bygone year, the Rev. Tenison Cuffe, of the English Episcopal Church, intimated his resolution to secede, and join the communion of Lady Huntingdon's connexion. He has been for some years past the minister of Carlisle Chapel, London, and was previously a vicar in Hertfordshire. The Gorham case, he says, led him to see the evil of baptismal regeneration, as taught in the formularies, and the unfavorable influence exercised by the State upon the Church. In the conducting and decision of that case, he saw no reference to the Scriptures as a standard of appeal. Most of his congregation accompany him in the change he is about to make.

The Record, the organ of the Evangelical party in the Episcopal Church, mentions with approval certain proposed alterations in the arrangement of the Sunday services, in St. Martin's Church, Birmingham — alterations devised by the Rev. Mr. Miller, the Rector, and approved by the Bishop. The length of the morning service is felt to be burdensome, especially when the communion service is added to it; and the repetition of the usual afternoon service at evening worship, is thought unnecessary. Mr. Miller suggests even the division of the service, so that successive parts may be read on two, three, or even four Sundays. To this last proposal the Record demurs; but it at the same time reminds its readers, on Scripture evidence, that the proper time for the observance of the Lord's Supper is the evening. Similar alterations are said to have the approbation of the Rev. Dr. Hook, of Tractarian notoriety. These alterations are wholly of an external character; but they may lead to others of more importance in the way of return to Scripture order.

The eminent Dr. Duff of Calcutta is at present making efforts in this country in behalf of the Free Church Indian Mission. He lately addressed a meeting at Manchester, urging the need of new Mission buildings at Calcutta, and subscriptions to the amount £1,050, were immediately made towards the accomplishment of that purpose. LEGALIZED OPPRESSION IN NEW YORK.

We have received a letter from one Luman Carpenter, a resident of the city of Oswego, in the State of New York, in which he informs us that he has been an observer of the seventh-day Sabbath for about four years; that during that time he has opened his grocery and provision store every Sunday until the 18th of January, 1852, since which he has been prohibited, by an order of the Recorder of the city, from selling his wares on that day; that two days in each week is more than he feels obligated or disposed to keep; and that he considers himself "oppressed for no other cause than for keeping the seventh day, and attending to his secular business on the other six days." He has taken counsel on the subject, and finds that the law of the State forbids selling goods on the first day of the week. Feeling that he "should submit to the laws or powers that be until relief can be obtained," he has had petitions printed, and sent in various directions, which he wishes signed and returned to him at Oswego before the first of March, that they may be made into one roll, and sent to a member of the Legislature from that region for presentation. We copy his petition, and hope that volunteers may be found in every section of the country to aid him in getting up a list of petitioners, respectable and influential for numbers as well as for standing.

The Petition.

To the Honorable, the Legislature of the State of New York:—

Your petitioners respectfully show, That whereas, by the sixty-seventh section of article eight, chapter twenty, part first, title eight, of the first volume of the third edition of the Revised Statutes of the State of New York, the sale of wares, merchandize, fruits, herbs, goods, or chattels, on Sunday, or the first day of the week, is prohibited; and that whereas there are those among us who uniformly keep the last day of the week, called Saturday, as holy time, and are engaged in the mercantile and grocery business, and in various other lawful occupations; we would respectfully recommend, that the law be so amended as to grant to those who uniformly keep the last day of the week, called Saturday, as holy time, the privilege of exposing for sale on the first day of the week, called Sunday, all wares, merchandize, fruits, herbs, goods, or chattels, and to do all acts lawful for them to do on any day not considered holy time.

Dr. Baird on Hungary.—Dr. Baird recently addressed the Free Scotch Assembly at Edinburgh, when he said of Hungary:—

"It is enough to break one's heart, to see the state of things there; the grinding and overwhelming oppression interfering even with daily avocations. One is not allowed to go five miles to market, without a passport. Yet the church of Christ is not destroyed. There are three and a half millions that belong to the Protestant churches. And there are 2,803 Protestant churches, that are self-sustaining; and schools are attached to each church. Truth is also looking up in Hungary. The number of faithful ministers is greater now than it was twenty years ago. Five hundred missionaries, besides the pastors, are employed in spreading the truth. Within the last twenty months, twenty-two thousand Bibles have been distributed there, and four thousand of them among the Jews."

A MISSION TO PALESTINE.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

I have learned with satisfaction, that the Missionary Board are considering the propriety of establishing a mission in Palestine. I hope that they will find it a promising field of labor, and that they will be led to adopt it. In order, however, for them to proceed with confidence, it appears to me that the subject should be well discussed through the Recorder. My predilection for such an enterprise is well understood by many of my friends. Still I am somewhat new in the question. Time passes rapidly on, and circumstances change. Whether we now are sufficiently interested as a people, can only be known by our speaking out through the paper, or by some such means.

There is also, in my opinion, another question of importance for us to solve; that is, are we agreed as to the method of teaching, or the matters to be insisted on in proselyting the Jews? Their views of the unfulfilled prophecies are somewhat different from ours, as generally taught. They are exceedingly attached to their national institutions, particularly circumcision. How shall we teach them on that subject? They, in almost every case, as I was once informed by the Rev. Mr. Wolff, when converted, adopt the Millennarian creed, or that which corresponds with it. What shall we say to them on that subject? There is no doubt we can be more accessible to them than other Christian denominations, provided we study our course well. They will not have every thing acceptable to them They must be differently taught from those who are heathen, or unacquainted with the Bible I hope the friends of missions will speak out on this subject, and we shall know where about we are. J. Maxson.

DeRuyter, N. Y., Jan. 25. 1852.

ORDINATION.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Agreeably to a request from the Church in Waterford, Conn., a Council was convened at the house of Bro. David Rogers, Jan 27th, for the purpose of examining Bro. Halsey H. Baker with reference to his receiving ordination.

Present, as members of the Council—from the 1st Hopkinton Church, Elds. Daniel Coon and Lucius Crandall; from the 2d Hopkinton Church, Eld Henry Clarke; from the Greenmanville Church, Eld. Sherman S. Griswold. Present from the Waterford Church—Dea. David Rogers, brethren Peleg L. Berry, Joshua Maxson, David P. Rogers.

The Council organized by choosing Daniel Coon as Moderator, and Henry Clarke, Clerk. Prayer was offered by S. S. Griswold.

On motion of Lucius Crandall, it was Resolved, That Bro. Baker's known standing in the denomination as a licentiate, together with the wants of the Waterford Church, do justify the Council in proceeding to comply with the request of said Church with reference to his ordination.

The Council then proceeded to the examination of Bro. Baker, and appointed Bro. Griswold to propound the customary questions. After due examination, it was unanimously Voted, That we are satisfied with the qualifications of Bro. Baker as a candidate for the gospel ministry.

Voted, That we recommend that the ordination take place on the day designated by the Waterford Church, viz., on Fourth-day, Jan. 28, at 11 o'clock A. M.

Voted, That Daniel Coon preach the sermon; Lucius Crandall offer the consecrating prayer; S. S. Griswold give the charge to the candidate, and also to the church; and Henry Clarke give the right hand of fellowship.

D. Coon, Moderator.

H. Clarke, Clerk.

Agreeably to the above, Bro. Baker was duly set apart to the work of the gospel ministry. The singing of the choir was excellent, and all the exercises were deeply interesting. After the close of the services, the congregation proceeded to the sea-shore, where Bro. Baker baptized four persons. Such was the beginning of his labor in this field. May the Lord bless the people of his charge.

COLONY ON THE PACIFIC.

The subject of a colony to the Pacific shore is attracting much attention in various parts of our denomination. A goodly number of young men have left us for that region recently, and many more are going. It is true, the most of them go to spend a few years and return; but if we are to judge by past experience, a large share will make California their future homes. We clip from the "Baptist Register" the following extract from their California correspondence, showing that the attention of other denominations is being drawn to that region:—

"Fields of promise, some 'white already to the harvest,' are opening on every side. Our State is very poorly supplied with Baptist ministers. The question is often asked by members of other denominations, 'Why does not your Board send out more men? Why are there so few ministers of your order in the State?' Brethren, too, in different sections, are looking for ministers to build churches in their respective places. It is a truth; let the churches of New York and other Eastern States ponder it; the other denominations are far better supplied than we are. What has the Empire State done for California? Almost nothing. The most important spot now in our country, you are neglecting. Its claims certainly are not considered. Its present and prospective importance are overlooked. It is a part of our Union, and the citizens of every land and clime are here. Soon our State is to be the commercial depot of the world. Already she boasts of her commerce, agriculture and mining, three mighty levers for good or evil. She is near to the Islands of the Pacific, and not distant from Asia. Here the great moral light-house may be erected to give light to idolaters beyond the Pacific. Brethren, I must urge its importance on your consideration. My heart trembles for the ark of God here. Should I hold my peace, the stones would cry out. We want Baptist ministers in California. You can find here such toil as the apostles had in combating error and removing prejudice. You may expect such salaries, and, if faithful, meet similar success. Brethren, come over into California and help us. L. O. Grenell.

Would it not be well for some of our business men to think seriously of this business? Many of our best families have expressed a disposition to go out, provided a sufficient number would volunteer. Comm.

A Temperance Alliance.—A Convention was held at Albany, N. Y., on the 29th ult., for the purpose of forming a State Temperance Alliance. After organizing in the usual manner, a Committee was appointed to prepare a Constitution and a series of resolutions. The Constitution which they presented was unanimously adopted; and according to it the object of the Alliance is "to secure the nomination and election of all officers of such men as are known to be in favor of the enactment and enforcement of a law which shall wholly prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, and provide for the destruction thereof when the same is kept in violation of law." The resolutions presented and adopted were as follows:—

Resolved, That this Convention is convinced that Moral Suasion alone is not sufficient to prevent the progress and increase of Intemperance.

Resolved, That the bulk of crime and corruption which disfigures the age is the result of the use of intoxicating drinks.

Resolved, That it is unwise and unjust to continue the temptation, or the facility of procurement of intoxicating drinks, before the present or the rising generation.

Resolved, That the Legislature should not only forbid the sale of intoxicating drink, but should authorize its forfeiture and destruction.

Resolved, That the appeal by the Temperance Alliance of New York to the ballot-box as a remedy, was wise, justifiable, and necessary, and that all Temperance men should put themselves in alliance with them.

Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society.—This Society held its Annual Meeting in Boston last week, which was attended and addressed by the leading abolitionists of the Garrison school, such as Wendell Phillips, Parker Pillsbury, Foster, Burleigh, and Remond. The Annual Report was read by Edmund Quincy, and set forth the general aspect of affairs in this country in relation to slavery. The Treasurer's Report showed that the Society had received about $7,000 during the past year, which is an increase upon the previous year of about $2,000. The time was spent principally in the discussion of a series of resolutions, severely censuring the authorities of the city of Boston for surrendering Thomas Sims to slavery, and condemning the course of Kossuth in this country, for forgetting the slave, and praising those who hold slaves or apologize for slave-holding.

Paine's Birth-day.—The birth-day of Thomas Paine was celebrated by his admirers in New York, on the evening of Fifth-day last. The proceedings commenced with a ball, which continued until 11 o'clock. Then came the supper and the speeches, which occupied several hours, keeping together until near morning "a company of about 300 persons, of whom a quarter were women and girls." The two toasts following indicate the spirit of the meeting—hatred of the clergy and admiration of the women:—

The Clergy—Generally in the rear of progress; they must hurry on or be thrown off the track.

Woman—Through her influence man partook of the tree of knowledge; though driven from the garden where it grew, she gained knowledge enough to make an Eden wherever she may be.

Revivals at the West.—The Rev. J. C. Holbrook writes to the New York Observer, that there are interesting revivals in Quincy, Ill., and vicinity. At Round Prairie, there has been a powerful work during the summer. At Mendon, there has been a remarkable revival, and at Quincy the work is more recent, but progressing.

Death of Rev. Dr. Jones.—Intelligence was recently received of the sudden death, on the 13th of September last, of the Rev. John Taylor Jones, D. D., of the American Baptist Mission in Siam, one of the oldest and most valued missionaries of the American Baptist Missionary Union.

The Bibliotheca Sacra, and American Biblical Repository, has been pronounced, by competent authority, "the ablest theological and classical quarterly on either side of the Atlantic." It is conducted by Professors B. B. Edwards and E. A. Park, and S. H. Taylor, M. A., of Andover, with the special co-operation of Dr. Robinson, H. B. Smith, J. Hadley, G. E. Day, D. H. Allen, and J. M. Sherwood—names which furnish a guaranty for the continued high character of the work. The following is the table of contents for January, 1852:—

I. The Resurrection of the Body.
II. The Sin-offering.
III. Hebrew Criticisms.
IV. The Four Gospels as we now have them in the New Testament, and the Hegelian assaults upon them.
V. The Kingdom of Congo and the Roman Catholic Missionaries.
VI. The Theology of Richard Baxter.
VII. New England Theology.
VIII. Notices of New Publications.
IX. Correspondence, etc.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, JAN. 26.

In the SENATE, petitions on various subjects were presented. Mr. Hale presented one from New Hampshire, praying for a repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law; and also from some persons, praying for the abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia. On his motion, the petitions were tabled. Mr. Wade presented the joint resolutions of the Ohio Legislature relative to Kossuth, Hungary, &c. Mr. Clark's joint resolution about the foreign policy of the United States was taken up, and made the order for Fourth-day week. Several private bills ordered to the third reading on Sixth-day, were taken up and passed. The bill granting land to Iowa to aid in the construction of a railroad in that State, was taken up. Mr. Underwood addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill as unjust to other States, and moved to amend by adding provisions granting to Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee, and Kentucky, an aggregate of 14,390,680 acres of public land, to be distributed according to their federal population, and the proceeds to be applied by said States to purposes of education or internal improvement.

In the SENATE, a resolution was adopted calling for information from the Heads of Departments in relation to claims paid since 1849. The Senate bill making Land Warrants assignable, was made the order of the day for next Second-day. A resolution was adopted calling for the correspondence between Kossuth and Capt. Long. The Census Printing Scheme was the subject of debate during the remainder of the session.

THIRD-DAY, JAN. 27.

The SENATE received from the Secretary of the Treasury a statement of the Marine Hospital Fund. Mr. Fish presented a petition from citizens of New York for a Mint in this city. Commodore Vanderbilt petitioned for $250,000 a year for the Nicaragua mail route. Information was asked from the Secretary of the Treasury concerning Public Warehouses. The French Spoliation bill was made the special order for the third Monday in February. The grant of land to Iowa was taken up, and upon it Mr. Sumner, of Massachusetts, made an eloquent speech. The Senate then adjourned.

In the HOUSE, the day was spent in a quarrel among the leading politicians on the Census Printing scheme. It was finally referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

FOURTH-DAY, JAN. 28.

In the SENATE, there was an interesting discussion on the request to interpose the friendly officers of our Government with that of Great Britain for the release of the Irish State prisoners. Mr. Cass made a long speech, the substance of which was that the movement would not form a precedent against Southern interest. Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, supported the measure, and stated that his mother was the daughter of a poor Irish exile named O'Brien. Mr. Butler (Irish by descent) supported it, but deprecated abuse of England. Shields (Irish by birth) agreed to dispense with diplomatic application, and then the subject dropped. Mr. Hunter reported the bill to remit duties on merchandize consumed by fire. Mr. Foote's resolution declaring the compromise measures a definitive settlement of the Slavery question, was taken up, and Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts, spoke upon it, and then, after a short Executive Session, the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE, the Mexican Indemnity bill (appropriating $3,180,000,) was discussed, and attacks were made upon the Secretaries of State and Treasury, and then the bill passed. The bill to provide for the relief of the Cuban prisoners was taken up, upon which Mr. Giddings managed to hang a discussion on Slavery, Kossuth, &c.

FIFTH-DAY, DEC. 29.

In the SENATE, Mr. Cooper presented sundry petitions against the Sunday mails. Mr. Clark presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of Rhode Island against flogging and spirit rations in the Navy. Mr. Shields introduced a resolution, asking the restoration to liberty of the Irish State Prisoners, as a substitute for the one previously offered, which was postponed till Thursday next. The Compromise Resolution was then taken up, and Mr. McRea, of Mississippi, made some moderate and sensible remarks, but before he had concluded the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE, the bill appropriating $6,000 for the relief of the Cuban Prisoners passed, with a proviso.

Mr. Olds, from the Post-Office Committee, reported a bill to amend the act of 1851, reducing and modifying the rates of postage, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole. The bill provides that each newspaper, pamphlet, periodical and magazine, book, bound or unbound, circular, catalogue, and every description of printed matter unconnected with any manuscript or writing, and of no greater weight than 2½ ounces, shall be charged one cent postage, and one cent for each additional ounce or fraction of an ounce, for any distance under 2,000 miles; over 2,000, double those rates. All newspapers published regularly, and sent from the office of publication to actual subscribers, and not weighing over one ounce, shall be chargeable with one-half of the foregoing rates. The postage upon all printed mailable matter shall be prepaid, either at the office where it is mailed, or at the office of delivery; otherwise double the foregoing rates shall be charged thereon. All transient printed matter shall be deemed unpaid, unless paid at the office where it is mailed. Books, bound or unbound, not weighing over four pounds, shall be deemed mailable matter, and printed matter chargeable by weight, shall be weighed when dry. The publishers of newspapers and periodicals may send to each other, from their respective offices of publication, free of postage, one copy of each publication, and may also send to each actual subscriber, inclosed in their publications, bills and receipts for the same, free of postage. The publishers of weekly newspapers may send to each actual subscriber, in the County where their papers are printed and published, one copy thereof free of postage. And all laws and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this bill are repealed.

Mr. McLanahan, from the Judiciary Committee, reported a bill to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed to the Clerks, Marshals and Attorneys of the Circuit and District Courts of the United States. He moved that it be referred to the Committe of the Whole on the State of the Union, and that 5,000 copies of the bill and report be printed. Being asked why he proposed so large a number of copies, he said that the increase of the expenses of the Judiciary, from the organization of the Government to the present time, had led the Committee to investigate the causes which have produced this result. He stated that, in the year 1800, the expenses of the Judiciary were $42,000; in 1843, $373,694; in 1850, $556,484. The population of the country has increased 333 per cent., while the expenses of the Judiciary have increased 1,037 per cent. in that period of time. In the Northern District of New York, the expenses of the Judiciary, independent of the Judges, from 1830 to the present time, have increased from $3,500 to $43,975, and they are about twelve times as great as they were twelve years ago. In Massachusetts, within a similar period of time, the expenses have increased from $9,986 to $92,720—about ten times as great as they were ten years ago, and this exclusive of the salaries of the Judges. These, and various other facts, are mentioned in the report. Mr. McLanahan's motion was agreed to.

SIXTH-DAY, JAN. 30.

In the SENATE, numerous petitions and reports were received and referred. The Mexican Indemnity Bill was reported without amendment. An inquiry was voted as to the expediency of a provision of law regulating the number of passengers in vessels to California. The House Bill for the relief of Cuban prisoners was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Private Calendar was then taken up, and occupied the remainder of the session. Adjourned till Second-day.

The HOUSE spent a long time to no purpose in considering whether to furnish clerks for the Naval and Post-Office Committees. The Committee on Foreign Affairs were discharged from the farther consideration of a petition from the citizens of Castine, Me., that National disputes may be settled by umpirage, rather than by appeals to the sword. Mr. Robinson, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill to set apart and sell to A. Whitney, of New York, a portion of the public territory, to enable him to contract for a railroad from Lake Michigan, or the Mississippi River, to the Pacific. The remainder of the day was devoted to the reception of reports of no general importance. Adjourned till Second-day.

California News.

By the steamers Prometheus from San Juan, and Cherokee from Chagres, sixteen days later news from California, and about two millions of dollars in gold dust, were received in New York last week.

The British and American Naval Officers at San Juan are exchanging compliments instead of cannon shots, and the Prometheus affair is regarded as happily got done with.

On the trial of Capt. Waterman at San Francisco, for assaulting a number of seamen on board the ship Challenge, the Jury could not agree upon a verdict, and were discharged. Being put on trial on a second indictment, he was found guilty.

The Indian difficulties are quelled for the present, but fears are entertained of a further outbreak.

Various new discoveries have taken place in the mining districts, to pique the enterprise of the gold-hunter.

There has been, of late, a marked diminution of crime throughout the State of California.

One hundred Chinese arrived in San Francisco by the Swedish brig Jackin, Dec. 27.

At San Francisco, Christmas Day was held in considerable remembrance. The Episcopal and Roman Catholic Churches were well attended. The banking houses and most places of business were closed, while fireworks and good humor saluted one at every turn.

The survey of the San Jose Railroad—the first link in the great chain designed to be extended in time across the Plains—has been completed, and the estimated cost is $1,539,126 17.

THE WINTER IN OREGON.—Oregon dates to Dec. 24, have been received. The winter has been a wet one in Oregon thus far. The Oregon Spectator of Dec. 16, has the following: The winter so far has been, we are informed by old settlers in this country, about an usual one for Oregon, with nearly as much of rain and cold as is general. We have had no frosts (Dec. 12) except in three or four instances, and then but very slight ones. The grass and almost all kinds of vegetation are not only fresh and green, but actually growing finely. Garden sauce of various kinds can be had in many of the gardens about town, for the trouble of gathering it. We yesterday had the pleasure, for the first time in our life, of eating radishes grown in the open air in December? Lettuce of a good quality is also plenty, it being the second growth, and self-sown.

AMERICAN COLONIZATION SOCIETY.—The American Colonization Society celebrated its anniversary at Washington on the 20th ult. The assemblage was addressed by Hon. Daniel Webster, and Mr. Stanton, of Tennessee. Mr. Webster said he never doubted the practicability and the utility of the objects of the Society. He contemplated with amazement the dark ways of Providence in permitting the emigration of Africans to this country for selfish and avaricious ends. They were now about to go back, and carry with them light, knowledge, freedom, and religion, to the home of their ancestors. He said that emigration was the prominent idea of this age; that a million and a half had emigrated from Ireland to the United States within a few years, greatly to the advantage of Ireland. Emigration of colored persons from this country to Africa, he said, was equally practicable, especially if encouraged by the Government. It was destined to produce great good. The separation of the two races, he argued, was indispensable to the elevation of the blacks; it would greatly promote their happiness, and not diminish the happiness of the whites.

The steamer George Washington exploded her boilers when near Grand Gulf, Mississippi River. Several persons were killed. The boat subsequently took fire, and with the cargo is a total loss.

THE SYRACUSE RESCUE CASES.—The decision of the Court, on the complaint of the people against the Government officials for packing a Jury at Buffalo, and other frauds and irregularities, was given at Albany last Sixth-day. The cases were all remitted to the Circuit Court to be held at Canandaigua, in June next, the questions presented being too important, and the accused too illustrious, to be tried and convicted in the District Court. It appears from the decision of the District Court, that Justice Nelson of the Supreme Bench has been advising with the District Attorney as to the best manner of getting hold of these cases, and also that Chief Justice Taney is interested in the question. So Judge Concklin sent them all to the Circuit.

SMALL-POX AT WESTERLY, R. I.—Speaking of the small-pox at Westerly (Pawcatuck Bridge,) R. I., the Literary Echo of Jan. 29 says:—There have been, according to the statement of physicians, about twenty cases of some eruptive disease—three of which have terminated fatally. The cases have generally, with the exception of the three, been quite light. Of these twenty cases, not more than half have been decided by the physicians to be the small-pox. As vigorous measures have been taken by the authorities to prevent its spreading, and as we have not learned of any new cases for a week past, we think we are warranted in the hope that the disease, whatever it may be, will soon disappear from among us.

LIBRARY OF NEANDER.—Neander's Library has been purchased by the University of Rochester. The Prussian Government and the Lane (Ohio) Seminary were the chief competitors. The Professors of Lane Seminary have published a statement in the papers in respect to this library, in which they aver that, although they fully complied with the terms on which it was offered, and received the promise of Neander's administrator that none but they should have it, he was induced by the offer of a larger sum to break his agreement with them, and sell the valuable library to another institution.

DEATH OF JAMES G. BIRNEY.—James G. Birney, who was the Liberty Party candidate for President in 1840 and 1844, died recently at his residence in Saginaw, Michigan, where he has been in failing health for some years past. Newspaper reports say that he had abandoned his ultra abolition views before death, and that a pamphlet from his pen is now in press at Cincinnatti, urging the Free Blacks to accede to the Colonization Scheme and choose Liberia as their ultimate home. Whether this is or is not well founded, we shall doubtless soon know.

EXECUTIONS.—Hiram Knickerbocker was executed at Buffalo, N. Y., on Sixth-day last, for the murder of C. Harkner. On the same day, Lawrence Reilly was hung at Brooklyn, N. Y., for the murder of his wife and mother-in-law. Otto Grunzig was to have been hung in New York on the same day, for the poisoning of his wife; but the execution was postponed for the present, on account of the confession of an accomplice.

NAVIGATION OF LONG ISLAND SOUND.—The navigation of Long Island Sound has been suspended for about two weeks in consequence of the ice. The Stonington steamboat, after lying in New York ten days, started out Fifth-day last, but was obliged to return after proceeding ten miles. On Sunday she started again, and went through all safe. What will the "Sabbath-accident" people say to that?

NEW EDUCATIONAL MOVEMENT.—At a recent Agricultural Convention held at Granville, Putnam Co., Ill., Prof. Turner, of Jacksonville, proposed an educational enterprise on a large scale, which was adopted by the Convention, with a view of bringing the same before the next session of the legislature of that State. Prof. Turner alleges, that the system of education in this country is only adapted to a professional class of men, and that it overlooks the very much larger industrial class. His plan proposes the establishment of a great Central National University, with a Minor University in each State, and a subordinate college or school for each county, and a still more subordinate school in each township.

EDUCATION IN OREGON.—The Congregationalists have an academy in Washington Co.; the Baptists, an incipient college in Clackamas Co.; the Methodists, in Marion Co.; the Campbellites control educational matters in Yam Hill and Polk Co.s; the Presbyterians are erecting and supporting a Union Academy in Lynn Co.; and an embryo State Institute, called the "Oregon University," is located in Benton Co.

The Grand Jury of Passaic County, New-Jersey, have returned three bills of indictment against H. C. Stimpson, late Cashier of the People's Bank of Paterson. They also made a presentment against the Directors of that institution for "gross and culpable neglect of duty." According to this presentment, five of the Directors never saw the Charter, and most of them never examined the books, and were merely nominal managers, not being bona fide stockholders, but they simply held single shares, transferred to them to make them eligible.

In the case of Williams vs. the Michigan Central Railroad Company, which was an action brought to recover damages for certain horses run over and killed by a locomotive on the road of the defendants, the Supreme Court of Michigan has decided against the plaintiff, on the ground that his horses were trespassing, no animals having the right of living on the public ways, unless the township owns a bona fide common, and has given legal permission for its use.

A short sime since, we published, says The Journal, an account of a knitting machine in Philadelphia, which by the simple operation of turning a crank would knit 60,000 stitches per minute. The Hartford Courant is informed that the Griswoldville Knitting Co., in Wethersfield, have a machine which will knit one hundred and eleven thousand three hundred and sixty stitches per minute, or nearly double what the Philadelphia machine will do.

SUMMARY.

A horrid murder was recently committed in Whitley Co., Ky. Wm. Rains, with his wife, was on a visit to his father-in-law, Richard Woods. A dispute arose between Rains and his mother-in-law, and he knocked her down and threatened to kill the whole family. Woods becoming alarmed, called in a neighbor named McFarland, who was stabbed by Rains, which caused his immediate death. Rains was arrested.

The Supreme Court of the United States has decided the case of the State of Pennsylvania against the Wheeling and Belmont Bridge Company, in favor of the former party. The decree of the Court is that the bridge be removed as a nuisance and an obstruction to navigation, or be elevated so as to permit steamboats, schooners, &c., the ordinary river crafts, to pass.

The severe weather has not been confined to a northern latitude. At Griffin, Ga., on the 20th ult., the mercury stood at only 3 degrees above zero, the coldest weather ever experienced in that vicinity. The Savannah News says that many small birds and fish have perished with cold in that vicinity, and that the orange trees, if not killed outright, have been greatly injured by frost.

The Wheeling (Va.) Gazette states that the snow in the mountains in that vicinity is of an average depth of from five to seven feet, while in many places it is drifted to an immense depth. Apprehensions are entertained that, in the event of a sudden thaw, great damage would be done on the low lands.

The annual report of the Camden and Amboy Railroad and Delaware and Raritan Canal Company, just made to the Legislature of New Jersey, shows that the gross receipts of the joint companies, for 1851, were $1,285,000 85; gross disbursements, $767,357 94; total transit duties, $49,020 10.

The cutting of bars of iron or pipes with the chisel, is a laborious and tardy process. By the following mode, the same end is attained more speedily, easily and neatly. Bring the iron to a white heat, and then, fixing it in a vice, apply the common saw, which, without being turned in the edge, or injured in any respect, will divide it as easily as if it were a carrot.

A man named Crawford, living in Abingdon, Va., whenever he became intoxicated, which was unfortunately often, attempted to fasten a quarrel on a neighbor named Morrison. On Christmas eve he became uncontrollable, and ran into Morrison's house with a club and a large knife, whereupon Morrison, seizing a gun, shot him dead as he rushed upon him.

Connecticut claims the two youngest Members of Congress as natives of that State both from Pennsylvania—Galusha A. Grow, of the XIIth District, a native of Windham Co., aged 29, and Hon. Henry M. Fuller, of the XIth District, a native of Litchfield Co., aged 31—one belonging to the Opposition and the other a Whig.

Rev. Mr. Bridgeman, writing from China, says that the number of chests of opium, each containing 133 lbs., taken to China the present year, will exceed 70,000, and that in exchange for these 70,000 chests, the Chinese will pay to foreigners more that $36,000,000—and most of this is in silver.

The Milwaukie Sentinel of the 30th ult. says, "The Rochester and Syracuse Railroad Company has settled for $25,000 for its damages done by the accident last spring at Geneva, whereby Messrs. Scott and Peters, of Kenosha, were so seriously injured. Both gentlemen have arrived at home, and are improving."

The Filibustier steamer Pampero, which was condemned by the U. S. Court, and sold at Jacksonville, Fla., on the 17th ult., was purchased by Capt. Templeton, of New Orleans, for Mr. Sigur, her former owner, at $15,000, about one half of her original cost.

The steamer DeWitt Clinton, from New Orleans, bound to Pittsburgh, struck a snag eight miles below Memphis, on the 25th ult., at about 4 o'clock P. M., and sunk within two minutes, in two and a half fathoms of water. From twenty-five to thirty lives were lost, including all the firemen except one.

A destructive fire occurred Jan. 27th, in Springfield, Mass. The Hotel known as the Hampden House, was destroyed, the loss of which alone is estimated at $40,000. The boarders, among whom was the "Black Swan," escaped with loss and difficulty.

The Lake Shore Railroad, from Dunkirk westward to the State line, has been in operation for several days, and is probably now worked to Erie. This reduces the staging between Dunkirk and Cleveland to a short distance, and this, we believe, over a plank road.

The Grand Jury have found bills of indictment for manslaughter against Gorden Mills and John Irick, the Engineer and Conductor of the freight train, by whose negligence the collision occurred which caused the death of Mr. Morse, of Bethel.

A dispatch dated New Orleans, Tuesday, Jan. 13, 1852, says: For the first time in twenty years we have had an old-fashioned New England snow-storm. The weather is very cold, and there is six inches snow on the ground.

A man named Jones, with two others, entered a farmer's house in Richland County, Ohio, on the night of the 17th, and compelled him to give them $900. The following day, Jones, with one of his comrades, was frozen to death in a wood near the house.

The brig Samuel Baker, from Charleston, 8th inst., with a cargo of cotton, lemons, grapes, &c., was burned in Chesapeake Bay, about 60 miles from Baltimore, on Thursday, Jan. 22.

Mr. Clay remains without material change. He is thought to be improving, if any thing. But he does not rise till 11 o'clock, and then sits up but an hour or two. He still hopes to get to the Senate.

The Chinese pay the British merchants fifteen millions of dollars for cotton manufactures, and forty-five millions of dollars for opium grown in the British East Indies, every year.

The Regents of the University of Michigan have discharged three of the Professors of that institution for heresy in teaching that God's law is higher than that of man.

The Petersburg Va., papers mention a rumor of ten persons being drowned, by breaking through the ice on the Rappahannock River.

On the night of Jan. 28, a fire broke out in a store on Nassau-st., New York, near Liberty-st., which destroyed some $500,000 worth of property. The principal losers were Doremus, Nixon & Co.; Lester, Fisher & Robinson; John Lockwood; Freeman, Hodges & Co.; Hastings, Libby & Forby; and N. B. Oatley.

A dispatch dated Baltimore, Jan. 29, says: As a number of boys were skating in the dock to-day, the ice gave way, and some of them fell in. Henry Trimby was drowned, also Joseph Saphas, (a colored man,) whose exertions saved two of the boys, but proved fatal to himself.

A young man named John Heany, has been arrested in Albany, on a charge of having robbed the Post-Office drawers of letters. The immediate cause of his arrest was the presentation at the State Bank of a check supposed to have been stolen from the Post-Office.

A bill has been reported in the Rhode Island House of Representatives for the suppression of drinking-houses. Its leading features are copied from the celebrated Maine law on the same subject.

The Bangor Courier states that at some of the distilleries in Massachusetts the people are packing small casks of liquor in large casks, some in hay, some in chaff, and some in seeds, and marked to different places in Maine as "grass-seed."

BENEDICT W. ROGERS, Treasurer.

MARRIED.

In Alfred, N. Y., Jan. 24, 1852, by Erastus A. Green, Esq., Mr. WELCOME SWEET to Miss LUCINDA LANPHEAR, all of Alfred.

In Alfred, Jan. 22, by Eld. N. V. Hull, Mr. ALMON E. CRANDALL to Miss EMMA E. SISSON, all of Alfred.

By the same, Jan. 26th, Mr. DAVID M. BLACK, of Rogers, Michigan, to Miss LUCINDA WILBOR, of Alfred.

DIED.

In Westerly, R. I., Jan. 21st, of small pox, Mr. JONATHAN MAXSON, in the 70th year of his age. The subject of this notice embraced religion in early life, and was baptized by Eld. Wm. Bliss, and united with the Newport Church. He subsequently removed his standing to the first Seventh-day Baptist Church of Hopkinton, where he continued a much-esteemed member for many years. In 1840 he united with the Pawcatuck Church at its organization, and ever sought its peace and welfare until death removed him to the church triumphant. In this dispensation of Divine Providence, an afflicted wife and family are called to mourn the loss of one who was ever an affectionate and faithful husband and father, who in his life and conversation constantly adorned the principles of his holy profession, and by his meekness and kindness of disposition endeared himself to all his numerous friends. Truly, a father in Israel has fallen! The trying circumstances of his death, add much to this affliction; especially as the bereaved family are unable, from the contagious nature of the disease, to meet together and mingle their sympathies in this trying hour. May the God of Israel sustain and comfort them, and sanctify to them and the church this deep affliction.

In Bridgewater, Oneida Co., N. Y., on the 14th of January, Miss TEMPERANCE BROWN, in the 90th year of her age.

In Berlin, N. Y., NANCY, wife of Jonathan Saunders, in the 42d year of her age.

In Stephentown, Jan. 21st, HENRY PIERCE, son of Sylvanus Carpenter, in the 12th year of his age.

In Petersburg, on the 23d of January, POLLY, wife of Alanson B. Niles, in her 27th year.

In Berlin, Jan. 22d, LUCETTA, daughter of Varnum and Susan Green, in the 14th year of her age.

In Belfast, on Sunday, Jan. 18th, THOMAS WILCOX, aged 83 years.

New York and Boston.

REGULAR MAIL LINE, via Stonington, for Boston, Providence, New Bedford, Taunton, and Newport, carrying the great Eastern U. S. Mail, without change of cars or detention. The secure and elegant steamers C. VANDERBILT and COMMODORE leave on alternate days (Sundays excepted) Pier No. 2 North River, (first wharf above Battery-place,) at 5 o'clock P. M. For passage, state-rooms, or freight, apply at Pier No. 2, or at the office, No. 11 Battery-place.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co. have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Two Living Aztec Children.

A NEW AND ABSOLUTELY UNIQUE RACE OF MANKIND.—The most extraordinary and inexplicable phenomena that the history of the human race has yet produced, can be seen for a few weeks at the large Exhibition Room of the Society Library, corner of Broadway and Leonard-street. They were recently taken from a newly-discovered and idolatrous people in Central America, by whom they were kept with superstitious veneration, distinct and secluded as a caste of their priesthood, and employed as Mimes and Bacchanals in their Pagan ceremonies and worship.

They are male and female. The latter measuring 29½ inches in height, weighing 17 lbs.; the former is 33 inches high, and weighs 20 lbs.

From repeated and careful examination, the best Physiologists state the older to be 12 or 13 years of age; the younger about 10 years.

They differ altogether from examples of the dwarf kind, and from children; affording complete and undeniable illustration of a Piamean variety of the Human Race!

New York Type Foundry and Printers' Warehouse.

Established in 1810.

JOHN T. WHITE, No. 53 Cliff-st, corner of Beekman-st., New York, would call the attention of Editors and Printers to his varied and extensive assortment of Types, Flowers, and Ornaments, all cast of the very best metal, and finished with the greatest care, and now offered at reduced prices, on a credit of six months, and a liberal discount made for cash.

Also, Presses of the different kinds, Chases, Cases, Brass Rules, Composing Sticks, Ink, and every article required in a Printing Office, constantly on hand, at the lowest market prices.

Spanish and French orders accurately executed with all the necessary accents, &c. This being one of the oldest and most extensive foundries in America, with a very large stock and unsurpassed assortment, orders of any magnitude can be executed without delay.

A supplement to his last Specimen Book will be issued about the 1st of November, (copies will be furnished on application,) which will contain new series of Book and News Type, of the favorite Scotch Cut, embracing light, medium, and heavy faces, the latter particularly designed for Machine Printing, surpassing any thing ever offered in this country; to which are added Metal Rule, Fancy Borders, and a great variety of new and handsome Ornamental Type.

Old Type taken in exchange for new at nine cents per pound.

Editors or Printers wishing to establish a Newspaper, Book, or Job Printing Office, will be furnished with an estimate in detail for the same by stating the size of the paper, or the particular style and quantity of the work to be executed.

* * Editors of Newspapers who will insert this advertisement three times previous to the 1st of January, 1852, and will send one copy of the paper containing the same to the Foundry, will be allowed the amount of their charge on purchasing four times its amount.

Miscellaneous.

Burning of the Steamship Amazon.

The following particulars of this frightful calamity are copied from English papers brought by the steamer America:—

The Amazon was a very fine new vessel, one of the West India Mail Steam Packet Company's squadron. She had sailed from Southampton on the afternoon of Friday, the 2d of January. By midnight on Saturday she had got well clear of the Scilly Islands, and had made about 110 miles in a W. S. W. course from this point. At twenty minutes before one, on Sunday morning, the alarm of fire was given. In a few minutes the flames had burst up the fore and main hatchways, and had spread like wildfire along the decks. There was a heavy sea on at the time, and the wind is described as "blowing half a gale" from the south-west. The alarm bell was instantly rung, and the crew and passengers—as many of them as were not suffocated by the smoke in their berths—rushed upon deck. Capt. Symons immediately ran up on deck in his shirt and trowsers. The attempt, of course, was at first to extinguish the flames. The progress of the destructive element was, however, so rapid as to set all humam struggles at defiance. The engine-room was untenable, and the hose could not be brought to act. Something, indeed, appears to have been done in the way of heaving overboard a stock of hay, but the task was simply hopeless from the commencement. The tragedy then in progress was to begin and end in the space of twenty minutes. As soon as the officers were convinced that the fire had decisively gained the mastery, their next effort was to get the boats cleared away. There were plenty of boats on board, including three lifeboats. Could they have been lowered in safety, there would have been accommodation for all persons on board. So happy a result was not obtained. In the midst of the confusion that prevailed, and of the wild terror of the passengers, with a raging sea, and in a gale of wind, order and unity of action were no doubt lost. There appears to have been the greatest difficulty in getting the boats clear of the ship; the time allowed for the necessary arrangements was infinitely small. Whatever may have been the cause, only one lifeboat was available.

At 1 o'clock, just 20 minutes after the fire broke out, three boats had got clear of the burning vessel. One of these was almost instantly found to be useless; but the persons in her were picked up by one of the other boats, a Green's lifeboat. It is from those who escaped in the boat last-mentioned, that the tidings were received. Nothing was known of the fate of the remaining boat. The survivors and spectators of the scene considered it most improbable that she could live long in so stormy a sea. Be this as it may, at 1 o'clock on Sunday morning, just 20 minutes after the fire had broken out, no man could remain on the deck of the Amazon and live. Her magazine afterward exploded, and by 5½ o'clock in the morning, there was no vestige left of this noble ship. When the Amazon left Southampton, she had on board 161 passengers, and only 21 were picked up in the lifeboat by a homeward brig, the Marsden, and brought into Plymouth. Capt. Symons was a man well-known for his competent skill, courage and resolution.

The scene on the deck of the vessel, of which we get glimpses through the few graphic particulars reported, was horribly appalling. When the flames had approached the after companion, two male passengers came up from the saloon, all in flames, and running aft, fell on the deck. A tall lady, supposed to be Mrs. Maclaren, entreated some one to take care of her child, but she would not enter either of the boats. Dineford, the quartermaster, placed one lady passenger in a boat; but she, being extremely agitated, got out again, and although Henry Williams and another, used some force, and begged her to go in, she persisted in remaining on board. The stewardess, Mrs. Scott, with her bonnet and shawl on, and something in her hand, first asked Steer to put her in the dingy, and them left for a larger boat. At the time of leaving, some of those who yet lived were kneeling on the deck praying to God for mercy, while others, almost in a state of nudity, were running about screaming with horror. Williams and Passmore had to climb the starboard paddle-box through the flames and smoke. They succeeded after three attempts, and then slid down hands and face over the paddle-box into the boat; several went down by the tackles. Two of the watch below, (Williams and Foster) had their hair burnt while coming on deck. Captain Symons ordered no one to get into the boats. This order was obeyed until the people saw the flames overpowering the ship. He was last seen with the man at the wheel, ordering the helm to be put up, so as to keep the ship before the wind. His last words were, "It is all over with her." Mr. Henry Roberts, chief officer, in his shirt only, was actively assisting the captain; he was last seen going through the companion down to the main deck, and is supposed to have perished there. Mr. Lewis, third officer, Mr. Goodridge, fourth officer, and the two midshipmen, some of whose berths were forward, on the port side of the main deck, were probably suffocated, as were also the chief engineer Mr. Geo. Angus, and Mr. Allen superintending engineer under Mr. Seward, as they were seen in the engine-room ten minutes before the fire broke out, going forward, there being no possibility of their return through the flames. The second engineer, Mr. William Angus, was on the spar deck, between the funnel and the crank grating, pulling oars, and throwing them out of the way of the fire on the deck, near the boats.

Among the passengers was Mr. Eliot Warburton, the well-known author, who had been deputed by the Atlantic and Pacific Junction Company to come to a friendly understanding with the tribes of Indians who inhabit the Isthmus of Darien. It was also the intention of Mr. Warburton to make himself perfectly acquainted with every part of these districts, and with whatever referred to their topography, climate, and resources.

Not the least interesting episode in the tragedy is the escape of the dingy, due to the calmness and intrepidity of young Mr. Vincent, who, though a mere boy in years, proved himself a thorough man and sailor on the occasion. He not only guided his small boat in safety till he joined the lifeboat, but, there he took immediate command as superior officer, and did everything in his power to sustain the courage of the crew throughout that dreadful night. From a written statement laid by him before the directors of the Company, we extract some interesting particulars respecting the attempt to launch the boats, which, partly owing to their peculiar fittings, but more to the speed of the vessel and the roll of the sea, so lamentably failed.

"The mail boat," writes Mr. Vincent, "when lowered, was immediately swamped, with about twenty-five people in her, all of whom were lost. The pinnace, when lowered, sheered across the sea before the people in her could unhook the fore-tackle. They were thereby washed out, and the boat remained hanging by the bow. While clearing away the second cutter, a sea struck her and raised her off the carnes and unhooked the bow-tackle. The fore end immediately fell down, and the people in her, with the exception of two who hung doubled over the thwarts, were precipitated into the sea and drowned. Sixteen men (including two passengers) succeeded in clearing away and lowering the life-boat on the starboard side. They used every endeavor to save those in the water, but were swept past so rapidly that their exertions were without avail. At about the same time I, with the chief steward, one passenger, and two seamen, got into and lowered the dingy, and were picked up by the life-boat about a half an hour afterward, when we immediately took the small boat in tow, and stood down for the ship, but the wind and sea increasing, and the dingy being upset, and ourselves being nearly swamped, we were obliged to let the small boat go, and keep the life boat with her head to the sea. * * * About 4 A. M. it rained heavily, wind shifted to northward, decreasing sea, confused, but going down; put the boat about, and kept before it. At five the magazine exploded, and about half an hour afterward the funnels went over the side, soon after which the ship went down bodily."

After this the boat was pulled before the sea and wind, thinking to make the French coast, which was, as they thought, the nearest. Mr. Vincent's monkey jacket, being mounted on an oar, was their only sail, and the boat was kept dry by bailing her with his boots. So they proceeded until rescued by the Marsden.

The adventures of Mr. Thomas Sisley, one of the passengers taken out of the dingy, and saved in the after lifeboat, on board the Amazon, are almost fabulous. Mr. Sisley was in bed when the fire raged, and was awakened by the berth being filled with smoke; he jumped out immediately, and, snatching up the nearest garment, a coat belonging to his friend, hastily rushed through the cabin to the deck. The horrible scene which now presented itself seemed, as in the case of most of the survivors, to have paralyzed his senses and to have temporarily disturbed his recollection. Having got from the burning ship into one of the boats which fouled her tackle, he was precipitated into the sea, and, providentially for him, succeeded by swimming in getting on board the dingy.

The value of the Amazon when ready for sea was about £100,000, and she is understood to have cost the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company fully that sum. The value of the specie, quick-silver, cargo, &c., when added to the value of the ship will give a total loss of property of little less than £200,000 sterling. The wives, families, friends, and connections of most of the crew of the Amazon reside in Southampton, and the melancholy event has caused a deep gloom in the town.

First Visit to the Crystal Palace.

A clergyman in Franklin county is furnishing to the Greenfield Republic some very readable sketches of his observations during a tour to the Great Exhibition, and other objects of interest in the Old World. We copy his account of the impressions produced by his first visit to the Crystal Palace:—

"Six millions of people never went to see any other wonder in six months. Two and a quarter millions of dollars were never before received at the door of one exhibition in six months. No man or woman has ever said that they paid too much for the show. You may be sure there is not and never was any human thing in the world so attractive as this; nothing which it would take you so long to see; nothing with which your mind would be held so long charmed, on which you could so long study profitably; nothing, in the make of which so much thought and genius was expended, so many fingers employed, such beauties, utilities, varieties, novelties wrought out. In no other spot was there seen such a collection of the world's arts and thoughts, nor so many intelligent people to be seen together in so beautiful a palace. There were three exhibitions every day: the people, the palace, and the things in it. The sight of each was worth ten times the price paid for seeing the whole.

"I did not venture right square into the palace at first, but shied round a little. I rode to the opposit eside of Hyde Park, three and a half miles west from the center of London. This park contains four hundred acres of ground. It is surrounded by miles of houses, so that it is in the midst of the city. On a warm sunny afternoon, July 9th, I entered at the north-east corner, and walked into it some distance, and looked around. The park is bordered with trees, so that you see the buildings only occasionally through the openings, and single trees and clusters were scattered thinly around. I was in a large, undulated, rich pasture, and perhaps one hundred cows were near me, quietly lying or standing. I only heard the hum of London, and only saw a New-England country scene. It was in this home place, in the great London pasture, among the trees and the cows, that I first saw the top of the Crystal Palace glittering in the light, and the flags of all the world waving in the breeze. There it is, the veritable palace, and no fiction. Few people were in sight. I was alone, and indulged in the wild frenzy of excitement and of imagination, and there was a luxury of thoughts and feelings gushing up, which few occasions in this world move so mightily. Nor were they chiefly of this world. I thought of my early dream of heaven and its magnificent palaces. I thought of the value of God's love to me, more precious than the lands and palaces and royalty of England. This was the best time and place that could have been chosen to get the first look at the World's Fair, nor would I exchange the pleasure of this hour with any other in Europe.

"I walked two or three times round the palace, sure that no one class of things within could be so magnificent a show as the building itself. This was my first day's visit to the gathering of the industry of all nations. As I turned away, I remembered that 'great effects come from little causes.' Four years ago, a sea-captain brought from South America a large water-lily, which was cultivated the following season in the garden at Chatsworth. The following winter, Mr. Paxton invented a beautiful glass house to cover it. He says that this house for the lily helped him to the idea of the glass palace. It was this lily, brought over just in time, and falling under the care of that one mind, without which the palace would never have been; and even then it was thought of at the very last moment, for another plan had been adopted by the building committee, and Mr. Paxton worked night and day to get his plan before them. The next morning at ten o'clock I drove boldly up to the gate, paid my shilling, (24 cents,) and commenced the six weeks' labor of examining the things within."

American Present to an English Authoress.

Some time since, Messrs. Bryant, Clarke, and other literary gentlemen of New York, circulated a subscription among writers in all parts of the Union for the purpose of presenting a testimonial of regard to Mrs. Mary Cowden Clarke, the authoress of an elaborate and very useful "Concordance" to Shakspere. The subscription embraced names from nearly every State in the Union. The present decided upon was a costly and beautiful Library Chair, composed of rosewood, elaborately carved. On the top rail there is an exquisitely carved face of Shakspere in ivory, from the Stratford bust, surrounded by a wreath of oak leaves and laurel, while the wings of two swans, also in alto relievo, extend over the ivory head as a protection. On the lower front are the masks of Tragedy and Comedy, with their appropriate emblems. The writing-desk, also of rosewood, moves on a silver-plated crane. The material with which the chair is covered is a rich satin brocade. The inscription on the gold plate under the head of Shakspere is as follows:—

"To Mrs. Mary Cowden Clarke, this Chair is presented by a few Ladies and Gentlemen of America, as a tribute of gratitude for the unequaled industry which gave the readers of English throughout the world her Concordance to Shakspere."

This beautiful article has just been presented to the gifted lady by Hon. Abbott Lawrence, our Minister at London. The subscription was limited to $5 each, and the first name on the list was that of Daniel Webster. The whole cost of this fine present was about $400. The "Concordance," which was the immediate cause of this testimonial, occupied Mrs. Clarke for twelve years, and is a remarkable monument of female industry and perseverance.

The Secret of Good Writing.

The secret of good writing seems to lie in this simple maxim: Be sure you have an idea before you attempt to express it. If you clearly comprehend in your own mind what you wish to communicate, nature and reason, together with a little practice, will most certainly teach you how to say it, and how to say it in an appropriate manner.

A single idea is fully sufficient for one mind to manage at one time. And it may be added, that if the idea is one of much importance, it would be most dignified by being honored with a private carriage.

"Divide and conquer," is as valuable a rule in literary as in military tactics. The more extensive the theme which the writer proposes to himself to discuss, the less, usually, he has to say upon it. Such subjects can be mastered with ease only by descending from generals to particulars, and treating of subjects in their individual parts.

There is nothing more popular, especially with young writers, than brilliancy of style. This manner of writing is certainly excellent in its proper place, but there are many topics which do not require this quality, and many indeed are much injured by it. The language of every dissertation should be that which is best calculated to express the thought in the happiest manner.

As the rays of the sun will not enkindle a blaze unless brought to a focus, so the thoughts of a writer will not set the hearts of his readers on fire, unless all are made to converge to a single point.

Some writers seem unable ever to express themselves in a cool, calm, rational manner, on any subject. With them every virtue is godlike, every fault a felony every breeze a tempest, every mole-hill a mountain. They appear to think their manner of writing is sublimity; but their judicious readers (if they have any such) call it turgidity and absurdity.

The design of language is to give expression to thought; that style of writing, therefore, must necessarily be the best, which most rapidly, most clearly and perfectly conveys to the reader's mind what the writer intended he should understand. [Goethe.

An Emperor's Gift.

At the late World's Exhibition was a box of exquisite and costly construction, given by the Sovereign of Russia to his Empress. The New York Tribune describes it as follows:—

"One of the most remarkable things, in point of workmanship, to be seen in the building, is a large box of ebony, the top and sides of which are ornamented with clusters of fruit, of the natural size, all carved out of precious stones, immense quantities of each having been cut up in search of portions possessing the particular flaws which serve to produce the effect of the seeds, veins, and other natural peculiarities, which are imitated with such perfect truthfulness, that the birds would infallibly peck them if they got the chance. Look at these purple grapes, cut out of amethyst; how exquisitely shaded the rich, luscious berries, paler underneath, and seemingly covered with a soft bloom! it needs all the reiterated asseverations of the Russian Commissioner who mounts guard over this wonderful result of patience and skill, (said to be especially dear to the Emperor's heart,) to persuade us that all this shading was natural, and that no coloring process whatever has been resorted to; these berries of the mountain ash, carved out of coral; these plums, formed of one of the rarest and costliest stones, the onyx; these cherries, through whose transparent skin the juice seems starting; and these white and red currants, every seed and vein showing through the transparent pulp, all of red and white cornelian; these pears, of agate, whose mottled and sun-browned rind might challenge competition with the finest Bergamot, the ripest Duchess, that ever hung on sunniest espalier. All these fruits, except the grapes, which are whole, are in semi-relief only, and are seemingly imbedded in the wood. The leaves are of jasper, and are fully as wonderful as the fruit, every little vein, withered spot, or slimy trace of caterpillar, being rendered with scrupulous accuracy. This coffer, the rims and edges of which are richly carved, was prepared at the Emperor's command, as a present to the Empress, and cost only the trifling sum of thirty thousand dollars!"

Lawsuits.

Of all the suits worn by men, the lawsuit has been longest in vogue, and appears to be as fashionable now as ever; we expect its costliness has done much to keep up its respectability. Its durability is remarkable, and furnishes its principal recommendation; for it may be safely warranted to last as long as the wearer may desire. Indeed, there have been instances in which these suits have endured long after the patience of the wearer has worn threadbare; and one who has been thus "clothed upon," sometimes finds it exceedingly inconvenient to undress himself when he wishes. If, through any fault of the maker, or in the material, the customer be non-suited, there is no way in which he can be re-dressed—lawsuits are never warranted to fit. The fact that most of the articles composing it are custom-made, will in part explain the extreme durability of this kind of suit; slop-work never wears well; and every one who has had any experience in our courts, must have perceived that nine-tenths of a lawsuit is the unmistakable handiwork of custom. The everlastingness of a suit furnishes a striking exemplification of the superiority of custom-work. The whole law toggery, from top to toe, is condemned by some as clumsy and inefficient; we, more conservative, shall content ourselves with finding fault only with the continuations, as being the most provoking and disagreeable part of the suit. Electro-Physiology.

The fact that certain species of fishes possess the power of producing benumbing sensations and shocks, was noticed very early, as appears by the writings of Pliny and Aristotle. This power has been found by modern science to be identical with that of electricity. Several different species of fishes are known in our time, as producing electricity at will; among them the Silurus, the Gymnotus and the Torpedo are preëminent. Humboldt, traveling in South America, had the opportunity of seeing horses knocked down by the Gymnotus, and experienced severe pain in his knees during a whole day, from having unconsciously trodden on one just drawn out of the water. The source of this magnetic power has been traced by learned men to vesicular organs, filled with a mucous substance, subserving the purpose of a galvanic battery. In one organ Mr. Hunter counted 1,182 different cells, all connected by nerves. In studying these facts, Prof. Beckeinsteiner, of Lyons, was struck by the analogy of the cells of electric fishes with certain minute vessels, united by nerves and moistened by mucus, which exist in nearly all kinds of animals, and are found most developed in man at the period of the greatest strength, but collapsed and dried up in old age. He began a series of experiments, and after three years' investigation has lately published the following result: When the temperature is below 32°, the wind North, and the sky clear, expose a cat to the cold until its fur lies close to the skin and appears greasy; expose your hands to make them equally cold; then take the animal on your knees, apply the fingers of your left hand on its breast, and pass your right hand down its back, pressing moderately; at the fifth or sixth pass you will receive a slight electric shock. At first the cat appears pleased, but as soon as it feels the shock it jumps away, and will not stand a repetition of the experiment during the same day. After the experiment the animal looks tired; some days after it loses its appetite, seeks solitude, drinks water at rare intervals, and dies in a fortnight. The same experiment has succeeded with rabbits; they die the same day. It is unsuccessful with dogs. Once only it has been made on a cow; she was tied to an iron ring; the ground was frozen; one hand was placed on the breast and the other passed down the back, when such an electric shock occurred that Mr. B. was thrown to the ground. The cow appeared very much irritated, but it was impossible to know if she suffered from it, since she was killed by a butcher three days afterward.

Flowers Blooming Artificially.

Some weeks ago, a curious experiment was made at Paris, by Mr. Herbert, in the presence of a select audience, including several reporters of the press. A canvas awning had been put up near the Boulevard, and a flower-garden prepared inside, and planted with Lilies, Chrysanthemums, Africans, Dahlias, Thyme, Laorels, Roses, Sun-flowers, Daisies, and Asters. All these plants were couvered with buds which would have required at least a fortnight to bloom naturally, but having been lately removed, they were in a drooping state. Mr. H. came in with some gardeners, and they began the experiments. At first they watered a Lily and Dahlia with a red liquor, and covered them with bell-glasses. Immediately the temperature rose inside by the ebullitions of the compound, and the men, by applying their hands on the glass, and opening or shutting a small valve fixed on it, appeared to measure and regulate the heat. After ten minutes, the glasses were removed, and, to the delight of all, the plants were covered with full-grown flowers, filling the air with their perfume. To prevent any suspicion of foul play, a flower-pot was suspended by wires, and the experiment repeated on it. In the end, all the flowers were blown, and each lady went away with a magnificent nosegay.

AN EDITOR'S LEAVE-TAKING.—The following is the valedictory article of an editor out West:—

"The undersigned retires from the editorial chair with complete conviction that all is vanity. From the hour he started his paper to the present time, he has been solicited to lie upon every given subject, and can't remember ever having told a wholesome truth without diminishing his subscription list or making an enemy. Under these circumstances of trial, and having a thorough contempt for himself, he retires, in order to recruit his moral constitution."

James Purdy, who carries the U. S. Mail between Elkton (Md.) and Chesnut Level, Pa., was fired upon the other day by some person in ambush near Centerville, Pa.

THE LIABILITY OF TELEGRAPHS.—The case of Edward Shields vs. the Washington and New-Orleans Telegraph Company was tried bofore the Fifth District Court of New Orleans, a few days ago, which determined several points of much interest to the community generally, and to telegraph companies and those having dealings with them particularly. The plaintiff sued for $164 damages, arising from the incorrect transmission of a telegraphic dispatch, in which the words "sixty-six" were substituted in the price of oats for "fifty-six," the correct number. The company refunded the cost of the dispatch, but resisted any liability incurred by the mistake of the operator.

Judge Buchanan charged directly against any liability incurred by the Company for mistake of this kind, because uncontrollable influences from atmospheric causes are likely to derange the wires and pervert a telegraphic message. It is unreasonable to apply the doctrine which applies to common carriers to a case like the present. The carrier is responsible for the merchandize entrusted to his care, but that merchandize has an appreciable value.

Judgement was given for the plantiff to the amount of $3 50 (the cost of the message) and the cost of the Court.

EDUCATION IN ITALY.—118 elementary schools of the first grade for boys, and 25 for girls, are supported by the Sardinian Government; 4,242 schools of a second grade of boys, and 1,259 for girls. There are also 591 male private schools, and 602 for girls. The amount expended in support of these schools exceeds $330,000 a year, and the number of pupils is stated to be 200,000. There are 104 institutions of a higher grade, with 900 teachers and 12,000 pupils. In the Universities there are 3,000 students, for the support of which the Government gives $125,000 annually, and the same sum to the schools.

Gouverner Morris, if we may judge by the testimony afforded by his treatment of his wife in his will, must have been truly the "model husband." He was not one of your modern skinflints, who cut off a wife's inheritance if she happens to marry again; not he. Quite the contrary. In his will, made a short time before his death, after settling upon his wife a liberal allowance, he says: "And in case my wife should marry, I give her six hundred dollars more per annum, to defray the increased expenditure which may attend the connection."

A patent has been granted in England to William Stone for an improvement in the fabrication of safety paper. The object has been to manufacture a paper which indicates by a change of color any attempt to dissolve the ink of written characters by chemical agents. The mixture to add with the pulp of a ream of post weighing 18 pounds is: 1 oz. iodine of potassium; ¼ oz. ferrocyanide of potassium; 1 lb starch. One of the salts will be dissolved in an attempt to absorb ink marks, and will produce a brown or a Prussian-blue color.

A plan has been devised at Boston to raise a crop of Ice when the season is too mild to freeze the ponds to a sufficient depth. It is thus: Near a pond, but on a lower level, an artificial reservoir will be dug, 25 acres in extent. By the opening of a gate, water will be let in, two feet deep; as soon as the surface is frozen, water will be introduced again to one or two inches deep, which will freeze easily, and so on until the Ice is thick enough to be cut and taken out. The work is calculated to cost $50,000.

A patent has been granted in England to J. Ashworth, to prevent Incrustations in Steam Boilers. His claim is the introduction in the boiler of a compound composed as follows: 32 parts coal-tar and 21 of linseed water in volume are mixed together and added to 5 parts of plumbago pulverized, and 8 parts of Castile soap in weight; every three days one pound of the creamy mixture for every thirty horse-power is to be introduced in the boiler.

An American writer says:—"We are born in a hurry; we are educated with speed; we make a fortune with the wave of a wand, and lose it in like manner, to re-make and re-lose it in the twinkling of an eye. Our body is a locomotive, traveling at ten leagues an hour; our spirit is a high-pressure engine; our life resembles a shooting star; and death surprises us like an electric stroke."

Six things, says Hamilton, are requisite to create a "happy home." Integrity must be the architect, and tidiness the upholsterer. It must be warmed by affection, and lighted up with cheerfulness; and industry must be the ventilator, renewing the atmosphere and bringing in fresh salubrity day by day; while over all, as a protecting canopy and glory, nothing will suffice except the blessing of God.

It is a remarkable fact, that not one solitary conviction has yet taken place in any of the cases of rescue of fugitives. Bad as public sentiment is, it is not quite so bad as the law, or as the public authorities and trafficking politicians of the country.

THE Academic Year commences the last Wednesday in August, and closes the last Tuesday in June of each year.

Board of Instruction.
Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress.
Rev. J. W. MORTON, } Assistants.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, }

The Terms for 1851 and 1852 are as follows:—
The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.
" Second " Dec. 3 " " March 16.
" Third " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one of two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term, Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.
Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS.

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00
Drawing,	1 00
Monochromatic Painting	3 00
Oil Painting,	5 00
Writing and Stationery,	0 50
Vocal Music, Elementary,	1 00
Advanced Class,	2 00
Instrumental Music,	8 00

Use of Organ or Piano, $2 00 per quarter.

BOARD, in private families, per week, from $1 25 to $1 50; in clubs, from 60 to 90 cents.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall Term, and at the middle of the Winter Term, and continue seven weeks. The course will embrace a thorough review of the common school branches, with daily lectures on "The Art of Teaching," Chemistry, Physiology, Laws of Health, School Laws, &c., &c. Tuition $2 50.

Students should not be furnished with unnecessary pocket-money, neither should minors be allowed to contract debts in the village. Either member of the Faculty will superintend the financial affairs of pupils placed under their care, by special direction from parents and guardians, if funds are furnished in advance.

THE SABBATH & THE RESURRECTION.

From "An Examination of the Authority for a Change of the Weekly Sabbath at the Resurrection of Christ; proving that the Practice of the Church in substituting the First Day of the Week for the appointed Seventh Day, is unsanctioned by the New Testament Scriptures. By JAMES A. BEGG. Author of a Connected View of the Scripture Evidence of Christ's Speedy Return, &c." [Continued.

Although not properly included in the subject of our inquiry regarding the effect of the Resurrection, one point farther we would briefly consider. By those who maintain a change of the Sabbath, it is affirmed that the Apostles and the apostolic churches, after the ascension of our Lord, did, by their practice, indicate that the first day of the week was, henceforth, to be the weekly Sabbath. Two texts are specially relied upon, as supposed to imply that meetings of the Church were held upon that day; and this, it is assumed, is evidence that the Sabbath had been changed. The texts referred to are Acts xx. 7, and 1 Cor. xvi. 2, being, as already noticed, the only instances, besides the texts referring to the Resurrection of Christ, in which our translators have rendered mia by the word "first."

The Apostolic injunction in the latter of these texts, according to the authorized version, is, "Upon the first day of the week, let every one of you lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him, that there be no gatherings when I come." 1 Cor. xvi. 2. Here, then, we have to remark, there is no mention whatever of any meeting of the Church, either on one day or another, nor any thing justly implying this. Whatever opportunity such meetings, whensoever held, may be supposed to have afforded for making collections, they are not in this instance made available. The collections here enjoined are not directed to be made in the congregation, but "every one" is to "lay by him in store" what he could allot for the special purpose. Wycliffe's translation is, "Each of you keep (or lay up) at himself;" (Pickering's edition, 1848; and Gaultier, London, 1550,) with the same understanding of the meaning, more freely renders the text, "Let every one of you put aside at home, and lay up, what he thinketh meet."

There is no connection between this arrangement and the church meetings; and the use so made of the text is not only unsupported by its language, but is in opposition to it. The injunction is not to take any thing to the church, or to make any collection there, but each was to lay past, in private, a proportion of his gains, for a specified purpose. No one was directed in the mean time to take charge of the collective amount. This the Apostle designed himself to do; therefore, says he, "let every one of you lay by him in store as God hath prospered him, that there be no gatherings when I come."

This was an extraordinary collection; it was not for the poor of the Corinthian church itself, but was in aid of those of another. It would, therefore, be but a temporary arrangement, we may suppose; since it was designed to serve only a temporary purpose. It seems, also, to have been enjoined only on particular churches. It was intended to meet a present emergency. "And when I come," says the Apostle, "whomsoever ye shall approve by your letters, them will I send to bring your liberality to Jerusalem." Ver. 3. It was, therefore, a contribution rendered necessary by the incidental poverty of the saints at Jerusalem; dependent, consequently, for its origin, on their need. The appointment is thus introduced: "Now, concerning the collection for the saints, as I have given order to the churches of Galatia, even so do ye." Ver. 1. Referring to his Epistle to the Galatians, we find that other of the Apostles to whom the care of "the circumcision" was committed, while Paul and Barnabas were laboring among the Gentiles, when giving to them the right hand of fellowship, they would, says Paul, "that we should remember the poor; the same," adds the Apostle, "which I also was forward to do." Gal. ii. 7—10.

In his second Epistle, again referring to this "ministering to the saints," Paul says, he knew the forwardness of mind of the Corinthians in the case, adding, "for which I boast of you to them of Macedonia, that Achaia was ready a year ago." 2 Cor. ix. 1, 2. And in another Epistle, referring to the result, he says, "Now I go unto Jerusalem, to minister unto the saints. For it hath pleased them of Macedonia and Achaia to make a certain contribution for the poor saints which are at Jerusalem." Rom. xv. 25, 26. It was not an arrangement made to provide continually for the poor amongst themselves, but only "a certain contribution," extending, indeed, in collection, over a considerable period, yet only for the particular occasion, and to be continued only till Paul came. It was "for the poor saints which are at Jerusalem." It "pleased them of Macedonia and Achaia" to make it; but we are not warranted to conclude, that beyond those limits, all the brethren contributed for this special object.

Elsewhere, also, we learn that Agabus, a Christian prophet from Jerusalem, foretold a great dearth, "which came to pass in the days of Claudius Cæsar. Then the disciples, every man according to his ability, determined to send relief unto the brethren that dwelt in Judea; which also they did, and sent it to the elders by the hands of Barnabas and Saul." Acts xi. 28—30. In this instance, it seems to have been a wholly spontaneous act; and we are not told in what manner the contribution was made, or whether the "relief" sent had not been instantaneously collected.

But, in the case we are considering, a methodical arrangement is suggested to, or rather enjoined upon, the Corinthian church; and a considerable period for its completion appears to have been contemplated from the first. Accordingly, the Apostle gives this direction, (according to our translation,) "Upon the first day of the week, let every one of you lay by him in store." But, again, we must observe, that, whatever be the true meaning, we have not, here, in regard to the day, a correct rendering of the Original. The clause is not even quite the same, in the Greek, as in the texts we have considered, concerning the Resurrection, although given in the authorized version as if it were. Here, it is, "Kata mian Sabbaton;" and in this connection, the kata, as in numerous other instances, obviously signifies every; as kata polin, "every city;" Luke viii. 1; Titus i. 5; kata tas synagogos, "in every synagogue;" Acts xxii. 19; kata ecclesian, "every church." Acts xiv. 23. So, the clause, (with the usual mistranslation of mia and Sabbaton,) Macknight still reads, "On the first day of every week." "Mian," however, in the New Testament Scriptures, we have already proved to signify one, and not first; and "Sabbaton" is again the genitive plural of the word ordinarily used to signify the Sabbath; so that, literally translated, it would read "every one of the Sabbaths." Indeed, of the early Protestant writers, Victorinus, Strigelius, Hunnius, Aretus, and Primrose, are all referred to, as stating that the phrase may mean "Sabbath by Sabbath," or "on the days of the Sabbaths." Griesbach, however, among his Various Readings, as given in the Greek version of Bagster's Polyglott New Testament, gives, (instead of the plural,) "Sabbatou," of the Sabbath, in the genitive singular, as a reading "not to be despised," though, in his opinion, "inferior to the received text." Even although this reading were well established, we do not see that it would remove the difficulty arising from the peculiarity of the phrase in the Original. But certainly "every Sabbath," or "every one of the Sabbaths," would still be a translation more in accordance with the usual meaning of the Greek words employed, than the first day of the week.

But whether the injunction had regard to every Sabbath, or to the first day of every week, as binding the members of the churches of Corinth and Galatia, "every one" to "lay by him in store," as God had prospered him, would this be evidence that the Sabbath had been changed to the first day of the week? The fact of every individual being thus enjoined to lay by him in store for the poor saints at Jerusalem, a proportion of his gains, can with no propriety be regarded as an indication that the day on which this was done must have been a day sanctified unto the Lord. It might be done either on the Sabbath, or on one of "the six working days." And yet, notwithstanding of the confident appeals made unto it, there is really nothing more in the text, than this putting aside the destined gift, "at home," as Gaultier has it, whether done on Sabbath or Sunday. How strange that we should be required to regard it as proof that the Sabbath had already been changed from the seventh day to the first? Not one of the inspired penmen has said a word of any such change! There is not, indeed, another instance in any one of the Epistles, in which, even in our translation, the first day of the week is so much as named. In the Greek, even here, the first day is not named; nor is there the least mention, either in the Original or translation, of any church meeting, on the assumption of which, such perversion of God's Sabbath has been based.

The text adduced from the book of Acts, contains, indeed, the account of a church meeting; but we can discover as little in it of a change of the Sabbath. Referring to the fact of Paul and his companions having reached Troas, and of their abiding there seven days, the account, according to our version, intimates that, "Upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached unto them, ready to depart on the morrow." Acts xx. 7. The narrative proceeds to state, how, "as Paul was long preaching," a young man, having sunk into sleep, fell and was killed—for this mention of the breaking of bread, and of Paul's preaching, seem to be, not for the purpose of informing us of the church order, but to be altogether owing to the accident, and the miracle by which the young man was restored to life.

We are often told, by those who assert a warrant for the change of the Sabbath, about the frequent mention of the first day of the week, and its observance as the Sabbath. Now, it is worthy of observation, that the Book of Acts, the only inspired history we possess of the earliest progress of Christianity, has recorded all the remarkable circumstances connected with its development from the time of Christ's ascension, without having at all intimated that any change of the Sabbath had been made. From the first chapter to the twentieth, in which the case at Troas is recorded, the first day of the week has not, either truly in the Original, or in the translation, even by mistake, once been mentioned, until we have thus reached to an event in the 60th year of the Christian era. Not a single syllable is there of the supposed transfer of the blessing to it. And even now, when we have, (in the translation,) mention of that day in reference to other matters, merely, it still says not a word of the asserted change, or of another day being substituted for the original Sabbath.

We have, indeed, account here of a meeting of the church, and of their having come together "to break bread." But, surely, neither a meeting nor the breaking of bread constitute a Sabbath; and any mention, therefore, of this being done, even on the first day of the week, could not, without divine revelation of the fact, prove that day to have taken the place of the seventh. We are informed at the very commencement of the church's history, and that when this very writer is expressly giving us an account of the church observances, of the brethren "continuing daily with one accord in the Temple, and breaking bread from house to house," or, at every house. (Acts ii. 46.) We do not, then, dispute that at Troas they met and brake bread on the first day of the week; we believe that there, as well as at Jerusalem, they would do so "daily." But this did not create a daily Sabbath. When met for the purpose of commemorating Christ's death, "Paul preached unto them, ready to depart on the morrow;" but neither did the Apostle's farewell discourse create a Sabbath. In season and out of season, he availed himself of opportunities; and being ready to depart on the morrow, he had a more than common inducement prompting him to preach.

But, in regard to the particular day, let us again examine the Original. "En de te mia ton Sabbaton," are the Greek words which are again rendered, in the authorized version, "the first day of the week." Here is the same mistranslation of mia, by the word "first" instead of one, and the same assumption that ton Sabbaton, (the genitive plural,) "of the Sabbaths," means "week." Very competent scholars have, however, taken very different views of the meaning designed. The Genevan Testament, as given in Bagster's Hexapla, has, "the first day after the Sabbath;" and Gaultier, (already referred to,) renders, "on the morrow after the Sabbath day;" which, when applied to the weekly Sabbath, would, of course, be the first day of the week. Yet it is to be observed, that if the writer says "the morrow after the Sabbath," he does, by the very form of the statement, prove that the true Sabbath itself still existed; and that "the morrow after" could not also be the Sabbath. There is, therefore, an important difference between the first day of the week, simply, and "the morrow after the Sabbath;" for if the latter phrase were the correct one, the church's perversion would be apparent.

We have already remarked on the supposed necessity of supplying a word agreeing in gender with mia, which Sabbaton does not. Whether the rule requiring this be absolute, we pretend not to judge. Although recognized as a general rule, it may not, perhaps, be without exception. And, unless driven to their conclusion by a feeling of the acknowledged difficulties of the text, such exception the rule must have been supposed to have, by very eminent scholars, who, here, understand "the Sabbath," itself, to be spoken of. Tyndale, New Testament, (in Bagster's edition, 1836,) reads, "On a Sabbath day;" Cranmer, (in Bagster's Hexapla,) "Upon one of the Sabbath days;" and Erasmus, "One day of the Sabbaths." Calvin, also, although he supposes the Evangelists, in their account of the Resurrection, to mean first when they write "mia," one, himself, here, reads, "and upon one day of the Sabbaths;" adding in his commentary upon the phrase, "Either doth he mean the first day of the week, which was next after the Sabbath, or else, some certain Sabbath. Which latter thing," Calvin continues, "may seem to me more probable; for this cause, because that day was more fit for an assembly according to custom." Referring here to his scholarship only, we may yet note his concluding remark: "Also, it is a likely matter that Paul waited for the Sabbath, that, the day before his departure, he might the more easily gather all the disciples into one place." Commentary on Acts; (Calvin Translation Society's edition, 1844.)

The result, then, of our investigation, is, that not merely is there no evidence in this text of a change of the Sabbath, because of the church's having met for the purpose of breaking bread, but ground for inquiry, whether the day here spoken of, on which Paul preached to them, was not rather the unchanged Sabbath of the Lord. We do not affirm this positively; for we do not seek to underrate the difficulty arising from the peculiar construction of these texts. But, while equally desirous of avoiding the sin of exaggerating such difficulties, we cannot but regard the statement of the text as a singular foundation, on which to rest, in any degree, such important issues as are involved in any asserted change of the divinely-appointed Sabbath.

BEAUTIFUL FIGURE.

Two painters were employed to fresco the walls of a magnificent cathedral; both stood on a rude scaffolding constructed for the purpose some forty feet from the floor. One of them was so intent upon his work that he became wholly absorbed, and in admiration stood off from the picture, gazing at it with intense delight. Forgetting where he was, he moved backwards slowly, surveying critically the work of his pencil, until he had neared the very edge of the plank upon which he stood.

At this critical moment, his companion turned suddenly, and, almost frozen with horror, beheld his imminent peril; another instant and the enthusiast would be precipitated upon the pavement beneath; if he spoke to him, it was certain death—if he held his peace, death was equally sure. Suddenly he regained his presence of mind, and seizing a wet brush, flung it against the wall, spattering the beautiful picture with unsightly blotches of coloring. The painter flew forward, and turned upon his friend with fierce imprecations; but startled at his ghastly face, he listened to the recital of danger, looked shudderingly over the dread space below, and with tears of gratitude blessed the hand that saved him.

So, said a preacher, we sometimes get absorbed in looking upon the pictures of this world, and in contemplating them, step backwards, unconscious of our peril; when the Almighty dashes out the beautiful images, and we spring forward to lament their destruction—into the outstretched arms of mercy, and are saved.

WAKEFUL HOURS.

The mother of two living ministers related one evening the following anecdote:—When, in her childhood, a distinguished New England judge was visiting at her father's, and the conversation fell upon the ways of correcting or employing wakefulness at night, the judge said playfully, his way of getting to sleep was to count a flock of sheep. The child's mother rejoined, that she could tell him a better and surer way than that; it was to repeat Watts' Hymns. This impressed so powerfully the eager listening daughter, that she resolved that very moment, with a natural impulsiveness, to learn by heart as many of Watts' Hymns as she possibly could. The result is, that now, at more than threescore and ten, there are few of that unrivaled collection of hymns which she cannot repeat, and her mother's recipe for employing wakeful hours, often proves a balm to her spirit. Next to the Bible, she says, nothing in all her life has given her so much consolation as the hymns she learned in her childhood.

SUNNY DAYS IN WINTER.

Summer is a glorious season,
  Warm, and bright, and pleasant;
But the past is not a reason
  To despise the present.
So, while health can climb the mountain,
  And the log lights up the hall,
There are sunny days in winter,
  After all!

Spring, no doubt, hath faded from us,
  Maiden-like in charms;
Summer, too, with all her promise,
  Perished in our arms.
But the memory of the vanished,
  Whom our hearts recall,
Maketh sunny days in winter,
  After all!

True, there's scarce a flower that bloometh,
  All the best are dead;
But the wall-flower still perfumeth
  Yonder garden bed.
And the lily-flowered arbutus
  Hugs its coral ball;
There are sunny days in winter,
  After all!

Summer trees are pretty, very,
  And I love them well;
But this holly's glistening berry
  None of those excel.
While the fir can warm the landscape,
  And the ivy clothes the wall,
There are sunny days in winter,
  After all!

Sunny hours in every season
  Wait the innocent—
Those who taste with love and reason
  What their God hath sent.
Those who neither soar too highly,
  Nor too lowly fall,
Feel the sunny days of winter,
  After all!

Then, although our darling treasures
  Vanish from the heart;
Then, although our once-loved pleasures
  One by one depart:
Though the tomb loom in the distance,
  And the mourning pall,
There is sunshine, and no winter,
  After all! [Dub. Univ. Mag.

CHRISTIANITY AT THE WEST.

The Christian Churches of the West are not the Christian Churches of the East. They are the reformed Baptists, who indignantly renounce the term Campbellite, as a reproachful and unjust stigma. They profess, and I believe hold, no more reverence for Alexander Campbell than Baptists do for Fuller or Judson. They certainly have not a hundred per cent. of the reverence for Campbell that Methodists have for Wesley, Coke, and Asbury. They are spread over all the Western country. As near as I can learn, in the State of Indiana they number some fifty thousand members. I have been among them very extensively, and I find a large portion of them have not a copy of Mr. Campbell's writings in the house, and but few have his revised version of the New Testament. His views are as freely canvassed among them as the views of any other writer. There are at least four periodicals, published at the West, and circulated more extensively in some States than the Harbinger; and so far from obsequiously following Mr. Campbell, to my certain knowledge, they dispute some of his positions as stoutly as any of the "Denominational Organs" of the orthodox (?) at the East. The fact is, freedom of thought at the West prevails to such an extent, that the greater portion of the native population, born and brought up here, disdain the old party lines of orthodoxy, and speak and act their own opinions; and the conservators of old forms of faith may as well attempt to turn the Mississippi down the St. Lawrence, as to turn the public sentiment of the freeborn people of the West into the old channels of Eastern thought and faith. There is not a Campbell in the world that can control the moving phalanx of the Western States. The old cry of Campbellism, Campbellism, is regarded at the West as of the same piece with the old, stupid cry, "These men teach customs which it is not lawful for us to receive, neither to observe;" and breaks far more powerless upon the ears of the Western people.

All the Christian Churches of the West are organized upon the Bible, and the Bible alone, as the creed-book and the statute-book of the Church, without the intervention of any other written faith or discipline whatsoever. They are perfectly independent of each other, and know no other bond of union among their churches than do so many distinct families; that is, neighborhood, mutual fellowship, mutual interest, and coincidence of object, producing mutual co-operation. Their membership consists exclusively of professed believers, immersed into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. The Lord's Supper is regarded as a commemorative ordinance, and not an expression of either church or Christian fellowship; hence it is not confined to the membership of any one order of Christian Churches. Like the Dunker Baptists, and our German Seventh-day Baptists, they tell all, that the only proper persons to partake of that ordinance are immersed believers, walking in the fear of the Lord, but tender the elements to all who profess to be such, without respect to their denominational name.

They have a plurality of Eldership, who are men of years, appointed by their brethren to take the oversight of the Church, without respect to their gifts of preaching. The best preaching gifts are usually employed in itinerant labors. Minors are not usually regarded as having properly any part in the government of the Church. As much as possible, the Eldership settle disputes and regulate cases of discipline; the associate vote of the whole membership is the dernier resort. As far as I have heard their preaching, and made acquaintance with them, their teaching is as evangelical as most other denominations with which I am acquainted. Faith is regarded as the first Christian exercise; and that as the result of an attentive and favorable hearing of the Word of God. Repentance is regarded as following faith in the divine testimony respecting sin and holiness, judgment and mercy, salvation and eternal life. A believer's immersion into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, as the divinely appointed mode of adoption, birth-resurrection, or naturalization into the kingdom of heaven, whereby such believer is entitled to an interest in all the precious promises of the Holy Spirit, and all the privileges of the household of faith. All other Christian duties are taught, so far as I know, much as among most other prominent denominations.

With respect to their piety, it is much as it is in other denominations. There are many eminently devoted persons, and there are many who lack much of the spirit and character that pertains to godliness. They are without any doubt rapidly increasing, and destined to exert a powerful influence in molding the mind and faith of the population of the Western States. S. D.

SPIRITUAL ABANDONMENT.

Among the more influential of my parishioners, were two men, heads of families, who were intimately connected in business, and in the relations of life. They were generous, public-spirited, regular attendants upon public worship; were regarded as my personal friends, and exerted an important influence in the society. Still, they were averse to spiritual, heart religion, and this aversion they contrived to manifest in a thousand ways. They were opposed to special meetings, and to revivals of religion. They were not willing themselves to be approached on the subject of religion, except in a very general way. They appeared to despise the church, and were not pleased when any in their families became connected with it. In short, they were mere men of business and of the world, who, like thousands of others, opposed religion in their hearts, and wished to concern themselves about it, only so far as was necessary in order to be respectable.

The repeated revivals with which we were favored, brought the subject of religion peculiarly near to these men. It was forced upon their consideration in ways and by influences not to be resisted. They must think, and they did think. Their friends, their neighbors, the members of their own families, were converted, till they were left almost alone. They were frequently conversed with on the subject of religion, and many earnest, anxious prayers were offered up on their behalf. It was perfectly evident, in repeated instances, that the Spirit of God was striving with them, and strong hopes were entertained that they would come to the knowledge of the truth. But as often as the Holy Spirit approached them, so often they resisted his precious influences, and grieved him to depart, till it became fearfully evident to my own mind that they never would embrace the gospel. I had no special revelation on the subject, nor was I so sure of their abandonment as to cease praying and laboring for their good; but the indications were such as could not well be mistaken; and my fears for them have been more than realized. One of them, years ago, went down to a drunkard's grave; and the other was saved from it only by his inability to procure the means of gratification. He has recently died, not only in poverty and neglect, but (what is infinitely more dreadful) in seeming impenitence.

Let proud and prosperous worldlings beware, and not dare to persist in resisting and grieving the Holy Spirit. [Puritan Recorder.

READING FOR CHILDREN.

We remember the time when a friend of our boyhood, perceiving our eager desire to read, placed ten dollars at our disposal, with the injunction that it should all be laid out in books. At that time, in all these western wilds, embracing the whole valley of the Mississippi, ten dollars could not be laid out in books that were suitable for children, and even in Philadelphia, the friend who undertook to make the purchase for us, found it exceedingly difficult to expend so large a sum in that way. But lo! how great a change has come over the country since that period. At that time seventy-five volumes would have embraced nearly every book in the English language that was at all suitable to interest or instruct children. Not one fourth of that number could be procured by the children of the West. Now the Presbyterian Board of Publication, which has but lately entered upon the issuing of this description of works, has a library of nearly one hundred volumes. The American Sunday School Union issues nearly nine hundred different works; the Methodist Book Concern about five hundred; the American Tract Society about one hundred; the Mass. Sunday School Society three hundred and fifty; the Baptist Publication Society two or three hundred; the Episcopal Society several more, to which are to be added several valuable series of juvenile books by private publishers, among the most valuable of which is the Cabinet Library, consisting of above one hundred and fifty volumes, by the Messrs. Carter of New York. We may, with perfect safety, affirm that there are not less than twenty-five hundred different volumes of works for the young now issued from the American Press, and the greatest minds in the nation are now at work to prepare others. These books are published in the most attractive style, and embellished with all that the genius of the painter and the art of the engraver can throw into them. Withal they have been brought down to so low a price that they may find their way into the humblest cottage in the land, and scarcely any parent need withhold them from his child for want of means to purchase them. With such a variety to cull from, no parent need be at any loss for the appliances with which to bait the appetite of his child for reading. If one volume will not tempt him to read, let him try another and another, until his latent desire for knowledge is waked up. Ten dollars expended in this way each year for the latest and most attractive volumes which issue from the prolific press, will do more to prevent the desire to wander from home in search of forbidden pleasures, in our children, than the same amount expended in almost any other method, and then we will see its happy influence in their increased intelligence and respectability. Knowledge is power. Ignorance is weakness. [Presb. Herald.

FAMILY WORSHIP IN SCOTLAND.

"The cheerfu' supper done, wi' serious face,
They round the ingle from a circle wide."

It is related of Sir Walter Scott, that he used sometimes to take his guests to an arbor on his lawn, at the hour of evening, that they might listen to the distant music of a sacred hymn. The sweet and tranquilizing sounds came from the cottage of old Peter Mathieson, a pious retainer of the great novelist, and so faithfully devoted to the memory of his affectionate master, that on visiting Abbottsford a few years since, we found "Old Peep," as Sir Walter familiarly called him, still dwelling in the little cottage on the margin of the silvery Tweed. We found him sitting in his gray-haired quietude beside that hearth-stone at which he had sung so many a household hymn, and bowed so often in household prayer.

And such scenes of domestic worship as those which so tirred the sensibilities of Scotland's poet, have been witnessed at Scotland's firesides for many a century past.

"From scenes like these old Scotia's grandeur springs,
That makes her loved at home, revered abroad."

In no land has domestic piety thriven more than in Scotland, and, as a consequence, no land on earth has witnessed more spiritual constancy, and a stouter fidelity to the truth delivered unto the saints. Within a few years, a most remarkable illustration of the efficacy of family worship has been witnessed in that country. In 1836, the General Assembly sent down an eloquent pastoral letter to the people of Scotland, "stiring up anew the people to a more faithful and regular observance of the worship of God in their families." The time at which this letter was issued, was a time of conflict and agitation in the church. The battle between Erastianism and the true spirit of religious freedom—the battle between King Cæsar and "King Jesus" for the supremacy of the church, was waxing warm. A crisis was impending, and it was all-important that the heart of Scotland should be preparing for the encounter. At that critical time, the Scottish Church were called afresh to the cultivation of house hold piety, and to rear anew the domestic altar. By their own hearthstones the "Faithfuls" and the "Great-hearts" of the land of the Covenanters were to prepare themselves for a spiritual Bannockburn against principalities and powers, and rulers of wickedness in high places. The result is familiar to us all. It is a providential issue too clear to be mistaken. Within less than six years from the time when the Church of Scotland was called afresh to her household altars, the disruption movement was set on foot, and the "outcome" of it all was that noble Free Church, which is the glory of our Presbyterian Israel!

AN ORIENTAL MYTH.

An Arabian sage—so says an Oriental myth—wishing to explain that all things are not as they seem, bade his disciple go to a fountain that gushed out of the sand by his tent side, and dip up a calabash of its water, and told him to sit down and look intently into it, and tell what he saw.

"I see strange things," said the disciple, after he had gazed steadfastly a while. "I see a caravan just perishing with thrist, and the water is all gone from the water-bottles of the Arabs, and the camels even are fainting; and I see an old Arab prostrate himself upon the hot sand and curse Allah in his rage of thirst. It is awful to see!"

"Look again," said the sage.

"Now the camels are snuffing a moist wind newly blowing. They revive, and hasten on till they bring the perishing Bedouin to a place of springs and palms, and there they drink and are refreshed, and bless themselves that their good fortune carried them to this fountain of a thousand years."

"Look again."

"Ah!" said the disciple, "I see the strangest thing! The palm trees are inverted, and their roots are in heaven, and the stream is pouring out of the hollow of God's hand."

"Yes, my son," said the sage. "He saved their lives, even while they cursed Him. Remember, our trees of blessing are all rooted in heaven, though it seem not so to us; and our rivulets of comfort, though they reach our lips through the golden goblet of one friend, or the poor gourd of another—and we thank these friends as the givers—do they not all flow from the hollow of His hand?

"Now, therefore, our God, we thank thee, and praise thy glorious name!"

PREACHING IN CALIFORNIA.—A Missionary Preacher in California, thus describes his experience. It is characteristic of the country:—

"At Columbia the most eligible room we could obtain for the evening was a restaurant. When we arrived at this place the tables were occupied by monte dealers. The keeper of the house, with great politeness to me, notified them that the house was to be opened that evening for religious worship, and requested the gentlemen, when they had finished their games, to give place to the preaching. The proprietor kindly arranged the [illegible] for us. With the bar behind me, my Bible on a monte table, and a mixed audience [illegible] me, I proclaimed the offers of the Gospel

"FOREKNOWLEDGE."

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder :—

That our views may be clearly understood in respect to God's "foreknowledge," I will here re-state what I understand the view to be which I oppose ; also the one which I advocate.

1. All future events which may occur in the course of human actions are certainly foreseen by God. But in order to their being certainly foreseen by God, they must by Him be "decreed," "determined," "necessitated."

2. All future events which may occur in the course of human actions are certainly foreseen by God. But though all future human actions are certainly foreseen by God, they are not therefore "necessitated," but free or contingent.

In answer to our first questions, published in the Recorder of Dec. 11, Bro. Brown said:

> "Now, if from all eternity He certainly foreknew the event, the certainty of it must have been from all eternity established, or decreed ; otherwise it could not have been foreknown." "To say he foreknew it as contingent, is the same as to say, He foreknew it, although there was no evidence to him that the event would ever take place; which is a clear contradiction."

In reply to my article which appeared in the Recorder of Dec. 25, Bro. Brown said :

> "We deny that God foreknew actions or events as certain, except upon the supposition that the certainty of them was first established." "If God, from all eternity, foreknew that Bro. H. and ourselves would be engaged in this discussion, he foreknew it as certain. But unless the certainty of it were first established, determined, or decreed, he could not have foreknown it. He might have conjectured it: but he could not have pronounced with infallible certainty, that the event would take place. But he was able to declare the event with infallible certainty, for 'His understanding is infinite.' Therefore the event was decreed."

The quotations, we think, show clearly Bro. Brown's identification with the sentiments first stated above. In proof of this doctrine, Bro. Brown, in an answer to Bro. Crandall, which appeared in the Recorder of Jan. 8, to which I am referred by Bro. B. in an article of Jan. 22, said :

> "We maintain, that when God foreknows an event, he foreknows it certainly ; not doubtfully. That is, in his mind, it is absolutely and infallibly certain that the event will take place. And if the event is in his mind absolutely and infallibly certain to take place, then the certainty of its occurrence is established in his mind; or—which is the same thing—it is decreed. For how a thing can be certain, and yet not established, we have yet to learn. There are but two sorts of evidence, viz. self-evidence and proof. A thing which is evident is either evident in itself or evident in something else ; that is, by connection with something else. But an event whose future existence is contingent—that is, whose future existence is not in any sense necessary—can have neither of these sorts of evidence."

He then proceeds to quote President Edwards as follows :

> "It cannot be self evident; for if it be, it may be now known by what is now to be seen in the thing itself—either its present existence, or the necessity of its nature. But both these are contrary to the supposition; for it is supposed, both that the thing has no present existence to be seen, and also that it is not of such a nature as to be necessarily existent for the future; so that its future existence is not self-evident. And, secondly, neither is there any proof or evidence in any thing else, or evidence of connection with some thing else that is evident; for this is also contrary to the supposition. It is supposed, that there is now nothing existent with which the future existence of the contingent event is connected. For such a connection destroys its contingence, and supposes necessity. Thus it is demonstrated, that there is in the nature of things absolutely no evidence at all of the future existence of that event which is contingent, without all necessity, (if any such event there be,) neither self-evidence nor proof. And therefore the thing in reality is not evident, and so cannot be seen to be evident; or, which is the same thing, cannot be known."

This sentiment is further forcibly stated and ingeniously elaborated by Bro. Brown, to which the reader's careful and candid attention is directed.

The sentiment opposed to this, set down in the beginning of this article, is in these words: "All future events which may occur in the course of human actions are certainly foreseen by God. But although all future human actions are certainly foreseen by God, they are not 'necessitated,' but free or contingent."

The difference in these two propositions, it will be seen, does not lie in the idea that God not certainly foreknows all future human actions, but the first affirms that in order for God to foreknow things certainly, he must "determine," "decree" them. The second denies this, and attempts to reconcile certain foreknowledge with the idea of liberty or "freedom."

Having, then, confessed to the certain foreknowledge of God, it becomes me to show how this consists with the doctrine of contingency or freedom.

1. If it be possible in the nature of things for a contingent event to happen, then the Divine Being can certainly foreknow such event. The difficulty would not lie in the direction of God's inability to foreknow the event. If it could happen, then God could foreknow it.

2. The possibility of the existence of such a condition of things must rest upon the necessity for it in the plan of God's moral government. If it be essential to the idea of human responsibility, that man should be a free moral agent, then so much must be admitted.

Now, to say that an infinite cannot certainly foreknow a future contingent event (if such event be possible) is a contradiction. The possible existence of it must be denied, or the ability to foreknow it must be allowed.

The rule that President Edwards has laid down, if it can have any force, must have it with respect to a finite mind, and not with respect to an infinite mind. Self-evidence to any mind has as much to do with the mind's ability to seize upon the evidence in the case as any thing else. Now then apply this rule to an infinite mind. Self-evidence then must exist in exact proportion to the mind's ability to know. But if it be an infinite mind, then it must have an infinite ability to know. But if it here be said, that an infinite mind cannot certainly foreknow future contingent events, because they have not the character of certainty, I reply, that that depends upon what is meant by the term certainty. If the necessitarian idea be given to it, then I admit the force of the statement. But this idea I wholly deny. I take it, that with God *fore*knowledge is the same as *after*knowledge. If this be so, he can as certainly foresee future contingent events as any other. To say that the Almighty cannot certainly foresee an event because it is contingent, is to say that there are conditions in the law of contingencies which God cannot comprehend! Circumstances, in their development and operation, which he cannot foresee! God as certainly foresees what I will do as what he has decreed I shall do. If he can certainly foresee (or foreknow) my thoughts, he can foreknow the operations of my will. If it be admitted, then, that he can certainly foreknow future contingent events, one important point at least is gained.

I next proceed to show, that the doctrine of necessity is directly at war with human responsibility ; and as it is admitted on all sides that man is responsible for his conduct, if the above proposition can be sustained, then another important point is gained.

(1.) Human consciousness is against the doctrine of necessity in every instance where it affirms human responsibility. And let it be remembered, that we are examining no mean witness here. It is none other than the law of God in man! And let it further be remembered, that but for the existence of this faculty in man, he could not be an accountable being—that God himself, when defending his conduct in condemning rebels against His government, appeals to this very faculty!

I am not unaware of the fact, that an attempt has been made by men of strong mind to either impeach or otherwise disqualify this witness in reference to this subject. But until other objections than those that have been presented shall be made, I shall feel myself called upon to reject their reasonings, and receive the witness.

We will now lay two propositions together, and then see what the testimony of consciousness will be with reference to the ideas presented.

First—All human actions are by God "determined," "decreed."

Second—Man is responsible for his conduct. Now, consciousness affirms instantly, that if the first proposition is true, the second is false! Consciousness affirms, that power and responsibility go hand in hand. The first proposition places the power with God. Therefore the responsibility is with him.

The second affirms that man is responsible for his conduct, while the first refers the power to God. This makes power irresponsible, and weakness responsible! and that too when that same power presides over and controls that weakness!

And now I solemnly ask Brother Brown if his own consciousness does not affirm, that there is a naked and irreconcilable contradiction between these two propositions? It is not mere mystery, but contradiction.

Suppose I have the power to magnetize a person; and while in that mesmeric state, I control his actions by a mysterious power. He may feel ashamed of what he does, but cannot feel guilty. Responsibility and power must go together. And consciousness as certainly affirms, that where the actions of men are controlled by God, responsibility is removed from them, unless they have forfeited the power of volition, and such control is exercised over them as a punishment. But here again the idea of forfeiture suggests responsibility, and responsibility suggests freedom. So that, in this case, (and, by the way, this is the only case that can arise,) the doctrine that we contend for is granted.

But, further, man knows that he wills, and he knows that when he wills in one direction he might have willed in another. He frequently knows, when he has willed in one direction, that he ought to have willed in another. If consciousness affirms that he ought to have willed otherwise, that affirmation is true or false. If true, then responsibility is implied. If false, then either an innocent mistake has been made by consciousness, or consciousness has been a traitor to the trust committed to it.

So we see, that to affirm that our actions are decreed by God, and at the same time to affirm that we are responsible for them, is a contradiction. But to say that this is only a contradiction in the human mind, and not in the thing itself, is to affirm a contradiction. For if it be a contradiction in the human mind, then it is a contradiction. Let it be borne in mind, that a mystery is one thing, and a contradiction is another. Now, with respect to the question under consideration, when it is affirmed that our actions are decreed by God, and at the same time that we are responsible for them, it is one which does not affirm a simple mystery, but a broad contradiction. But if a contradiction is affirmed, then the proposition must be false in the whole or in part. But it is true that man is responsible for his conduct. Therefore it is false that his conduct is necessitated.

(2.) The Bible is against this doctrine; that is, the doctrine of necessity. It every where predicates man's guilt upon the doctrine of "free will."

Take the case of Annanias and Sapphira, recorded in the fifth chapter of Acts. The guilt of that infamous transaction is all drawn from the fact that it was a voluntary one. "While it remained, was it not thine own? And after it was sold, was it not in thy power?" &c. Upon what other principle could guilt attach to them?

Take another case—Mark 14 : 7—"For the poor ye have always with you, and whensoever ye will ye may do them good." Here again the doctrine of the will's freedom is plainly taught as theology of the Son of God.

Once more. "For if we sin willfully after we have received a knowledge of the truth," &c. Now, here the guilt of sin is placed upon the fact of "willful" sinning.

But to all of this, and much more of the same kind, it may be said, that the doctrine of necessity does not relieve man from obligation or responsibility, because it is not physical necessity, but moral. But is not this reply a great deal more specious than solid? Is it not after all naked necessity? Now, to talk of applying physical necessity to a moral agent, is as unmeaning as to talk of applying moral force to a rock or stump! I am astonished to hear such things from a man of Bro. Brown's "acumen." If you apply physical force to a physical substance, then you have a philosophical agreement between the nature of the influence and the object acted upon. And so in the case of a moral agent. Moral influence is the philosophical influence to be exerted upon it. Now, if that influence be a necessitating influence, then you have moral force. Then we have only to determine whether that is an irresistible moral force. If not, you are unavoidably on the ground of "free will." If it is an irresistible moral force, then you have "necessity"—yea, FATE!

But as my sheet is full, I close by asking, Is not human responsibility more easily reconcilable with the doctrine of freedom than necessity?

N. V. HULL.

ALFRED CENTER, Feb. 3, 1852.

Reply.

It appears that Bro. H. and the writer of these remarks are both agreed, that "all future events which may occur in the course of human actions are certainly foreseen by God." But, upon the question whether such events are necessitated, predetermined, or decreed, we differ widely. We thought that we guarded ourselves against the liability of being misapprehended, when we explained the sense in which we used the term necessity. But, as if we had given no explanation at all, our correspondent proceeds to impugn the doctrine of necessity upon his own sense of the term. We protest against this method; controversies can never be brought to an issue in this way. We repeat what we have substantially said already; that we do not use the term in its common vulgar acceptation. The common acceptation supposes some opposition of the will. But we use it in the sense in which it is employed by President Edwards, viz. to denote the full and fixed connection between the things signified by the subject and predicate of a proposition which affirms something to be true. An implied or supposed opposition of the will does not enter into this definition of necessity. We say, therefore, of an event which God certainly foresees, (or, which is the same thing, which he foresees to be certain,) that there is a necessity that the event should take place: that is, there is that kind of necessity for it which is requisite to make the connection between the event and God's foreknowledge of it absolutely perfect. Now, if our correspondent apprehends our meaning, we have a right to expect him to frame his arguments accordingly.

If it be objected, that this use of the term is unwarranted, we would simply request our correspondent to furnish a better one. Some term is requisite to express the idea we have presented without circumlocution; and, in the adoption of this one, we adhere to its real meaning more closely than might at first be supposed. The original meaning of the term appears to have been an intimate connection, or conjunction; as indicated by its etymology, as if from necto. This is the generic or comprehensive import of the term. But our attention being, for the most part, called to the connection of those things which we may in vain wish to separate, the term has come to be limited, and especially applied to events which take place against our will; to things which we have no power to prevent if we would. The "FULL AND FIXED CONNECTION" of things, therefore, is what we mean by necessity. The idea of compulsion, or opposition of the will, is not included.

Following in the track of those who have gone before us—for we pretend to no originality—we have distinguished between natural and moral necessity; the former always including opposition of the will, the latter implying consent of the will. Thus, a man may be in a company of gamblers. He may be confined there—compelled to stay against his will; or he may be bound to the company by his passion for play. In the one case, he remains in the company by a natural necessity, and in the other, by a moral necessity. Now there is a clearly marked difference between the two cases. Yet our correspondent pronounces the distinction "more specious than solid," and maintains that it is, "after all, naked necessity." No, brother, it is not "naked necessity," in the sense in which you appear to use the term; for you seem to be unable to receive the term in any sense which does not include the idea of compulsion, or violence offered to the will. But in the sense in which we use it, you may make it as "naked" as you please; and the more "naked" the better.

Bro. H. is quite "astonished" that "a man of Bro. Brown's 'acumen' should talk of applying physical necessity to a moral agent." And why is he so "astonished?" Simply because he fails to distinguish between physical or natural necessity and physical force. For he goes on to say, "If you apply physical force to a physical substance, than you have a philosophical agreement between the nature of the influence and the object acted upon." Perhaps he thinks he has made us appear quite ridiculous; but, after all, we do not see the point of his logic. Did we ever pretend that physical force could be brought into contact with mind; or that the volitions of rational agents were caused by it? We are not aware of having said any such thing. But we do hold, that a rational being, clothed with a material body, may be subjected to physical force, and so be compelled to act contrary to his will. But the immediate application of the force is to his body, and not to his mind; for the mind is of such a nature that it admits of no such application. If a man is dragged on board of a steamboat at Buffalo bound for Detroit, and held fast till the boat is under way, he is under a natural necessity of making the voyage to Detroit, notwithstanding he is a moral agent. What we have said, is, that God does not use physical force to bring about those volitions and actions of men which are decreed. We have expressly declared, that we did not know what kind or mode of operation it was on God's part which rendered these results infallibly and unfrustrably certain, without any compulsion, coaction, or constraint.

From what has been said it is clear, that men may be said to be under a moral necessity of doing such and such things, not only when there is no opposition of their wills, but when their wills strongly incline them to do so. In short, moral necessity is nothing different from the predominant inclination.

Now, whatever objection may be made to such a use of the term necessity, and however serious the evils that may be supposed to have arisen from it, it must nevertheless be admitted to be in accordance with Scripture usage. "OF NECESSITY he must release one at the feast." Luke 23 : 17. "Though I preach the gospel, I have nothing to glory of, for NECESSITY is laid upon me." 1 Cor. 9 : 16. Paul was under no natural necessity of preaching the gospel, more than any other man. "I have bought a piece of ground, and I MUST NEEDS go and see it." Luke 14 : 18. Even the word compel is used in cases in which the subject of compulsion acted voluntarily. "I am become a fool in glorying ; ye have COMPELLED me." 2 Cor. 12 : 11. Why COMPELLEST thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews." Gal. 2 : 14. "It MUST NEEDS be that offenses come." Matt. 18 : 7. "There MUST also be heresies among you." 1 Cor. 11 : 19. "Such things [wars and rumors of wars] MUST NEEDS be." Mark 13 : 7. In many passages it is asserted that men cannot do that which is contrary to their inclination. Joseph's brethren "COULD NOT speak peaceably to him." Gen. 37 : 4. Did it require any more natural ability to speak kindly to their brother than to speak roughly? "Their ear is uncircumcised, and they CANNOT hearken." Jer. 6 : 10. "Whosoever is born of God CANNOT sin." 1 John 3 : 9. In all these passages, the language is the natural language of mankind. The terms employed are such as children learn as soon as they learn any thing. But it is clear that the terms are used in the very sense which we contend for in this controversy.

In regard to the term contingent, as used by our correspondent, we want a little more light. As standing opposed simply to necessity, we think we have some idea of its meaning. But when again it is made synonymous with freedom or free-agency, we are thrown somewhat into the fog. Does Bro. H. mean, by a contingent event, one which takes place without a cause? Or does he admit that there was a cause adequate and sufficient to bring it into existence? And, to save all further trouble and repetition on this point, we will say, that we admit unhesitatingly, that "if it be possible in the nature of things for a contingent event to happen, then the Divine Being can certainly foreknow such an event." But this is the very point in dispute. Can there be any such thing? Bro. H. thinks that there can; and that there is a "necessity for it in the plan of God's moral government." And he adds, that "if it be essential to the idea of human responsibility that man should be a free moral agent, then so much must be admitted." In the sense in which we have understood the term contingent to be employed by writers on this subject who differ from us, we deny that there can by any event of this character. It is something which can have no existence, and therefore cannot be known. But in the sense in which Bro. H. uses the term, perhaps a contingent event may be possible. We wait to hear a little farther.

Here we must rest for the present, the length of our correspondent's article subjecting us to the "necessity" of deferring the remainder of our reply till next week. T. B. B.

OBITUARY—TEMPERANCE LAMBERT.

DIED, at Bridgehampton, Long Island, Nov. 30, 1851, Mrs. TEMPERANCE LAMBERT, a colored woman, formerly of Hayti, and for the last year a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in New York.

The subject of this notice accompanied her husband to Hayti about the year 1823. They went in company with hundreds of people of their color, to find a home and an asylum from that cruel prejudice which continues to scorn the African on our soil as a being unworthy the common brotherhood of men. After a few years, Mr. Lambert died. Before and after his death, sister L. was called to endure untold sufferings and privations—miseries which thousands of her countrymen suffered, as many of them have told me, because they were deceived by the colonization scheme of that day.

We found her at Port de Paix, in January, 1849—poor, far from the path of rectitude, and leading a miserable life, as do most of the Haytiens. Mrs. J. spoke kindly to her, and reasoned with her on the necessity of an immediate reformation, a sincere repentance toward God, and faith in Christ. She listened to the gospel, sought divine mercy, and obtained the favor of God. We soon had the privilege of rejoicing over her return to the way of righteousness, and also because she united with us in keeping the Sabbath. Previous to going to Hayti, she was a member of a Baptist Church in New York. In speaking of her long and dreary life in Hayti, she told us that for twenty-four years she had not had the privilege of hearing the voice of prayer. When it became necessary for us to leave the field, she wished to leave with us. If she remained behind, how could she enjoy the Sabbath alone? How could she hold out against the tide of opposition from her first-day friends, if left as a lone pilgrim in that dark land? The missionaries could not feel justified in leaving her, and therefore, from their scanty means, bore her expenses to New York, where she found a pleasant and comfortable home in the family of Bro. Thomas B. Stillman.

A part of the past year she spent with her sisters, one in New Haven, Ct., and the other in Bridgehampton, Long Island. The following particulars of her sickness and death are taken from a letter from her sister on Long Island to her sister in New Haven:—

"She was taken ill the 14th of November. Her disease was lung fever. Her attending physician did all in his power for her. Every care and attention that she could desire, both from colored and white people, was given her. Yet all could not save her. But when death came it did not find her unprepared. She seemed to feel from the first, that she should not recover, and expressed a perfect resignation to the will of God. She died Nov. 30, at 8 P. M. Her funeral was attended by a minister in the place, and a large concourse of people. During her stay with us, she was desirous of attending her own church, and kept her Sabbath as well as she could. She regretted very much that she could not see Mr. Jones and family, and Mrs. Stillman and others, and intimated a desire to repay them all for their kindness to her. She often spoke of Miss Howard [missionary now at Jacmel] and other friends in Hayti, and composed some verses and a letter to send to them."

Sister Lambert was a person of remarkably industrious habits. Her manners were such as commended her to all who knew her. She was very patient in suffering, and exceedingly kind and obliging, especially in sickness. The missionary family were several times sorely afflicted with sickness, and feel that it is due to her memory to say, that their own mother could not have better anticipated and attended to their wants than did she. She was always thankful for favors received; those who cared for her were sensible that she appreciated their kindness. She loved her Bible and her closet. In short, she gave satisfactory evidence of being a child of God, and an heir of heaven. Reclaimed in that far-off land, we regard her as one of the first fruits of the cause of the Sabbath and of God, and are impressed with the idea that she did not live in vain. We rejoice, also, that her faith did not forsake her in the final contest. "The memory of the just is blessed."

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

The Amazon—Napoleon's Constitution and Measures—Popery in England, &c.

GLASGOW, January 16, 1852.

Our journals continue to be filled with details of the melancholy loss of the steamer Amazon, and with speculations as to the cause of the fire, and the means that should be adopted for the future prevention of such disasters. None of the other boats have been heard of, which, it was supposed, might have preserved the lives of others; it is hardly to be hoped that any will now be found. There are still, therefore, 117 missing, all of whom have probably perished; the number saved is 46. It is an awful Providence, but even the frequency of such makes but little salutary impression on the public mind.

The telegraphic intelligence this morning from France gives the outline of the President's Constitution—his personal gift to that country. In the proclamation announcing it, he coolly declares that he "thought it reasonable to prefer the precepts of genius to the spurious doctrines of men in their absurdities." He therefore returns to the political institutions of the Empire. "Legislative power is to be exercised by the President, the Senate, and the Legislative body." This last, however, though elected by universal suffrage, is to be permitted only to adopt or reject laws offered to its consideration; its discussions are to be conducted with closed doors, and published only when sanctioned by the President. The President, on the other hand, seems to decree his own power to frame the laws; the right of pardoning; of declaring war, and commanding the sea and land forces; making treaties, and appointing all functionaries, of whom it will be required that they swear obedience to the Constitution and fidelity to the President. "It is still a Concordat that regulates the relations of the Church and State."

Before the promulgation of this Constitution, the President had dissolved the National Guard—had decreed the banishment to French Guiana of 500 persons alledged to have taken part in the opposition to Napoleon, which he calls "insurrection"—and had banished from France 66 Members of the late Legislative Assembly, including Victor Hugo, M. Thiers, and Generals Changarnier and Lamorciere, with other eminent men, whose banishment is declared to be only temporary. In nearly all these cases, the President's decree is the sole authority for banishment, no legal trial having been obtained. As in former troubles of France, a number of the most distinguished of the banished have found refuge in London, not excepting some who, when in power, and having influence, urged the invasion of our shores.

What is implied in the "Concordat" that regulates the relations of Church and State, will hereafter be seen—and probably felt, also. Rome is delighted with the change. Its organs in this country anticipate great advantage to their cause. A new Dublin paper in the Pope's cause, about a week ago exultingly exclaimed, "For the first time, one may say, for two centuries, the Church in that country is in the ascendant." Alas for the Church of God, in any land in which the Church of Rome is in the ascendant! In several departments Potestantism is already interfered with. In the Haute Vienne, a Marie interdicts the evangelist from saying the least word at the grave in the interment of the dead. The Prefect of Charente forbids preaching in communes where service had long been established. A sub-prefect told a pastor who accompanied a schoolmaster whom the Maire refuses to install—"We know that the Protestant schoolmasters voted the wrong way." An alliance of the despotic powers in league with the Popish cause, to put down Protestantism and liberty, may not improbably be formed—we look for the power of the Western Roman Empire being in the hands of five Kings, and the power of the Eastern Roman Empire being also in the hands of five Kings, ere the Man of Sin arise among them—conformably to Scripture prophecy in the Great Image and ten-horned beast of Daniel. The time seems approaching for the development of the toes on the extremities of the legs into which the power symbolized in the image passed so long ago. As if, in apprehension of what may arise out of the recent movements on the Continent, our Government are about to take precautionary measures. Fortified camps are to be placed around London, and batteries to be erected on our exposed coasts. The aping of Bonaparte, so evident and avowed on the part of his nephew, gives reason to apprehend that the invasion of Britain may be in prospect. Nor would he be without help and encouragement in such an enterprise. Neither our religion nor our laws are agreeable to some of the Continental Governments.

Popery is making great efforts amongst us. A correspondent of the Morning Advertiser says that during the past year, 19 new places of Popish worship have been opened in Great Britain, including a convent and schools. One convent and other four schools are in course of erection. Thirty-eight clergymen have left the Church of England and joined that of Rome during the year, besides many distinguished and noble gentlemen and ladies, lay members, who have been induced to accompany or follow them. The Rev. H. Wilberforce, ex-Vicar of East Farleigh, one of these perverts, "has received a dispensation from the Pope, which will permit him to preach, though not to perform any other of the priests' offices"—he being a married man. It is even said that an order of preachers is about to be established by the Pope, to meet the case of all the married clergymen whom he has gained to his ranks. And we doubt not his readiness to do this—or any thing else that promises increase of influence or wealth.

A great effort is likely to be made in the ensuing Parliament—which is called for February 3d—to repeal the grant to Maynooth, and to put the nunneries under legal inspection. But we doubt much its success. The last Anti-Popish enactment has been allowed to remain a dead letter; and it is stated within these few days, that Government has contributed £200 towards defraying the expense of a new Romish chapel opened at Greenwich.

J. A. BEGG.

JUDGE JAY ON INTERVENTION.—Judge Jay, who has distinguished himself in the abolition cause as a man of "progress," has published a letter on the Kossuth doctrine. He goes strongly against the new intervention policy, and after bringing several reasons for doing so, he says :—

> "So strong is the repugnance among us to take human life, that it is with difficulty the penalty for murder can be enforced; yet we have lately seen persons of all classes in the community, not even excepting ministers of the Prince of Peace, in a delirium of excitement, receiving with wild applause the proposition of war, that is, the proposition to kill thousands and tens of thousands of our fellow men, who have done us no harm, for the sole purpose of conferring upon a distant nation certain political institutions, which, when obtained, may prove far otherwise than blessings. In all this, I see nothing of the spirit of the Gospel of Jesus Christ—nothing calculated to make mankind wiser, better, or happier; but much, very much, to strengthen the hands of the oppressor, to augment the amount of human wretchedness and wickedness, and to hasten the day when our own republic shall be merged in a military despotism."

JAMES G. BIRNEY.—The report of James G. Birney's death is contradicted, after having gone the rounds of the papers. The report that he has written an Address to the Colored People, is confirmed. In this pamphlet (according to the N. Y. Tribune) Mr. Birney argues that the whole drift of popular sentiment, legislation, and adjudication in this country is adverse to the free blacks—that it is rendering their residence among us more and more intolerable and degrading—that they must and should emigrate—that Canada is too cold for them, and will never treat them as other than an inferior race—that in the British West Indies they will also be a degraded caste—and that Liberia offers the best prospect now open to them.

PROTESTANT AND PAPAL BENEVOLENCE COMPARED.—During the year 1847, when the Church of Rome, under its new and then very popular Pope, was in the full tide of prosperity, the whole amount raised for the spread of the gospel by about 160,000,000, the estimated votaries of Rome, was $779,000, a considerable part of which was spent in prayers for the release of souls from purgatory. During the same year, the amount raised by the Protestant Establishment of England and Ireland was about $980,000, and by the Protestant Dissenters about the same sum; while Scotland, the north of Ireland, and these United States combined, raised $784,000; making in all $2,744,000.

RELIGION IN THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.—The New York Observer, by a comparison of statistics, makes out that the Sandwich Islands contain the most religious nation in the world, one half of the adult population being members of the church. That is about double the proportion of this country. The average salary of their pastors is three hundred dollars, which is about equal to the average in this country. The contributions to foreign missions have been one hundred and fifty dollars to a church. That is greater than the average here, though their churches are vastly greater.

TOLERATION IN BURMAH.—The King of Burmah, in giving instructions to the local authorities at Rangoon, has authorized them to permit the stay of the missionaries, with liberty to give religious instruction and circulate books. He has also given them permission "to come up to the golden feet," or to go to Ava, the royal residence, when they wish. No such toleration has before been given to the missionaries in Burmah Proper.

"A SNEAK."—With this caption, a cotemporary, Rev. Mr. Crowell, of the Western Watchman, has the following :—

> "A sneak is a man who subscribes for a paper, and after reading it a while, refuses to take it from the office. If we find the names of such sneaks on the books of the Western Watchman, we intend to have them suitably embalmed."

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, FEB. 2.

In the SENATE, Commodore Stockton made a speech on Kossuth and Intervention, and laid down what he considered the proper course of conduct for this country. First—Guard the Constitution from infraction; abide within its limits; most discreetly exercise the powers actually granted, and not any others. Second—So direct the foreign affairs of the Government that the progress of liberty shall be promoted, and not retarded. He could not join Great Britain, and Russia had always been the friend of the United States.——Mr. McRae, of Mississippi, concluded his speech on Foote's Compromise Resolution, explaining and vindicating the State Rights party from the charge of disunion.——The Mexican Indemnity Bill from the House was called up and passed.

The HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES voted calls upon the Departments for information by which members hope to prove corruption or malfeasance on former administrations.——Resolutions were presented from Alabama against, and from New Jersey for, Kossuth's Intervention Doctrine.——A proposition was made to amend the Constitution of the United States in respect to the Election of President and Senators, and of the term of office of the Judiciary.——A bill was introduced to establish a Public Printing Office; and an order passed to inquire into the power of our Consuls abroad.

THIRD-DAY, FEB. 3.

In the SENATE, a petition was presented from Mr. Donahue of New York, asking intervention all over creation. Mr. Cooper presented a petition, from Philadelphia, against the establishment of a Mint at New York; also against Sunday mails. Several other petitions were presented.——The Senate then took up the bill to enforce discipline and promote good conduct in the Naval Service of the United States. Mr. Badger offered a substitute for the greater part of the bill, which was adopted. The bill provides in substance as follows: That the commander of any vessel afloat in the Navy, or of any shore station, shall have authority to punish offenses committed by petty officers, and persons of inferior ratings, by any one or more of the following punishments: By diminishing their rations, by restricting their diet to bread and water, by imposing extra police and other duties; and in case of theft, in addition to any of the foregoing, by making good from the wages of the offender the value of the article stolen, and obliging the offender to wear for ten days a badge with the word "Thief" thereon; by discharge from service, with bad conduct marked on their discharge; by solitary confinement in irons, single or double, on bread and water; by solitary confinemnet in irons not over thirty days; by solitary confinement; by confinement not exceeding two months; reduction to inferior rating; by ball and chain, but not to be worn at sea; by deprivation of liberty on shore, and by loss of pay not exceeding three months. A long debate ensued on this, after which the bill was ordered to beengrossd.——Mr. Felch, without concluding, addressed the Senate in favor of the Iowa Land Railroad Grant, after which the Senate adjourned.

The HOUSE spent the whole day in a strictly political discussion, in which Mr. Cabell of Florida took the lead.

FOURTH-DAY, FEB. 4.

In the SENATE, Mr. Clarke's Intervention Resolution was postponed till Second-day next. Mr. Stockton presented petitions for a line of steamers to Galway, and for another Sir John Franklin expedition. Mr. Hamlin reported against remission of duties on several articles for churches, nunneries, and graveyards. Mr. Shields introduced a bill granting land for relief of the Indigent Insane. Several matters received their, incipient, progressive and final touches; and then the Census Printing Bill was taken up, an amendment offered, and then postponed. Mr. Felch spoke on the Iowa Railroad Grant. Mr. Bell took the floor on the same subject. The Senate then went into Executive Session, and afterward adjourned.

In the HOUSE, after some preliminary business, the subject of employing newspapers to publish the laws, &c., was taken up. Mr. Smart, who first introduced the measure, said he wished to disconnect the Press from the control of the Government, and to secure this end he proposed to have the laws published in two papers in every Congressional District, in place of, as now, in two in each State. Mr. Harris, of Tenn., said that under the present system the expense of the publication of the laws is $12,200 per annum, but under this bill the expense would be $92,200, making a difference of $80,000 per year. He moved to lay the subject on the table. But before the vote was taken, the House took up the Bounty Land Bill, after a brief discussion of which they adjourned.

FIFTH-DAY, FEB. 5.

In the SENATE, after the presentation of numerous petitions, and other unimportant business, Mr. Brodhead's resolution, looking toward the appointment of a Chargé d'Affaires to Switzerland, was taken up and passed. Mr. Rusk reported a Joint Resolution making certain New York Plank Roads Mail Routes. The Census Printing Concern was then taken up, and Truman Smith made a speech upon the subject, as did Messrs. Badger, Cass, and Borland.

In the HOUSE, the Civil and Diplomatic bill was reported. The Committee of the Whole took up the Bounty Land bill, on which some rather spicy speeches were made; but without any definite action, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

SIXTH-DAY, FEB. 6.

In the SENATE, a large number of petitions were presented, including several by Mr. Fish against Sunday Mails, and one by Mr. Cooper in favor of an Agricultural Bureau. The Senate then went into the consideration of private bills, several of which were ordered engrossed, but nothing of general importance occurred.

In the HOUSE, after a good deal of talk, the bill making Land Warrants assignable was passed in the following form:—

"That all Warrants for Military Bounty Land, which have been, or may hereafter be issued, under any law of the United States, and all valid locatings of the same, which have been, or may hereafter be made, are declared to be assignable by deed or instrument of writing, made and executed after the taking effect of this act, according to such form, and pursuant to such regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, so as to vest the assigned with all the rights of the original owners of the warrant, or location; Provided, that any person entitled to preëmption right to any land shall be entitled to use any such Land Warrants in payment of the same, at the rate of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, for the quantity of lands therein specified. Provided, also, that the warrants which have been or may hereafter be issued in pursuance of the said act may be located upon any lands of the United States subject to private entry at the time of such location, at the minimum price. Provided, further, that when the said warrant shall be located on lands which are subject to entry of a greater minimum than one dollar and twenty-five cents, the locator of the said warrant shall pay to the United States, in cash, the difference between the value of such warrant at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre and the tract of land tocated on."

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in which it is stated that the President of the United States has approved of the selection and purchase from George W. Riggs of the tract of land situated two miles from Washington, containing two hundred and sixty acres, for the sum of fifty-seven thousand five hundred dollars, together with all the improvements, to be used for the principal Asylum for the Relief and Support of Invalid and Disabled Soldiers, with a view of carrying out the benevolent designs of Congress. The Board of Commissioners have provided places for the temporary reception and accommodation of those persons entitled to the benefit of the act. One is in the vicinity of Washington and the other near New Orleans. The House then adjourned till Second-day.

SABBATH-DAY, FEB. 7.

In the SENATE, a bill was ordered engrossed, which appropriates seventy-two thousand five hundred dollars for refitting and repairing the Congressional Library Room. The resolution of sympathy for the Irish exiles, was taken up, and Mr. Shields, of Ill., addressed the Senate in support of it. Mr. Seward then took the floor, and the subject was postponed. Information was asked in relation to the contract for conveying the Mail to California; after which the Senate adjourned.

European News.

By the steamers Humboldt and Niagara, we have Liverpool dates to Jan. 17, seven days later.

From England, we learn that the next session of Parliament will be opened on the 3d of February by the Queen in person, and that the present Cabinet, without any further modification, is resolved to face the difficulties of the session of 1852.

Sir Harry Smith, Commander in Chief at the Cape of Good Hope, has been superseded by Major General Hon. George Cathcart, Deputy Lieutenant of the Tower of London.

The London Daily News of the 12th Jan., states, in reference to the Prometheus affair, that the British Government will express to the Cabinet in Washington, in frank and manly terms, their regret at what has occurred, and testify in a marked manner their disapprobation of the aggressor's conduct. There is no doubt, therefore, the matter will be amicably arranged.

A subscription was being made throughout the United Kingdom for the benefit of the widows and orphans left by the destruction of the Amazon. The Queen contributed £150, and it was hoped $50,000 would be raised.

The Crystal Palace is at last cleared out, and the vast area is soon to be thrown open to the public.

In France, the President has issued a decree dissolving the "National Guards," but they are to be re-organized when the Government may deem it necessary for the maintenance of public order. In such case the President will appoint the Commandant Colonel and Lieutenant Colonel. It was daily expected that Louis Napoleon would declare himself Emperor, but it was felt that such a step would not add to the despotic power he at present exercises. Large numbers of persons were being shipped off to the pestilent swamps of Cayenne. Decrees had also been issued banishing Victor Hugo, Charras, and a great number of the Mountain party, from the territories of France, Algeria, and the Colonies. The same decrees ordered the removal of Generals Changarnier, Lamoircière, Bedeau and MM. Thiers, Girardin and twelve others for a time from France and Algeria, for reasons of public security. The Generals had been released from the fortress of Ham and escorted to the frontiers. A conspiracy had been discovered for letting loose the convicts of the hulks at Rochefort. Arrests continued to be made in all parts, and there was virtually a reign of terror. The French funds had fallen considerably.

The Moniteur has published the new Constitution. The President is to be responsible Governor ten years. Justice is to be dispensed in the President's name. He has the initiative of laws and the right of pardoning. He presents an Annual Message. Commands the land and sea forces. Declares war, and makes treaties—and appoints to all functions. "I swear obedience to the Constitution and fidelity to the President," is the oath required from all the public functionaries. In case of the President's death, the Senate convokes the nation for a new election. The President is entitled, by a secret deed, to designate a citizen as meriting the confidence of the people.

It is announced in The London Times, that Louis Napoleon is about to strengthen his position by a matrimonial alliance with a princess of Sweden, a daughter of Oscar, and grand-daughter on the mother's side of Eugene Beauharnais. She is said to be in her twenty-second year, and may be considered French in her descent from both father and mother.

The mail from India and China had arrived in London with Bombay dates to the 17th December. The Burmese Court had 35 days allowed them to consider the demands made upon them, when, if not acceded to, it was supposed that Commodore Lambert would proceed up the Irawadda and commence hostilities at Ragoon. Letters from Hong Kong of the 29th November, mention that the mandarins are purchasing arms and warlike stores of all kinds. The rebels are said to be near Canton. The Yellow River has burst its banks, and trade in the North is interrupted.

The steamer Europa, with European news to Jan. 24, one week later, arrived at Halifax on the 7th inst.

In England there has been a complete lull in political circles, and all parties were glancing prospectively at the trial of strength that must take place between Lord John Russell's Cabinet and Parliament. The near approach of the meeting of Parliament had given an impetus to the demand for a new Reform Bill.

From France, we learn that several changes have been made in the Ministry. By a decree the Orleans family cannot possess property of any sort in France, and are bound to sell all their present possessions within one year. Another decree cancels Louis Philippe's donation to his children, and appropriates it to other purposes. The Duchess of Orleans's dowry of 300,000 francs is maintained. It is said that a second if not a third attempt on the President's life had been made. An officer is reported to have snapped his pistol at him as his carriage was coming out of the carousal. A rumor was also rife in Paris, with all its details, that the wife of an ex-Prefect had tried to poignard him.

In Spain, there had been several executions of military officers at Madrid, and tranquility was restored. Stringent measures are to be enforced to destroy the little liberty of the Press which the people of Spain enjoy.

THE AZTEC CHILDREN.—On the 2d day of January, (says the editor of the New York Christian Observer,) while visiting these children, we had the misfortune to offend the girl by proposing to carry the boy away. Twenty-five days afterward we called in again, not having seen them in the mean time, and the moment the girl saw us she recognized us, and expressed her displeasure by stamping with her foot, and scolding violently, as she apprehended we might still be disposed to run off with her companion. In this fact we find evidence that those children have bright intellects and good memories, and that they are far from being idiotic, as some who have not seen them suppose. Whether the peculiar fear of being carried off has any relation to the alledged manner in which they are said to have been first taken from their native city and brought here, we will not pretend to say. These children, or youth, as we perhaps should call them, are now beginning to attract the attention they demand.

REVIVALS IN NEW JERSEY.—A revival is in progress in the Presbyterian Church at Flemington, N. J., under the care of Rev. J. L. Janeway. Twenty persons joined the church last Sunday week. A revival has also taken place in the M. E. Church in Camden. Twenty-three persons recently signified their desire to become members.

NEW COLLEGE.—A movement is on foot to raise $150,000 for the endowment of an institution to be called 'Westminster College.' The school is to be located at Geneseo, Livingston County, and to be chiefly under the direction and patronage of the Presbyterian Churches of Western New York.

SUMMARY.

The Pittsburgh Gazette says: "A company of persons belonging to the Presbyterian Church is about to found a colony in Oregon. Rev. J. A. Hanna goes out as pastor, and among the members now enrolled, who number sixty persons, are a physician, nine farmers, ten teachers, two mercantile clerks, a machinist, &c. A good many of them have wives and children. The overland route is fixed on, and the party are to rendezvous at Cincinnati on the 15th of March, and at St. Josephs on the 15th of April."

Mr. Jones, of Iowa, has introduced a bill into the Senate of Congress to grant 1,800,000 acres to the State, and the right of way for two Railroads—one to run from Dubuque to Keokuk, two hundred miles, by means of which the bend in the Mississippi can be avoided; and the other, to run from east to west, from Davenport to Council Bluffs; which is the point from which overland emigrants to California and Oregon start.

Mr. Hiram Wilcox, of Dayton, Ohio, in assisting, about two weeks ago, to take a drunken loafer to jail, was bit by him on one of his fingers. He paid but little attention to it until, a few days subsequent, it became swollen and painful, with every appearance of erysipelas. The ordinary remedies in such cases were applied, but the inflammation spread rapidly from the hand to the arm, and finally to the body—growing worse and worse, until mortification put an end to his life.

After a labor of three years, day and night, in the mountain of rock on the big tunnel on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, the parties from east and west met, a few days since. The gang of hands on the west, being nearer those on the east than they supposed, within eight feet, made a strong blast, which produced fearful and fatal consequences. The explosion broke through, killing one man and wounding eight, some mortally. Of the eleven men at work on the east side but two escaped unhurt.

The N. Y. Tribune of Feb. 3, says: It is idle, worse than idle, to visit this City with the idea of engaging a passage by steam across the Isthmus to California. All the vessels (both Panama and Nicaragua) are full up to April, and those for that month are rapidly filling up. Either engage your passage weeks beforehand or take your way around the Horn or over the Sierra—there is no help for it.

A Greenfield paper states that the rock that has been blasted for the tunnel at the Hoosic Mountain, is so soft that it can easily be cut with a knife. It is a very soft mica slate. A machine that can work ten feet a day in granite, can easily cut double or more in this stone. There are now thirty men at work preparing the approach to the tunnel, and it is expected that the machine will be ready for operation in a few weeks.

A letter from Capt. Cutler, master of the bark Dolphin, of Warren, Rhode Island, gives an account of the bombardment of Johanna, one of the Comoro Islands, on the 6th of August last, by the U. S. sloop of war Dale, Commander Pearsall, for the unjust imprisonment of Capt. Moores, of the bark Maria, of New Bedford.

A correspondent of The New Orleans Delta, at Eagle Pass, states that on the 27th of December John Clark, a private of the U. S. Army, was deliberately shot dead by Mortimer Cook, a discharged soldier, at the instance of the principal citizens of Eagle Pass, who had publicly resolved that any soldier found in the village should be shot.

New Jersey is moving in the matter of interdicting the sale and manufacture of intoxicating drinks. A very large number of petitions from almost every county in the State was presented on Wednesday, setting forth that the existing laws are inadequate to suppress intemperance, and asking the Legislature to pass an act, as nearly identical with the Maine Liquor Law, as shall be deemed practicable. The petitions were numerously signed. On one of them was nearly 500 names. They were referred to a special committee.

The Select Committee appointed by the last Legislature of New York, to examine the condition of the Trust Funds of the Court of Chancery, have reported to the Assembly. The Committee have ascertained that there is nearly a million and a half of dollars now held in trust, and that the rightful owners of nearly a million of this large sum are unknown. Probably the Legislature will make provision to have this money escheat to the State, for school or other benevolent purposes.

The Rhode Island Senate has passed, by a majority of three, a bill abolishing the punishment of death—substituting imprisonment for life. In order to provide against the abuse of the pardoning power, the bill provides that no person imprisoned for life, or for any term exceeding five years, shall be released, except by a concurrent vote of three-quarters of the members of both branches of the Legislature.

The Lawrenceburgh Press states that Dr. J. G. Dunn, of that city, has discovered a chemical combination by which he can carge the surface of any kind of stone or brick so as to represent the most beautiful and substantial marble or granite It is simply a process for chrystalizing lime, and is capable of being colored or mottled by any tint whatever.

DIED.

Near Rockville, R. I., on the 1st inst., very suddenly, Mrs. FRANCES, wife of Andrew Bray, in the 35th year of her age. The subject of this notice was a native of Yorkshire, England, who came to America in 1840, where she rejoined her husband, who had preceded her to this country to seek employment and home. Early in the summer of '51 they settled in the vicinity of the 3d Seventh-day Baptist Church of Hopkinton, which was soon after blessed with a precious revival of religion. During the progress of the work they both became hopefully converted to God. The Sabbath of the fourth commandment was subsequently embraced by them with cheerfulness, and they were welcomed into the fellowship of the above-mentioned Church, of which sister Bray remained a devout and worthy member until called away by death. She has left three children in the care of her husband, who deeply mourns her loss, yet not without hope. C. M. L.

Two Living Aztec Children.

A NEW AND ABSOLUTELY UNIQUE RACE OF MANKIND.—The most extraordinary and inexplicable phenomena that the history of the human race has yet produced, can be seen for a few weeks at the large Exhibition Room of the Society Library, corner of Broadway and Leonard-street. They were recently taken from a newly-discovered and idolatrous people in Central America, by whom they were kept with superstitious veneration, distinct and secluded as a caste of their priesthood, [illegible] employed as Mimes and Bacchanals in their Pag[illegible]eremonies and worship.

They are male and female. The latter measuring 29½ inches in height, weighing 17 lbs.; the former is 33 inches high, and weighs 20 lbs.

From repeated and careful examination, the best Physiologists state the older to be 12 or 13 years of age; the younger about 10 years.

They differ altogether from examples of the dwarf kind, and from children; affording complete and undeniable illustration of a Piamean variety of the Human Race!

Miscellaneous.

Kossuth and Non-Intervention.

Remarks of Dr. J. R. Hartshorn, of Allegany, in the Assembly of New York, Jan. 26, 1852, on the Non-Intervention Resolutions.

Mr. Speaker,—More than two weeks have elapsed since the various resolutions that lumber our table in regard to Kossuth and intervention were introduced. Throughout the whole discussion I have sat in my seat in silence, though not by any means indifferent as to the kind of resolutions that might be adopted, but hoping that they may be such in language and spirit as would do honor to this House, and reflect the opinions and sentiments of the people of this State. Some of them, if not too reserved in their expressions of sympathy and welcome, are altogether wanting in their declarations of sentiment with reference to the great question of non-intervention.

Sir, the resolutions should, in clear, emphatic and unequivocal language, express the generous and heartfelt sympathy and friendship entertained by nine-tenths of the people that are represented on this floor, in behalf of Hungary, Kossuth, and his exiled compatriots. They should also express, in language that will not admit of misconstruction, the decided disapprobation that is manifested in almost every part of the Empire State, against the armed interference of Russia in the struggle of the Hungarian people for independence.

Sr, I do not intend to take up the time of this House in any elaborate discussion of this question. But I shall aver, and endeavor to maintain, that every nation has a right to regulate its own domestic affairs, and establish such institutions as it may deem most suitable to its condition, and best calculated to promote its own prosperity and happiness, and that, too, irrespective and independent of any other; and that an interference or prohibition on the part of any other government, not only contravenes the fundamental principles of republicanism, but is a violation, a palpable and flagrant violation, of all international law.

Now, sir, what has been the character and condition of the Hungarian nation? History informs us, that from time immemorial almost, she has been a liberty-loving, law-abiding, and freedom-seeking people. For the last 300 years she has been under the domination of Austria, during which period she has been constantly pleading for an extension and enlargement of her political rights. In obedience to her prayers, Austria finally gave her a constitution granting certain rights, which were afterwards withheld. She demanded a recognition of those rights, and of the integrity and stability of that Constitution. These were peremptorily denied her. Impelled by every sense of duty, interest and happiness, to resist this encroachment and robbery of her natural and once conceded rights, she boldly and manfully asserted and triumphantly maintained them, driving the enemy out of her country, after numerous well fought, skillfully conducted, but bloody battles. But Russia interfered, disregarding all international obligations, and that law of common brotherhood that places every nation on an equality. Hardened in the science of human butchery and plunder, and exonerated from all the restraint by which a civilized nation should be governed, she marshaled her troops and poured her legions and her gold into the land of Hungary, to crush the spirit of liberty and arrest the progress of republican principles that were proclaimed and sought to be established by all the energies and resources of a brave and gallant people.

The gentleman from Orleans, (Mr. Copeland,) in a speech of considerable length, endeavored to show by extracts from McCulloch's History, that Hungary was not prepared for freedom and independence; that she needed a farther and deeper "baptism in blood" before she could [illegible] to the elevation of true, self-regulated liberty. Sir, I have examined that work, and that examination has fortified my previous impressions, that she is prepared for freedom, for independence. She has, in her 14,000,000 of inhabitants, population enough, wealth enough, intelligence enough, virture enough, love of liberty enough, and, indeed, all the essential elements of a free and independent government.

The gentleman from New York, (Mr. Monroe,) has made the astounding discovery that intervention on the part of this government, even by way of an expression of disapprobation against the conduct of Russia, would not only be mere children's play, but contrary to international law. Perhaps, then, the advocates of intervention had better retrace their steps and change their position, as an act of childishness would subject us to ridicule, and a transgression of international law would be a grave offense. I would inquire of the Hon. gentleman, with due deference to his age, experience and forensic attainments, is not the right to liberty inalienable and incontrovertible, as well as the dearest, highest, holiest right of man? Is it not the common inheritance of man from his Maker? And is not its protection the common obligation of all men? Is not this principle the foundation of all international law? Does not this very law require us to assist any people where tyranny, insupportable, obliges them to battle in defense of their constitutional right? For an answer, I would call the gentleman's attention to a work on international law, the perusal of which may remove all doubts he may entertain on these questions. "When tyranny," (says Vattel, book 2, chap. 4, sec. 56, "becoming insupportable, obliges nations to rise in defense of their fundamental laws, every power has a right to succor an oppressed people who implores its assistance; for, he adds, when a people from good reasons takes up arms against an oppressor, justice and generosity require that brave men should be assisted in the defense of their liberties." Thus the gentleman may be satisfied that our government has a right to protest against the armed interference of a foreign power in a domestic struggle between liberty and despotism.

Gentlemen cling with great sincerity to the ancient and time-honored policy of their government. I am aware that Gen. Washington was opposed to improper and ill-adjudged alliances. So am I. But gentlemen contend that he was opposed to the kind of intervention advocated in this country at this time. Admit it, if such admission will give consolation to any. Mr. Speaker, no man in this House or this country reveres the memory or appreciates the services of him, whose likeness on yonder wall stares us in the face, more than the humble individual addressing your honor, or is more willing to acknowledge his lofty patriotism, sterling virtues, far-reaching wisdom, and penetrating sagacity. But does not time in its resistless march, develop new interests—new merits—new obligations, in all departments of business or trust. Is not this an age of progression? In chemistry and natural philosophy are we to be confined to the discoveries and opinions of Franklin? In astronomy to those of a Newton? or in political ethics to those of a Washington, even? Many are the changes, the discoveries and improvements, that time, science and labor have wrought, since these spirits took their flight.

But there is another idea worthy of consideration. Sixty years ago, when that worthy statesman was at the helm of the ship of state, was in the weakness of our nation; our territory was small, our population limited to some four or five millions, and almost homogeneous—we heard no cry from oppressed nations for help. Now how changed; our country spreads from the lakes to the gulf of Mexico, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, comprising more than 3,000,000 square miles, with a republican family of eight times that number, representations of almost every clime, many of which are imploring relief for their brethren ground down by the iron heel of despotism that are left behind.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. Monroe) refers to the administration of James Monroe, whose name he bears, and whose principles and virtues I hope he inherits. What, sir, was the policy of his administration, when the South American Colonies revolted from Spain, and that foul conspiracy, the Holy Alliance, contemplated an interference in behalf their mother country against her Colonies struggling for independence? Our government protested against such interference, declaring that it could not regard such an act with indifference. Such, I would inform the gentleman, was the policy of our government when his venerable namesake was at the helm 30 years ago.

A number of gentlemen (peace men, I suppose) are alarmed at the consequences of such a procedure, that it will lead to war. Perfect moon-shine! The chimera of an over-excited caput! I would inform the gentlemen that we do not propose to choke republicanism down the throats of principalities and powers at the point of the bayonet, as they have despotism in Spain, Greece, Poland and Hungary, but by the formation of a powerful public opinion, more omnipotent than fleets and armies. We will learn them to heed the advice of old Ben Franklin, "Mind your own business." If this will lead to more, let it come.

When we were struggling to throw off the yoke of British tyranny, a self-sacrificing and philanthropic La Fayette left his home, his avocation, and his country, crossed the briny ocean, and unsheathed his sword in defense of American soil and American rights. Long will his services have the respect and gratitude of an admiring world. But now, when a dogmatical and superlatively arrogant Autocrat, to gratify his own ambition and love of power, scatters dismay, devastation and death, throughout a nation that is struggling for the same civil and religious freedom, we, being clothed with a little brief authority, must be silent, our tongues must be palsied, our lips padlocked, lest we incur the wrath of the Russian Bear. I for one, sir, am not afraid of his frowns, his teeth, or his claws.

If, thirty years ago, when the Spanish South American Colonies struck for independence, the U. States, with a population of 9,000,000 and an army of only about 5,000, could proclaim to the Holy Alliance, consisting of France, Austria, Prussia and Collossal Russia, having 1,000,000 of troops at its disposal, "Hands off, fair play," I say, if we could command them thus, and have our mandate obeyed, without a threat or hardly a murmer, what think you, Mr. Speaker, or any other member of this House, would be the probability of a similar declaration involving us in a war now with Russia alone, with a weak, undisciplined, inefficient army, of only some 500,000, and the United States grown to the enormous dimensions of embracing almost a whole continent, people by upwards of 20,000,000 of freemen?

The gentleman from New York thinks that the time for intervention would have been during the war. I concede that would have been an appropriate time, but as it was not done then, let us prepare for any like emergency in the future. Let us give the despots of the old world to understand, that if we have a public law, that law is in the keeping of nations—that the United States, as one of the nations, are interested in upholding and preserving it sacred and inviolate, and will suffer no infraction thereof, in letter or spirit, with indifference.

Mr. Speaker, why should not this glorious Union, whose foundation and superstructure are claimed to be the immutable principles of justice, equality and liberty, act a conspicuous part in the great drama of a world's redemption from the power and dominion of despotism, in all its forms and varieties of existence? At least, would it not be entitled to one vote, one voice, in the common destines of mankind, and the common interests of humanity? Such a voice, from such a source, would be heard and felt and heeded by the European powers. It would speak in tones of thunder, that they cannot trample upon oppressed humanity, and at the same time it would assuage the grief and ameliorate the suffering of poor down-trodden Hungary. Let us, therefore, resolve, that it is incumbent on the Federal Government to enter its solemn protest against any further interference on the part of Russia, or any other despotic power, to prevent political reforms or suppress constitutional rights in any of the family of nations. Let us, with that magnanimity that becomes the representatives of the Empire State, in the name of three millions of freemen, unanimously invite that great apostle of liberty and expounder of international law, Louis Kossuth, to visit our Capital, and cordially welcome him as the guiding star and hope of an oppressed people, and the representative of a sovereignty cruelly overthrown by the armed intervention of a foreign power.

Oregon.—Gen. Lane, Territorial Delegate to Congress from Oregon, writes in reference to the settlement, soil and climate of that Territory. He estimates the population at 20,000, and says the immigration is rapidly increasing, owing not only to the natural advantages of the country, but to the liberal provisions made for actual settlers by a late law of Congress. The population is of a substantial character, much better than is generally found in new countries. Those who contemplate emigrating to Oregon should be ready to leave St. Joseph, on the Missouri River, with a proper outfit, by the first of May. Ox teams are much to be preferred. Provisions for the trip, and sufficient blankets for bedding, with such tools only as are necessary to repair a wagon, should be taken. Dry goods, groceries, furniture and farming utensils, of all kinds, are abundant in Oregon, and no one should think of taking such things with him. It must not, however, be supposed that no inconveniencies are to be experienced by emigrants after they arrive there.

Good Dairy Farms.

The best farms for making butter are those that lie fair to the sun, where the feed is sweet and of the best quality. Butter made from good sweet feed, will be of good color and of superior quality to that made from feed from pasturing that lies on the north side of the hill, where the sun shines but very little. The land is cold and wet, and the feed is sour and of poor quality, and the butter made from it will be light colored and of inferior quality to that made from good rich sweet feed. Dairymen should have plenty of good clear water, where the cows can have free access to it at all times. When cows are obliged to wade in the mud for water, and drink when there is a scanty supply, and drop their excrements in it, they are obliged to drink an impure mixture, that greatly affects the butter.

Cows should not be allowed to lie in close yards, in very warm weather; they should be returned to the pasture, or some convenient place where they have a good clean place to lie, and fresh air. When cows lie in wet and muddy yards, there will be more or less dirt fall from the cows into the milk, while milking, which gives the butter a very unpleasant flavor. All kinds of feed that are of a strong nature, such as turnips, and onion-tops, or any vegetable that has a strong flavor, ought to be avoided, for it is injurious to the flavor of the butter. In the spring every dairyman should feed his cows with a little Indian meal and water, every day, for two or three weeks before they come into milking, and from that time until they can get a good supply of grass. This not only improves the condition of the cows, but greatly increases the quantity of the butter, and improves its quality.

Dairymen should never undertake to keep more cows than they have plenty of feed for. Twenty cows, well fed, will yield much greater profit than forty poorly kept. Every farmer should be very particular to select such cows as give the richest milk, and that which will make good yellow butter. Every one knows that it is no more expence to keep good cows than it is to keep poor ones.

To have good cows and plenty of good feed, pure water, comfortable barns in winter, where they can be kept dry and warm, and good clean places for them in summer, is the first step towards carrying on the dairy business successfully.

How to Burn Coal.

The art of burning coal is not yet properly understood as it ought to be. Too much coal is usually placed in the stove, by which the draft is destroyed and the gases are imperfectly consumed. The Miner's Journal of Pottsville says there are two other errors in the way we burn coal, by which more than one-half is wasted. 1st. We have to shut the door of our stove or furnace, to make a temporary overcombustion at one time, and at another time we have to leave open the door and let in cool air to cool off. 2d. The gas that ascends our chimneys carries with it a deal of coal that is unburned, merely coal in vapor, which gives little heat for want of air to consume it. We lose the the most of this unconsumed vapor of coal when the door is shut. When it is open, the vapor is consumed, but the heat is reduced by a flood of cold air, and carried up the chimney. What is required then is an air-tight door over the ash-pit, through which you can let in just what air is necessary for quick or slow combustion as desired. The door that admits the coal should never be opened except to put coal in. A small flue should admit a stream of air heated by contact with the stove, to mix with the gas on top of the fire. In buying a stove, if you find that the stove or furnace door must be left open when you want to moderate your fire, reject it; for it is essentially wrong in its construction, and it will consume three tons of coal where one would answer if the draft door were air-tight.

Statistics of Marriages, Births, and Deaths.

From a report in the Springfield Republican, we derive a few statistical items as to marriages, births and deaths in Massachusetts, for the year 1850. The number of births during 1850 was 27,044, being an increase of 1,871. The number of males born was 14,137, females 13,392, and unknown 135.

The marriages for 1850 were 10,345, showing an increase of 3,409. As to the time of marriage, some months are much more favorable than others. In January there were 783 marriages, in February a less number, and in March only 392, the lowest on the list. May, however, improves on this, and 1,093 couple were made happy. From June to July the number diminishes, but increases in October to 1,022, and in November runs up to 1,418, decreasing in December to 819. The opening of summer and the approach of winter, therefore, appear the most favorable to matrimonial connections.

Some very queer statistics are given as to the marrying of widows, widowers, and bachelors. When bachelors marry widows, the age of the female is almost always the greater. Thus, of young men between 20 and 25 years of age, 15 married widows between 25 and 30; 11 do. between 20 and 35, and 8 do. between 40 and 45. Twenty-five young men from 25 to 30, married widows from 30 to 35, and 10 widows from 35 to 40. The reverse is true in the case of widowers and first marriages of females. Fifty widowers from 35 to 40 married ladies from 20 to 25. There was one exception in the case of a widower from 25 to 30, who married a maiden from 50 to 56. Of all married under 20, there were 187 men, and 2,253 women; from 20 to 25, 3,825 men, 4,316 women; from 25 to 30, 3,061 men, 1,629 women; from 75 to 80, 13 men, 1 woman.

The number of death in 1850, was 16,006; in 1849, 20,423. In 1850, 3,527 were cut down by that fell destroyer pulmonary consumption; 1288 died of dysentery, and 838 of lung fever. Among the diseases and the number who died of each, we find of casualty [illegible]0; drinking cold water 2; drowned 196; executed 1; lightning 3; suddenly 31; suicide 49.

The table showing the occupation of those who died, presents some very interesting facts in regard to the effect of occupation upon longevity of life. In 1850, the average of agriculturists who died was 65; laborers 44; mechanics 45½; merchants 47; paupers 61; professional men 50; public men 48; seamen 43½. This is very nearly the average for the seven years previous. Of mechanics, distillers seem to live the longest, averaging about 75. Barbers, grocers, millers, sailmakers, shipwrights and tobacconists seem to live longest of this class, averaging nearly 60, while cutlers, piano-forte makers, and stove dealers, average but about 30.

Of professional men, clergymen average 57, editors are, of course, worn out early, and in the seven years previous, (none died during 1850,) average 36; lawyers arrive at a respectable age, 51; physicians average 58; students average 26, and teachers 36.

Of public men, sheriffs and constables average 63; gentlemen 69; bank officers 63; sextons 57; railroad agents and conductors 30; brakemen 27; and 1 chimney sweep averaged 35.

Of females, housekeepers averaged 58, and operatives 26—a fact certainly deserving of attention. Dressmakers averaged about 32; milliners 35; tailoresses 41, and teachers 29.

A Veteran.—Daniel Weekes died at Shipharbour, Halifax Co., N. S., on the 29th of December last, in the 117th year of his age. Mr. Weekes was born on Long Island, on the 3d December, 1735, and served in the British army in which Wolfe fell, September 12, 1758, at which time he was 24 years old. He adhered to the Royal cause at the time of the Revolution, and received a grant of land at Shipharbour, on which he has since been settled. He brought up a family of 21 children, whose offspring to the third and fourth generation are settled around him, and scattered in many parts of the world, numbering some hundreds. In 1838 he enjoyed his second sight, and up to a couple of years ago, went daily bare-headed into the woods to cut wood and timber, an occupation he preferred above all others. Even when he became bed-ridden with age and weakness, he he retained full possession of his faculties—hearing and seeing—and endured but slight pain the two days before his death.

Census of Utah.—The Census of Utah is officially published in the Washington Republic and Intelligencer. From it we learn that the number of dwellings in the territory, when the census was taken, was 2,322; families the same; white male inhabitants, 6,022; white females, 5,308; total number whites, 11,330; free colored males, 12, and the same number of females; making the total free population 11,354. There are 26 slaves, all of whom reside in Utah County. The number of deaths during the year was 239; and the number of farms in the Territory was 929; number of manufacturing establishments, 16. The total population of the Territory, free and slave, amounts to 11,380. There are seven counties, respectively named Davis, Great Salt Lake, Iron, San Pete, Toole, Utah, and Weber. The most populous of these are Great Salt Lake, with 6,157 inhabitants; Utah, with 2,027; Weber, with 1,186; and Davis, with 1,134.

Temperance in Indiana.—A State Convention of the friends of Temperance in Indiana was recently held at Indianapolis, at which energetic steps were taken for the suppression of intemperance among the Hoosiers. Since the adjournment of the Convention a bill to regulate the sale of spirituous liquors has been reported to the Indiana Legislature, and, it is thought, will become a law. It prohibits the granting of licenses; provides for assessing fines on those selling or giving away intoxicating liquors to minors, and to all other persons, to be drank about the house or out house where the liquor is sold; first offense, a fine of ten dollars; second, twenty dollars; third, forty dollars; fourth, eighty dollars; fifth, and all subsequent offenses, one hundred dollars, the offender to stand committed until the fines are paid or replevined. It also provides that the wife, and all others injured by the sale of intoxicating liquors, may maintain an action against the vender who furnishes the liquor.

Verdict of Damages for Malpractice.—In the Court of Common Pleas, at Cambridge, Mass., the case of Twombly vs. Leach came up and occupied several days. This was an action against Dr. Leach for malpractice in performing a surgical operation upon Twombly's thumb, in consequence of which malpractice it was alleged she wholly lost the use of her hand. Some twenty distinguished doctors and surgeons testified in the case. The Court instructed the jury, that if they found in favor of the plaintiff, the measure of damages would be such amount as she would be entitled to receive for the pain, suffering and injury she had personally endured and received, and that the damage sustained by the loss of use of her hand would be subject to future consideration in an action in favor of her husband for the loss of the services of his wife. Verdict for the plaintiff—damages $250.

Price of Slaves.—The traffic in men and women seems to be quite brisk at the South just now. The Fayetteville (N. C.) Observer mentions an auction sale in Edgecomb County, at which "negro men sold at from $1,000 to $1,500, none at less than $1,000, and women at from $600 to $800." According to the same authority, 193 pieces of this 'peculiar' kind of property were disposed of at that sale. The Augusta (Ga.) Constitutionalist says, "That notwithstanding the tightness of the money market, the price of negroes in Georgia, as elsewhere in the South, continues to rule high. At the sale at Louisville, (Ga.,) on Tuesday, of the negroes of the late Charles Cunningham, Esq., one hundred and thirty-two in number, they brought in cash an average of over four hundred and sixty dollars. They were of all ages, from infants in the arms to very old negroes."

Salt-Mine.—There is a large salt-mine near Cracow, in Poland, which is eight hundred feet in depth. It is divided into three floors. On one of these (about two hundred feet down the mine) there is a chapel cut wholly out of salt. It is thirty feet long and eighteen feet high. The pulpit for the minister, and the seats for the people, the columns which support the roof, and all the other parts and furniture of the place, are hewn out of salt! We may imagine, that when lit up with candles it has a most curious appearance. The glistening walls and white benches strangely contrast with the dark clothes of the miners. In this mine also there are houses and stables formed in the same manner out of salt. Several hundreds of people are engaged at work in this mine, some of them not coming up to daylight for years together!

Keeping Cattle Warm.—Cattle will eat all that nature requires in a good warm barn, if it is judiciously fed to them, and they can have seasonable supplies of water. But nature will require more in an open barn, and more still in a cold yard. The fuel to feed the fires within will always bear a proportion to the cold atmosphere surrounding the surface of the body without, which is to be warmed, in order to keep the creature comfortable. It is like placing your stove outside of the house to warm the circumambient air, instead of placing it within your snug little parlor. The extra out-door appetite is caused mainly, if not entirely, by the extra exposure demanding extra fuel. [Granite Farmer.

VARIETY.

A bill has been introduced into the New Jersey Senate to exempt from execution a house and lot to the value of $1,000 in addition to the property already exempted by law. Such exemption to continue after the death of the householder, and so long as the same may be occupied by any member of said family. The bill provides that this property shall be recorded in a book to be called the Homestead Exemption Book, to be kept at the office of the Clerk of each county.

The most remarkable railroad accident of which we have any knowledge occurred on the Indianapolis and La Fayette road recently. Two hand cars were racing with several men on each; the forward car, in passing a point where a common road crossed the track, was thrown off the rails, and the other came upon it with its full force, killing three men and injuring several others.

Missouri iron is famous. Equally remarkable is the Pilot Knob in Madison county of that State. Pilot Knob is 700 feet high, and from the elevation of 500 feet to the summit is a naked body of ore, free of earth and stone, singularly traversed and intersected by cracks or veins, as if a freak of nature to facilitate the quarrying and removing the treasure. The property is owned and worked by a joint-stock company, whose possessions extend to 15,000 acres of land.

The proprietors of the Philadelphia Ledger have contracted with Messrs. R. Hoe & Co., of this city, for the construction of two mammoth eight-cylinder printing-presses. The cost of these presses will be forty thousand dollars—a seemingly large sum for a penny newspaper to pay for presses. The New York Sun and the Philadelphia Ledger have the largest circulation of any daily papers in the world.

A company is in course of formation, in England, for the purpose of carrying into operation a remarkable patent, which has for its object the manufacture of type by a process of die-sinking, in a metal of harder material than the alloy of lead and antimony at present employed in casting type in a mould. This is said to be the most important improvement which has taken place in the manufacture of type for the last three hundred years.

Cancer is said to have greatly increased in England during a few years, insomuch that a Cancer Hospital has just been established in London, and is already effecting an immense deal of good. In 1850, before this Hospital was established, no less than 4536 persons died in England of this frightful malady. Of these 3828 were males.

The report on our Steam Marine, lately made to Congress, states that 995,100 passengers were carried on the steamboats which navigate the Hudson during the year. It is known that 517,400 were carried on the Hudson River Railroad in the last half of the year, being at the rate of more than a million per annum, although the Railroad was but partially in use until October, and then in an unfinished state.

Gov. Hubbard, of Maine, said in his speech on the Liquor Law, at the late Convention: "He would not discuss the constitutionality of the law. He would only say, with regard to that, that if we can legislate for the extermination of ravenous beasts, we may for the extermination of the greatest of all evils, which reduces the human form divine to a condition worse than that of savages."

The aggregate value of the wines annually imported into the United States is about $2,000,000; of brandy, $3,000,000; of beer, $175,000; of tobacco, snuff and cigars, $1,750,000. Total, about 12,000,000 gallons, valued at say $7,000,000. The value of tea annually imported is $5,000,000; of coffee, $12,000,000; and of fruits (raisins, figs, almonds, &c.,) $1,000,000.

A man named Gable died recently in Indiana, who was a believer in the Rappers, had not taken any nourishment for two weeks, and had burnt his hands by holding them against the fire, for the purpose of taking the electricity out, as he said, while under extraordinary excitement. Exhaustion and excitement were the probable cause of his death.

Thurlow Weed, Esq., who is now in Paris, has discovered a painting of the Genesee Falls, executed in 1795 by a brother of Louis Phillippe, while they were passing through the country to Niagara Falls. The owner has consented, at the solicitation of Mr. Weed, that this ancient painting, the first ever made of the Falls, shall be presented to the City of Rochester.

Two persons, Thomas Donavan, charged with murder, and Francis Cady, committed for assault and battery with intent to kill, escaped from the jail of Orleans County, at Albion, on the 19th ult. They were the only prisoners in the prison, which is now left without a tenant. A reward of $100 is offered for their arrest.

The Directors of the South Boston Lunatic Hospital report that, of the 225 lunatic paupers who have been chargeable to the State during the past year, 197 were foreigners, and of the 28 Americans not one was a native of Massachusetts. The support of these paupers has cost them something over $19,000.

Nine ounces, says the Scientific American, of pure fresh lime, dissolved in forty gallons of water, will purify five hundred and sixty gallons of hard water; the precipitate is chalk. It takes sixteen hours for the water to settle, and all the impurities to fall to the bottom of the vessel which contains the water.

The Plaquemine (La.) Sentinel, of Dec. 30, says that rose-bushes in that place, with full-blown roses on them, were on that day thickly covered with glistening icicles. They presented a singular contrast, and a very rare sight for that latitude.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year commences the last Wednesday in August, and closes the last Tuesday in June of each year.

Board of Instruction.

Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.

Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress.

Rev. J. W. MORTON, } Assistants.

Mr. O. B. IRISH, } Assistants.

The Terms for 1851 and 1852 are as follows:—

The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.

" Second " Dec. 3 " " March 16.

" Third " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one of two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term, Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.

Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS.

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00
Drawing,	1 00
Monochromatic Painting	3 00
Oil Painting,	5 00
Writing and Stationery,	0 50
Vocal Music, Elementary,	1 00
Advanced Class,	2 00
Instrumental Music,	8 00

Use of Organ or Piano, $2 00 per quarter.

Board, in private families, per week, from $1 25 to $1 50; in clubs, from 60 to 90 cents.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall Term, and at the middle of the Winter Term, and continue seven weeks. The course will embrace a thorough review of the common school branches, with daily lectures on "The Art of Teaching," Chemistry, Physiology, Laws of Health, School Laws, &c., &c. Tuition $2 50.

Students should not be furnished with unnecessary pocket-money, neither should minors be allowed to contract debts in the village. Either member of the Faculty will superintend the financial affairs of pupils placed under their care, by special direction from parents and guardians, if funds are furnished in advance.

THE SABBATH & THE RESURRECTION.

From "An Examination of the Authority for a Change of the Weekly Sabbath at the Resurrection of Christ; proving that the Practice of the Church in substituting the First Day of the Week for the appointed Seventh Day, is unsanctioned by the New Testament Scriptures. By JAMES A. BEGG. Author of a Connected View of the Scripture Evidence of Christ's Speedy Return, &c." [Continued.

In reference to this text, [Acts xx. 7,] there is another consideration, which seems to be wholly overlooked. In the very next chapter we are informed that Paul, in practice, was accustomed to keep the Mosaic Law, which, of course, embraced the enjoined sanctification of the seventh day as the only Sabbath, and enforced its observance. That law comprehended the Fourth commandment, as it embodied all the Ten; the Sabbath, therefore, could not be disregarded by any one observing the law. At the time the Apostle was at Troas, he was on his way to Jerusalem—the writer of the Acts being one of his companions—and the ensuing chapter records his arrival there, and the reception he met with. Welcomed, though he was, by the brethren, as an honored instrument of his Lord, he is yet informed by the Apostle James, and all the elders, of a charge which had gone abroad concerning him, that he taught "all the Jews which are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses," and that they ought not "to walk after the customs." Acts xxi. 21. By whom this unfounded report had been originated, does not appear, but it seems to have been generally believed; it, however, received no credence from James and the elders, who suggested the most effectual method of disproof, that of Paul's immediately preparing, by personal purification, to offer sacrifice in the Temple. Such a recommendation, surely, would not have been given by one apostle to another, had he not both been convinced of the falsehood of the rumor, and the rightness, in itself, of the proposed means of refutation. It was instantly adopted, without scruple, by Paul, as an honest exposition of his views, and exhibition of his practice. The faith of Paul in the point referred to, as stated by James, and to be demonstrated to the satisfaction of the church of Jerusalem, was, "that thou thyself also walkest orderly and keepest the Law." Ver. 24. All were to receive ocular demonstration that the Apostle, though laboring chiefly among the Gentiles, had not, on that account, forsaken Moses, but that he "also," as did they, walked "orderly," in their sense of that word—that is, he kept the Law. Nor is the arrangement proposed or adopted for the purpose of evidencing a change of procedure; the purification and sacrifices are not to be the symbols of repentance for past neglect, but the disproof of fallacious reports of his previous conduct, while amongst the Gentiles. It would, therefore, have been, in his own estimation, truly disorderly, had Paul, at Troas, given countenance to any meeting substituting the first day of the week, as the Sabbath, for the day appointed of the Lord, in the Law.

By his acquiescing in James' proposal, Paul was doing no violence to his convictions. It is a fact acknowledged by all who have attended to the subject, that the apostolic Jewish church continued to attend the temple, observing there the law of Moses in all its details, and this until the temple was destroyed by the Romans. The followers of Christ, immediately after his ascension "were continually in the temple, praising and blessing God." Luke xxiv. 53. Afterwards, when their number had greatly increased, as we have already noticed, the record still is, of their "continuing daily, with one accord, in the temple." Acts ii. 46. And now, when Paul had come up to Jerusalem, after laboring much among the Gentiles, it was the regard which the church there had for God's law which rendered it desirable, in James' view, and that of the elders, that all should be disabused of the unfavorable impression made upon them concerning Paul, by the false allegation that he was teaching their brethren in other parts "to forsake Moses." To them neither the death nor the resurrection of Christ had diminished the value of the Mosaic ordinances, shadowing forth, in all its parts, the great work of our redemption, through Him. "Thou seest, brother," said James and the elders, "how many thousands of Jews there are which believe, and and they are all zealous of the Law. And they are informed of thee, that thou teachest all the Jews which are among the Gentiles, to forsake Moses, saying, that they ought not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the customs. What is it, therefore? The multitude must needs come together; for they will hear that thou art come. Do, therefore, this, that we say to thee: We have four men which have a vow on them; then take and purify thyself with them, and be at charges with them, that they may shave their heads; and all may know, that those things whereof they were informed concerning thee are nothing; but that thou thyself walkest orderly, and keepest the Law." Acts xxi. 20—24.

All taking part in this transaction were men of God, lovers of Christ, and zealous for his glory. They saw nothing in the Law inimical to His cause, or unfitted to promote their sanctification. They had a personal interest in the worship appointed by God for His Temple. They not only recognized it as valuable, but, as such, obligatory upon them and all the descendants of Israel; they were, therefore, deeply interested in seeing it duly maintained. "They are all zealous of the Law," and they fear the consequences which would result from its being supposed that Paul, a Christian apostle, "taught the Jews among the Gentiles to forsake Moses." They state the decision issued concerning believing Gentiles, (ver. 25,) "that they observe no such thing;" but, for themselves, they are unanimous in observing the requirements of God's covenant. The Gentiles, as the children of Adam, had received through him the blessing of the Sabbath; but the Law, of which the Sabbath only formed a part, though a much-prized part, was given to Israel in "perpetual covenant." Of the stock of Israel, Paul, James, and the rest of the brethren, here, were; and the advice given is in accordance with the obligations resting on them all; and the proposal, immediately to purify and sacrifice, is accepted, without scruple, by the Apostle of the Gentiles, for the very purpose of making it evident to all that the charges circulated concerning him were unfounded, and that "he walked orderly, keeping the Law. "Then Paul took the men, and, the next day, purifying himself with them, entered into the temple, to signify the accomplishment of the days of purification, until that an offering should be offered for every one of them." Ver. 26.

Now, all this, following so immediately after the meeting at Troas, is instructive. The Sabbath enactment was engrossed in the law which Paul still kept, and for which all believing Jews were thus zealous; and for the apostle, in these circumstances, to have taken part in, or given countenance to, an assembly professedly changing the Sabbath, must have been viewed by him as disorderly. But he could not have done so; for this was not justly chargeable against the apostle; and he was ready to afford ocular demonstration to all, that he continued to keep the Law, though, with Christian light of its meaning. When, after this, as a prisoner, he reached Rome, he could, and did, aver to "the chief of the Jews" there, as recorded in the very last chapter of the Book of Acts, that he had "committed nothing against the people or customs of our fathers." Acts xxiii. 17. Would this have been true, if he had taught, by practice or precept, that the Sabbath had been changed from the Seventh day to the First?

Nor is it to be supposed that the Jewish Christian Church, under the guidance of the twelve Apostles, (who for a length of time all remained at Jerusalem,) and which was the pattern to other churches, and which gave forth the decision of the Lord, exempting believing Gentiles from circumcision, themselves erred, in this their devoted adherence to the Mosiac Law. On those so acting, be it remembered, the Lord the Spirit has set the seal of His special approval; for "then had the churches rest throughout all Judea, and Galilee, and Samaria, and were edified; and, walking in the fear of the Lord, and the comfort of the Holy Ghost, were multiplied." Acts ix. 31. And, when afterwards exposed to persecution, they are directed, in an Epistle addressed specially to them, to "call to remembrance the former days, in which, after ye were illuminated, ye endured a great fight of afflictions," (Heb. x. 32,) through fidelity to their Saviour.

It is also important, farther to observe, that not only have we this guarantee, that the Sabbath could not have been changed by a church zealous of the Law—including, in this number, its apostolic guides—but we have express mention of the Sabbath itself, throughout this Book of Acts, in terms which plainly imply its continuance. In numerous texts, the Seventh day—the Sabbath observed by unbelieving Jews—is still spoken of as "the Sabbath," which, had the Seventh day given place to the First, it could not have been. As, in such a case, the Seventh day would have ceased to be "the Sabbath;" instead of its continuing afterwards to be called so, we could only have had allusions to it, as having once held that distinguished place. But the references to this inspired history of the church, during upwards of thirty years of its progress subsequently to the ascension of our Lord, clearly imply that no such change had then been made. Let us briefly notice these.

When Paul and his companions came to Antioch, in Pisidia, they "went into the synagogue on the Sabbath day, and sat down. And, after the reading of the Law and the Prophets, the rulers of the synagogue" requested them to address the assembly, which Paul did. (Acts xiii. 14.) Here, it is neither the circumstance of their entering the Jewish synagogue, nor the fact of Paul's addressing those present, which arrests our attention. But, surely, most significant it should appear to all, that the day which the Jews were observing as the Sabbath, is still recognized and thus expressly called "the Sabbath day" by the inspired writer of the church's history—and this so very long after the ascension of our Lord. Paul himself, also, in the speech which he made on this occasion, speaks also of the Sabbath as still existing, and that in a connection still more remarkable. Referring to the death of Christ, he says: "They that dwell at Jerusalem, and their rulers, because they knew Him not, nor yet the voice of the prophets, which are read every Sabbath day, they have fulfilled them, in condemning Him. And though they found no cause of death in Him, yet desired they Pilate that He should be slain. And when they had fulfilled all that was written of Him, they took Him down from the tree, and laid Him in a sepulchre. But God raised Him from the dead; and He was seen many days of them which came up with Him from Galilee to Jerusalem, who are His witnesses unto the people." Acts xiii. 27—31. If it had been true that the Sabbath was changed at the resurrection of Christ, here was, indeed, a most favorable opportunity of testifying to the fact. Paul addresses a Jewish auditory in a Jewish synagogue, with the consent of their rulers. In their ignorance that any change of the Sabbath was designed, or had been effected, they were sanctifying, as formerly, the Seventh day, as still "the Sabbath day;" and Paul found them so doing. The apostle, with a correct estimate of the importance of the work of Christ, sets before them the truth concerning His death, yea, and of God's having "raised Him from the dead." If, then, it had been true, are we to suppose that he would not have added, that because of His resurrection on the First day of the week, God had changed the Sabbath to that day?

Suitable as was the occasion, and absolutely called for in such circumstances, Paul, whose spirit was stirred within him when at Athens among idolators, to declare unto them the God whom they ignorantly worshiped—Paul, whose zeal for the conversion of his brethren so often exposed him to contumely, led him into perils, and subjected him to sufferings—speaks now to his brethren, by their own invitation—tells them of the death of Christ, and of the triumph He received over death and the devil, when "God raised Him from the dead," and yet is altogether silent on what is now regarded as so distinguished a part of that triumph—the change of the Sabbath on account of His resurrection. Nor is this all. Instead of setting these brethren right in this respect, Paul, on this occasion did what, if now the church were right, directly tended to confirm the Jews in error. He not merely says nothing of the asserted change, but he also speaks of the Sabbath they observed as being still—just as it had been in the time of Pilate—truly "the Sabbath day." He does not say that their rulers fulfilled the sayings of the prophets, which were read on, what was then, before it was changed, the Sabbath day; but he identifies the Sabbath which had been then observed, with that which was still being observed while he spake—"the prophets which are read every Sabbath day." When were the Jews to be informed of the change of the Sabbath, (if changed it had been,) if not on such an occasion as this? And who could be expected to tell it to them, if Paul would not?

This was, indeed, a memorable meeting; and it led to another still more so. For Paul, having farther spoken of the Resurrection of Christ, and of David's prediction, that He should be so raised, and having warned them of the danger of despising such a Saviour, received an invitation to repeat his instructions. The interest excited is not, however, specially, nor chiefly, among the Jews; but, "when the Jews were gone out of the synagogue, the Gentiles besought them that these words might be preached to them the next Sabbath." Ver. 42. The day sanctified at the first, and given to Adam, was designed for a blessing to all his posterity; and, in the law of the Sabbath, afterwards promulgated to Israel from Sinai, "the stranger" within their gates was embraced. But so far had the Gentiles generally departed from God and His ways, that it is not a little interesting to read this Gentile entreaty, that a crucified and arisen Redeemer "might be preached to them the next Sabbath," rather than on some other day. The request was complied with; "and, the next Sabbath day, came almost the whole city to hear the word of God." Ver. 44. The day selected was thus wisely chosen. The effect of the discourse upon the Gentiles was also highly encouraging; for when, by reason of the opposition of the Jews, Paul and Barnabas were led to exclaim, "Lo, we turn to the Gentiles!" we are informed that "when the Gentiles heard this, they were glad, and glorified the word of the Lord." Ver. 45—48.

Still, in all this, we find as little intimation to the Gentiles as previously to the Jews, that now the Sabbath was changed from the Seventh day to the First. On the contrary, the seal of the inspiring spirit is, again, set to the fact, that no such change had then been made. That still was "the Sabbath day," upon which almost the whole city came together, else the Spirit of truth would not have called it so. Some instruction the Gentiles, also, might have been supposed to need, if they likewise had been under mistake as to which day was now the Sabbath; but they are left uninstructed, and we are misled, if that was not in truth, as it is called, "the next Sabbath day."

[To be concluded.

WORSHIP AMONG THE MOSLEMS.

The Mosques, or temples for religious worship among the Mahometans, are exceedingly numerous and of various sizes—some of them being capable of accommodating only 120 persons, while others—especially the Mosque of Omar in Jerusalem—cover an area much larger than the largest cathedral in Europe. The architecture of these buildings is the Saracenic. In Mahometan countries, the people are very particular in attending places of worship, and appear very devout and sincere—everything is conducted with the greatest solemnity and propriety. The interior of the Mosques is without ornament or furniture of any description. There is neither desk, pulpit, stool, or chair, nothing but the bare walls—the pavement is generally of marble, of different colors, forming a beautiful mosaic. On Friday, which is the Sabbath of the Mahometans, three sermons are delivered in the Mosques, by the muftis or priests. These sermons are sometimes founded on a text from the Koran, and sometimes originate in some local or historical incident, but never relate to doctrinal points—hence religious controversies are almost unknown among the Turks. Bells are not used to summon the people to public worship, but persons are chosen for the capacity and melody of their voices, called muezzins or criers, who ascend the balconies in the minarates of the Mosques, and proclaim with a loud voice, the hour of prayer, producing an interesting and solemn effect. On entering the Mosque, the slippers are left at the door, and no pomp or pageantry is witnessed in the interior of the building—not even if the Sultan himself is among the worshipers. Their worship is unattended with any music, being simplicity itself. [Boston Journal.

A FAITHFUL PASTOR.

An anecdote was told me by a well known Irish character, Thaddeus Conolly, who used to spend much of his time in wandering through Ireland, and instructing the lower classes in their native language. "I went," said he, "one Sunday into a church, to which a new incumbent had been appointed. The congregation did not exceed half a dozen, but the preacher delivered himself with as much energy and affection as if he were addressing a crowded audience. After service, I expressed to the clergyman my surprise that he should hold forth so fervently to such a small number." "Were there but one," said the rector, "my anxiety for his improvement would make me equally energetic." The following year Conolly went into the same church; the congregation was multiplied twenty fold; a third year he found the church full. [Dr. Gilly.

MY BOY.

BY REV. JOHN PIERPONT.

I cannot make him dead!
His fair sunshiny head
Is ever bounding round my study chair;
Yet when my eyes, now dim
With tears, I turn to him,
The vision vanishes—he is not there!

I walk my parlor floor,
And, through the open door,
I hear a footfall on the chamber stair;
I'm stepping toward the hall,
To give the boy a call,
And then bethink me that—he is not there!

I thread the crowded street,
A satchel'd lad I meet,
With the same beaming eyes and colored hair;
And, as he's running by,
Follow him with my eye,
Scarcely believing that—he is not there!

I know his face is hid
Under the coffin lid;
Closed are his eyes; cold is his forehead fair;
My hand that marble felt,
O'er it in prayer I knelt;
Yet my heart whispers that—he is not there!

I can not MAKE him dead!
When passing by his bed,
So long watched over with paternal care,
My spirit and my eye
Seek it inquiringly,
Before the thought comes that—he is not there!

When at the cool, grey break
Of day, from sleep I wake,
With my first breathing of the morning air,
My soul goes up, with joy,
To Him who gave my boy;
Then comes the sad thought that—he is not there!

When at the day's calm close,
Before we seek repose,
I'm with his mother, offering up our prayer,
Whate'er I may be SAYING,
I am, in spirit, praying
For our boy's spirit, though—he is not there!

Not there? Where, then, is he?
The form I used to see
Was but the RAIMENT that he used to wear.
The grave that now doth press,
Upon that cast-off dress,
Is but his wardrobe locked—HE is not there!

He lives!—In all the past
He lives; nor, to the last,
Of seeing him again will I despair;
In dreams I see him now,
And on his angel brow,
I see is written, "Thou shalt see me THERE!"

Yes, we all live to God!
FATHER, thy chastening rod
So help us, thine afflicted ones, to bear,
That in the spirit land,
Meeting at thy right hand
'Twill be our heaven to find that—he is THERE!

THE PROVOCATION.

That there is to be a sanguinary, universal, and terrible war, more important in its consequences, and more conclusive and exterminating in its results, than any other ever experienced from the beginning of the world, is evident from all the prophets. It seems to be alluded to by them as the great conflict, in comparison with which all others have been mere preludes. It is called "The day of the Lord," "The great day of the Lord," "The day of vengeance," "The time of trouble," "The day of decision," &c. In reading the prophets on this subject, we are every where made to understand, that the Lord has a terrible controversy with the people, to express which language is apparently inadequate. All the figures of poetic prophecy seem exhausted in attempting a description of the sublime spectacle of a world in arms—summoned to the conflict, for the empire of the world—with the forces of the lamb, the kingdom which the God of heaven will set up, and to meet His terrible and retributive wrath.

The details, and the expressions used in the various descriptions of it, have induced some to conclude, that it was intended as a description of the Day of Judgment. I however conclude, that it is the same as brought to view in foregoing articles, or the war of "Armageddon." If such be the case, and it is a war of monarchs, for the perpetuation of the principles of monarchy, or the right of the few to dispose of the destinies of the many, without regard to their personal interests or happiness, the provocation is evident to all, and the retribution must be awful.

Taking, then, the position that the war consists of the monarchs or despots of the world, (for it is to be universal,) on the one side, contending for the principles of their governments, "the divine right of kings" to control, oppress, and enslave the world; and the subjects of the kingdom of the stone, "the forces of the Lamb," who is described in the Apocalyptic vision, Rev. 18 : 24, to avenge the wrongs and ruin of the world, effected by their ambition, tyranny, and cupidity; we have a cause equal to any description of retribution that physical forces could inflict.

The conflict may not be retributive merely, but for the disenthrallment of the people themselves, led forth for their own enlargement, on the principles of Bible morality and gospel fraternity. In looking over the history of the world, down to the present time, let the historian examine the woes and sufferings introduced in the detail of ancient as well as modern warfare, and he will then count the miseries, the wailings, the sorrow and blood, in those overwhelming wars, where cities were sacked, and given up to rapine and murder, to the violence of savage and unprincipled soldiery; whole nations carried into captivity, and subjected to wrongs and sufferings at which humanity weeps, and tyranny would blush. The whole system of wars for conquest, for power and dominion, is ascribed to the ambition and cupidity of despots. Nor is this all; they have been the principal propagators and supporters of the cruel superstitions of pagan and false religions, "with Moloch's horrid rites, besmeared with blood of human sacrifice, and parents' tears." They have pandered to the lusts of the Beast, and her that sat upon him, and made her "drunk with the blood of the saints and of the martyrs of Jesus"—those terrible persecutors, who have blackened the pages of history, the more firmly to hold their subjects in vassalage, and secure their loyalty, under the most appalling and extravagant demands; these are the provocations to the war.

The policy of the people, could they have spoken out for themselves, from the time of Nimrod down to the present, would have been peace and quietude, and non-intervention in the affairs of others. Contented with governments that would protect their rights, they would have been as industrious and happy as their fallen state would have admitted. Let the imagination extend itself over the whole catalogue of sufferings to which humanity has been subjected, and the conviction will be, that ninety-nine of a hundred cases of suffering from wrongs and privation, the miseries and woes of men, are traceable to a system of legalized oppression and wars, the offsprings of ambition, the ruling passion of monarchs. In the present enlightened state of the world, when the principles of Christianty should have been generally known, there are those who apologize for, and even advocate, the system of war, as ennobling, and developing man, and giving opportunity for great and generous emotions. The history of Europe for the last half century develops enough to kindle generous emotions, and make the heart sick in the retrospect; and no language is capable of expressing adequately the miseries and sorrows entailed. And even the peace establishments of Europe are said to cost the enormous amount of $500,000,000, taxed on the people, to enable their despotic rulers to keep them in subjection. A people once the masters of their destinies, and establishing governments in accordence with true democratic principles, under the rule of justice and brotherhood, such as our own professes, and the enormous expenditures for wars would cease. Wars for conquest once discarded, and defensive preparations would no longer be necessary.

In this conflict, which will soon engage the attention of the world, and which we are assured will terminate for the cause of universal emancipation, the Jews are made in the prophecies of scripture to sustain a conspicuous part. They are made to appear the principal party to the war; and the ten kingdoms are prominent on the other side. The probability is, that no other nation on earth has suffered so much as they, and the immediate cause of their suffering has been the monarchies represented in the image. From the time they were carried in captivity to Babylon, they have been under the yoke, till finally scattered over the face of the earth, continually suffering, but never able to repel or avenge their wrongs. They have, therefore, of all the nations on earth, the greatest account of wrongs to settle with the tyrants of the world.

Many speculations are indulged respecting the nature of the conflict, whether the description should be understood as implying a moral struggle, a spiritual warfare, or whether we are justified in considering it literally. To the last conclusion I feel myself compelled to come, as the only focus for all the rays of light to fall on in the scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, compared with the passing events and aspirations of the world. It is true, they are so highly figurative that it would betray folly in any one to attempt a detail; still, that all concur in the description of the general features of a literal conflict, which we have before contemplated, is evident.

Such being the case, we may learn the importance of taking a consistent stand in civil as well as in religious matters. Our patriotism will not excuse us in giving countenance to the government in framing oppressive laws, on in anywise upholding the principle of despotism, so clearly destined to an overthrow, overwhelming all its advocates in the general ruin. There is danger, indeed, that millions will be compelled, or induced by mistaken convictions of duty to their governments and rulers, to fall and be buried in the ruins of this gigantic Collossus, losing the highest hope on earth, if not the bliss of heaven.

It may be objected, that under our free institutions, there can be no danger. But it should be remembered, that this conflict is a war of principle, and the principles opposed to right and justice, and in favor of oppression, in any form of government, will not be successful. We are a fragment from the foot of the image, and have some of the iron of oppression in our laws, which enters into the souls of some of our fellows, which must be eradicated, or we must fall. The true principle of social intercourse—in the Old Testament, the religion of the Jew—and in the New Testament, the rule of Christian society—is the same—"Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself; and, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them." By advocating and sustaining this principle in civil government, as well as in society, we may identify ourselves with that kingdom that is destined to fill the whole world, and stand forever. J. M.

LEARN TO BE SILENT.—It is a great art in the Christian life to learn to be silent. Under oppositions, injuries, still be silent. It is better to say nothing, than to speak in an excited or angry manner, even if the occasion seem to justify a degree of anger. By remaining silent, the mind is enabled to collect itself, and to call upon God in secret aspirations of prayer. And thus you will speak to the honor of your holy profession, as well as the good of those who have injured you, when you speak from God.

TWO GODLESS COLLEGES.

Girard College is a singular instance of the interposition of Providence to turn the wrath of man to His praise. The founder took special pains to guard against the introduction of religious teaching among the orphans who were to share his bounty, by making it a condition of the will that no clergyman should enter its walls. And yet, in the organization of the college, it was found practicable, without infringing on the condition of the will, to introduce devotional exercises and religious teaching without the presence of clergymen. A correspondent of the Congregational Journal, in describing a visit to the college, says he found a commodious chapel filled at an early hour each day, with over 300 young lads and their officers, "for prayer and praise and reading the Scriptures, and on the Sabbath, three times for regular worship and instruction in heavenly things. We found the Professors or Principal and teachers, as they are called, devout Christians, overseeing the [illegible] science and arts, but also the pure and holy principles of religion. The order, neatness, comforts, and plain and wholesome food and clothing furnished them, gave us great satisfaction."

The University of Virginia is another instance. The Central Christian Herald says:

"When Mr. Jefferson founded the University of Virginia, he determined that it should not come under the influence of the Christian religion. His experiment worked badly. It was soon found, that without religious influence, there could be no success, and arrangements were made to introduce a chaplain. The presence and labors of such an individual soon changed the state of affairs. Under the wise arrangements of the chaplain last year, a course of lectures was delivered on the Evidences of Christianity, by several clergymen of the Old School branch of the Presbyterian Church. These lectures, which were marked by learning, tact, and ability, in their delivery, have just been published by Messrs. Carter of New York, and will form a very valuable addition to our apologetic literature. Thus has God overruled the wrath of man, so that the very institution which was reared to uphold infidelity, has sent forth one of the ablest defenses of the divine origin of Christianity, of the present day."

MISSIONARIES HAPPY.

Many suppose that they who go to spend their days among the heathen are greatly to be pitied, they are so shut out from all that makes life happy with us. They indeed lack many things that we highly prize; sometimes they lack more of them than we can imagine, or they themselves describe; but they are not to be pitied. The station which they occupy is to be desired above all others. The condition of the man whom the people delight to honor, or his who possesses immense wealth, is not to be compared with that of the devoted missionary. What happiness it will afford them to be addressed by the Saviour, "Enter ye into the joy of your Lord!" What happiness will be their's as they "shall shine as the stars forever and ever!"

But they do not have to wait till the hour of death for the beginning of their joy. "Missionaries," says one who has had large opportunities for knowing, "are the happiest people on earth." A little while ago I heard a missionary, who was driven home by a failure of health, and who longs to return, tell a Sabbath school, "I was never so happy as when on heathen ground, and never expect to be again." And now Mrs. Bridgeman says to you in a letter from Shanghae, China, May 21, 1851: "It is six years to-day since I arrived in China. I cannot tell you, dear children, how thankful I am for the privilege of dwelling among this heathen people, and teaching them the blessed gospel." Then, partly from her own happiness in the work, and in part from the wretchedness of those who have not the gospel, she asks, "Who of you have consecrated yourselves to God in reference to the cause of missions? We read of many precious revivals in America. How many of you have been partakers of the blessings from on high? 'Freely you have received; freely give.'" [Dayspring.

LOSSES BY RELIGION.

Near London there dwelt an old couple. In early life they had been poor; but the husband became a Christian, and God blessed their industry, and they were living in a comfortable retirement, when one day a stranger called on them to ask their subscription to a charity. The old lady had less religion than her husband, and still hankered after some of the earnings which Thomas had forfeited from regard to the law of God. So, when the visitor asked their contributions, she interposed, and said, "Why, sir, we have lost a deal by religion since we first began; my husband knows that very well. Have we not, Thomas?"

After a solemn pause, Thomas answered, "Yes, Mary, we have. Before I got religion, Mary, I had an old slouched hat, a tattered coat, and mended shoes and stockings; but I have lost them long ago. And, Mary, you know that, poor as I was, I had a habit of getting drunk and quarreling with you; and that, you know, I have lost. And then I had a burdened conscience, and a wicked heart, and ten thousand guilty fears; but all are lost, completely lost, and, like a millstone, cast into the deepest sea. And, Mary, you have been a loser too, though not so great a loser as myself. Before we got religion, Mary, you had a washing-tray, in which you washed for hire; but since then, you have lost your washing-tray. And you had a gown and bonnet much the worse for wear; but you have lost them long ago. And you had many an aching heart concerning me at times, but these you happily have lost. And I could even wish that you had lost as much as I, for what we lose for religion will be an everlasting gain."

The inventory of losses by religion runs thus: a bad character; a guilty conscience; a troublesome temper; sundry evil habits, and a set of evil companions. The inventory of blessings gained by religion includes all that is worth having in time and eternity.

"FOREKNOWLEDGE."

Reply to Bro. Hall—Concluded.

In the vocabulary of every-day life, contingency denotes that which comes without any design, foresight, or expectation on our part. On our part, we speak of contingencies; but with an infinite being, nothing can be contingent. This is so clear, that metaphysical writers have generally employed the term in a more restrained sense, viz. as denoting that which comes without necessity; "something which has absolutely no previous ground or reason, with which its existence has any fixed and certain connection." Our arguments have been, and will be, designed to show that, in this metaphysical sense of the term, a contingent event cannot have any existence. Consequently, those who maintain the doctrine of contingency, must, in the end, either abandon this metaphysical definition, and adopt the common one, or, like Socinus and his followers, conclude that the attribute of knowledge does not belong to the Almighty to the extent in which it is usually understood. Taking the word in its common acceptation, we can admit, without hesitation, that God foreknows some events as contingent.

In proof that a strict [illegible] is absolutely unknowable by any understanding, finite or infinite, we quoted the conclusive argument of President Edwards. But Bro. H. thinks, that "the rule of President E., if it have any force, must have it with respect to a finite mind, and not with respect to an infinite mind. Self-evidence to any mind has as much to do with the mind's ability to seize upon the evidence in the case as any thing else," &c. Now we thought, that the argument of Edwards made it clear, that "there is absolutely no evidence at all of the future existence of that event which is contingent, without all necessity;" and that "an increase of understanding, or of the capacity of discerning, has no tendency, and makes no advance, to a discerning any signs or evidences of it, let it be increased ever so much." (See our reply to Bro. C., Jan. 8.) The fallacy of this argument Bro. H. has not pointed out; and we would just remind him, that, whatever may be "the mind's ability to seize upon the evidence," it has no ability to seize upon evidence where there is none.

Besides, Bro. H. says, that "with God fore-knowledge is the same as after knowledge." Very well. Now, after an event has actually taken place, and so become a matter of after-knowledge, is it any longer contingent? Has not its past existence become a matter of necessity? Is not the proposition which affirms past existence of it, necessarily true? Wherefore, if foreknowledge is the same as after-knowledge, the proposition which affirms future existence of an event which is certain to take place, is necessarily true; and the futurition of it is necessary.

Another thing; when our brother says that "self-evidence must exist in exact proportion to the mind's ability to know," he surely does not mean, that there is no difference between self-evident truths and those which are evident from their connection with other truths. A proposition which is self-evident, requires not the aid of other truths [illegible] make it evident. The bare statement of it affords all the evidence of its truth that it can have. Let mathematics afford an illustration. Two parallel lines will never meet, however far extended. This is an axiom, or self-evident truth. It has all the evidence it can have in itself; and would continue to be evident, though every other truth in the world were proved false. But the proposition, The three angles of a triangle are together equal to two right angles, is a theorem, whose truth depends upon other truths previously established. Now it is true, that, while a finite mind arrives at a knowledge of the truth of this proposition by a process of reasoning, an infinite mind is under no necessity of resorting to such a process. The proposition is as clear to the Divine Mind, as an axiom is to us. But the mode in which an infinite being knows things, is one thing; the objects of his knowledge quite another. Now, if the mathematical proposition stated above does really depend upon other truths, and is so connected with them that it cannot be true without their aid, this connection is the object of the divine knowledge, whatever may be said about the mode of that knowledge; for God views things as they are. So in regard to all future human events; their futurition may be, and we doubt not is, self-evident to the Deity. But will they come into existence without causes to necessitate their existence? When they transpire, will they not be found to have been brought about under the influence of previously existing events? Will not their connection with these previous events then become manifest to human observation? If so, this connection is now the object of God's certain foreknowledge; for God views things as they are. Be it so, however, that all future events are self-evident to the Divine Mind; this does not weaken our position, but strengthens it. Self-evidence of such events is the real and infallible futurity of the events themselves.

Our correspondent talks about the "law of contingencies." He says, "To say that the Almighty cannot certainly foresee an event because it is contingent, is to say, that there are conditions in the law of contingencies which God cannot comprehend." We do not understand this language. If by contingency is meant nothing more than that which comes without any design, foresight, or expectation on our part, it is plain enough; and we are ready to say, that we hold to no such absurdity. But if contingency means what metaphysical writers usually mean by it—something which comes without necessity; "something which has absolutely no previous ground or reason, with which its existence has any fixed and certain connection"—we do not see how it can be subject to any law at all. "The law of contingencies," in this case, is language without meaning.

"God as certainly foresees what I will do as what He has decreed I shall do." If God certainly foresees what you will do, He foresees that you will certainly do it. And any proposition affirming that you will possibly not do it, he foresees or foreknows to be false. The absolute and unfrustrable certainty of your doing it, is the foundation of his certain foreknowledge of it. By how much you take away the certainty of the act itself, by so much you take away God's certain foreknowledge of it. And if the act is first certain before God can have any foreknowledge of it, some cause or power has made it certain—that is, has necessitated it—that is, has decreed it; otherwise, you have an effect without a cause.

We proceed to examine the argument from human responsibility. "Human consciousness is against the doctrine of necessity, in every instance where it affirms human re-[illegible] we have been somewhat puzzled to decide whether our brother does not mean conscience instead of consciousness. But, whichever be his meaning, we are not impressed with the truth of his argument, notwithstanding the solemnity with which he adjures us to confess the contrary. It is not the province of consciousness to say, whether the two propositions, All human actions are decreed, and, Man is responsible for his conduct, are contradictory. Bro. H. may infer, if he pleases, that man is not responsible if all human actions are decreed; but he must remember that inferring is not the office of consciousness, but of reason. Whether the reason which teaches him to draw this inference is right reason, is the very point under discussion.

In the opinion of our brother, the proposition which affirms the predetermination of all human actions, "refers the power to God," and "therefore the responsibility is with Him." Pray, how is this? Our system amply concedes that man has a natural power to do right. He possesses all the physical and intellectual capacities which are requisite for serving God; he has all needed opportunities for doing the things which are required of him; there is, therefore, no natural necessity for his doing wrong. Yet he lacks moral power; that is, he lacks the disposition. Hence, the only sense in which it is true that the proposition objected to "refers the power to God," is that it refers to Him the power to originate in man the moral power, or disposition to do right. And does this relieve man from responsibility? Does it throw the responsibility on God?

"Power and responsibility go hand in hand." "Responsibility and power must go together." "When the actions of men are controlled by God, responsibility is removed from them, unless they have forfeited the power of volition." But who denies that man has the power of volition? What we deny is, that man has the power to originate his volitions, or even to change them. Every man has the power to exercise volition, and uses the power constantly; it is a part of his very nature. But ask him to change his predominant inclination; in what way will he go about doing it? The very idea supposes a contradiction; for if he does it, he must be either voluntary, or involuntary, in doing it. If the latter, it is no exercise of free-agency; and if the former, he must have two opposing predominant inclinations at the same time—a thing impossible. Take a simple case for illustration. Here is a fifty-cent piece, and here is a double-eagle, or twenty-dollar gold piece. Both of them we lay down before our correspondent, and ask him which of the two he chooses to have. At once, he chooses the gold piece. Again we ask, if it is in his power to choose the other? Now we do not ask, if it is in his power to take the fifty-cent coin, put it in his pocket, and walk off with it, leaving the gold where it lies. We admit that it is. But, in the absence of all extrinsic causes to affect his volitions, is it in his power to choose the half-dollar? Does he prefer it to the other? Can he originate in himself any such preference? For this is what the question of human responsibility comes to, in reality. It is a question of volition; the merit of all human actions lying in that state of the heart, virtuous inclination, or choice, which prompts them. This being the case, Bro. H.'s solemn question is easily answered. Bro. Brown is conscious of exercising choice in regard to whatever is submitted to him; he possesses the "power of volition"; he does just as he chooses—just as his predominant inclination leads him to do. And on this account he feels himself a responsible agent. But his "consciousness" does not teach him that he has power to originate a volition; he never yet caught himself in the act.

As we do not deny that men have the "power of volition," so neither do we maintain that "they have forfeited this power, and that a control is exercised over them as a punishment." We believe that those who are suffering the pains of hell are as much free-agents as they ever were. In their place of punishment they go on sinning, and will forever; but they will do so, not because they have forfeited the power of volition, and are compelled to do so, but because it is their confirmed inclination. They lack the moral power to cease from sinning, and this is one great reason why their escape from that place of torment is impossible. The devil himself is a free-agent. He possesses all the natural capacities requisite for serving his Creator, but he is such a devil that he cannot cease from sin. But does not God hold him responsible for every sin he commits?

The reference which our correspondent makes to Mesmerism, will not answer his purpose. The mesmeric influence is physical; the magnetizer operates first upon the body—upon the nervous system—and through this medium throws a spell upon the will, for a time. No such power is employed by the Almighty in controlling the actions of rational creatures. God hardened Pharaoh's heart (Ex. 14: 8,) not by positive efficiency, nor by any thing analogous to mesmeric influence, but by that sovereign disposal of moral causes which was certain to bring about the result. But, by the way, does not the mesmeric phenomenon furnish an example of the "application of physical necessity to a moral agent"—the thing which our brother was so "astonished to hear from a man of Bro. Brown's 'acumen'?"

The instances which Bro. H. adduces from the Bible, to disprove the doctrine of necessity, are all perfectly reconcilable with the distinction between natural and moral necessity. Ananias and Sapphira acted voluntarily, and therefore freely, yet by that moral necessity which the covetousness of their hearts created. "The poor—whensoever ye will ye may do them good." But when there is will to do so, there is no moral necessity to do otherwise. "If we sin willfully after we have received the knowledge of the truth," &c. The devil sins, notwithstanding his knowledge of duty, and that too by a moral necessity. Nevertheless, he is guilty; awfully, wickedly, horribly guilty for every sin he commits. Moral necessity will not excuse him; neither will it excuse his children.

In view of the insinuation, that the distinction between natural and moral necessity is "more specious than solid," we have a simple question to propose. Is it possible for an unrenewed man to keep the law of God? Read Rom. 8: 7, and then answer. See also James 2: 10. But is he not guilty for not doing it? Does not every transgression and disobedience result from a depraved will? Is not his depraved will his wickedness? Or is it merely his misfortune? If it is not possible for him to keep the holy and just and good law of God, it is a case of moral inability. Yet that he has every natural power requisite for rendering obedience, Bro. Hull will not undertake to deny.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Meshullam and his Colony.

GLASGOW, January 23, 1852.

Deeply interesting are the statements in recent numbers of the Sabbath Recorder relative to the efforts of the Jewish Christian, John Meshullam, in the Holy City, and the fertile fields of Artos, in its neighborhood. To those observing God's holy Sabbath, it surely belongs to give all aid and encouragement possible, and to cultivate brotherly relation to that infant colony in their laying hold upon God's covenant. If an apostate church has been the occasion of stumbling to the Jew, through rejection of the Sabbath, it well becomes those who know the significance and importance of that institution, to seek to roll away the reproach which, in the eye of the Jews, has been heaped upon the "name that is above every name," through His disciples having falsely asserted that He had authorized its abolition or its change. Of all the numerous tokens which by-past years have furnished of the faithfulness of the Promiser, who says, "I will remember the land," this is doubtless the most important. Travelers of every country and of every class, (including those whose mission has mainly been to verify and elucidate the Divine Word,) have seen and written much of the evidences of the curse of God having lain heavy upon it. But how little have they seen or thought of the connection between the cause and the curse! How little have they considered of the condition under which that curse is to be converted into blessing! When Israel shall confess their iniquity, and that they have been brought into their enemies' lands because they "walked contrary" unto their God—when they have been humbled, and accept their punishment—"then," saith the Lord, "then will I remember my covenant with Jacob, and also my covenant with Isaac, and also my covenant with Abraham will I remember; and I will remember the land. The land also shall be left of them, and shall ENJOY HER SABBATHS, while she lieth desolate without them; and they shall accept the punishment of their iniquity; because, even because they despised my judgments, and because their soul abhorred my statutes. And yet for all that, when they be in the land of their enemies, I will not cast them away. . . . . But I will for their sakes remember the covenant of their ancestors." Lev. xxvi. 40—46. While many of them are departing farther and farther from the law of their God, and, as foretold by the prophet, saying, "We will be as the nations," it is well to know that others there are who, humbling themselves, and accepting their punishment, are laying hold on Jehovah's covenant, and asking for "the old paths," that they may walk therein. Let us seek to strengthen such in their God, recalling to them His promise, "The Lord shall guide thee continually, and satisfy thy soul in drought, and make fat thy bones; and thou shalt be like a watered garden, and like a spring of water, whose waters fail not. And they that shall be of thee shall build the old waste places; thou shalt raise up the foundations of many generations; and thou shalt be called, The Repairer of the breach, The Restorer of paths to dwell in. If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day; and call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honorable; and shalt honor Him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words; then shalt thou delight in the Lord, and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth, and feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." Isaiah lviii. 11—14.

God is surely opening the way, in that land even, for "the sons of the stranger that join themselves to the Lord, to serve Him, and to love the name of Lord, to be His servants, every one that keepeth the Sabbath from polluting it, and taketh hold of my covenant." Isaiah lvi. 6. The Turkish Sultan has recently issued a firman in favor of the Christian Protestants, allowing them to meet together freely as such; also permitting their births and marriages to be registered in the public registers. The Episcopal Church has its chapel on Mount Zion, with its Bishop of Jewish birth; and the London Church Missionary Society has resolved now to make Jerusalem their head quarters for the East; and one of their missionaries has already proceeded to his destination. Meanwhile, the Popish and Greek churches are contending for possession of the Holy Sepulchre. Russia on this point lately took up a menacing attitude towards the Porte—the Emperor being the head or Pope of the Eastern apostacy. It matters little which of them succeed in grasping this prize; but it will be much to the honor of the Sabbath-keepers, if in such a crisis they should so come to the help of the Lord against the mighty, as to encourage the hearts of His people to look to Him who is mighty to save.

J. A. BEGG.

WESTERN CORRESPONDENCE.

[The following letter to one of the editors of the Sabbath Recorder, gives so much information of general interest, that we take the liberty of printing it, although uncertain whether it was written with that view.]

SULLIVAN, Indiana, Jan. 18th, 1852.

I am this winter itinerating in the State of Indiana, on behalf of the American Bible Union; and I am gratified to be able to say, that I find many warm friends of the cause in almost every place where I have presented the subject at the West. I feel, myself, a growing interest in the cause; and from what I have learned and seen of the progress of public opinion upon the matter, together with the extensive and judicious arrangements which the Board of Managers have made for obtaining a corrected version of the Holy Scriptures in our own tongue, I have no doubt of the ultimate success of the Union, in bringing a better version of the blessed Book of God into extensive use among the churches of Christ. I hope to see the day when King James' version will be supplanted by a version more in accordance with the mind of King Jesus.

Of course my business is to advocate the cause of the Union, and do all I can to promote its interests. I travel simply in the name of the Union, and as its accredited agent; and sometimes I am not asked to what denomination I belong; sometimes it is taken for granted that I am simply a Baptist; at other times, I am asked to what church I belong; and as I inform them, it often leads to friendly conversation on the subject; and in this way I have found some facts in the history of Sabbath-keepers, that were new to me, and I presume to many of your readers, who feel a deep interest in these things.

In Manard County, Illinois, I became acquainted with a very respectable farmer of the name of James Taylor, a deacon of the Christian Church on Wolf Creek, who informed me, that his forefathers were Seventh-day Baptists in Maryland, and removed thence to Chester County, South Carolina, thence to Alabama, and thence to Kentucky; and that in all these migrations the Sabbath of Jehovah was maintained in the family until the present generation, who have now all conformed to the custom of this world; but, added he, if ever there was a pious woman in the world, my grandmother was one, and she strictly kept the Sabbath unto the day of her death. This information seemed to confirm the information given me by a traveling gentleman, some few years ago, of the existence of a Sabbath-keeping church in South Carolina. I have heard of the existence of a church under like circumstances in Missouri.

In this place, Sullivan, the county seat of Sullivan County, I have incidentally met with a number of Sabbath-keepers, adhering to the law of the Lord, and testifying to all around of the obligation of all men to remember the Sabbath of Jehovah. The head of this interesting group is Annanias Davis, a son of Nathan Davis, once of Salem, Virginia, whose family was part of the colony that removed from Squan River, in New Jersey, to Western Virginia, sixty-one years ago, at which time the subject of these remarks was nine years of age. The family name of his wife, who is in like manner zealous for the Sabbath observance, was Clayton, and she belonged to a family who were formerly connected with the same Christian fraternity. Annanias Davis removed from Vireto, Warren Co., Ohio, forty-three years ago, and thirteen years ago to this place, at that time a dense and almost unbroken forest. It being the center of the county, by vote of the inhabitants the county seat was removed here five years ago, which has given an increased value to their lands, and importance to their location. During the whole thirteen years of their residence here, they have not heard a Sabbath-keeper preach, nor even seen a single person of their own faith, nor read a Sabbath publication, the Bible alone excepted; and yet they have steadily kept to the "Ancient and Honorable Way." The posterity of this worthy couple now number sixty-five souls; their own children are five sons and four daughters, with their families, most of them observers of the Sabbath. From the information I gave them, they have concluded to send for the Sabbath Recorder. Having no public gifts among them, for nine years they lived without any church privileges; but for four years past most of them have united with the Christian Church in this place, with the express agreement, that they may keep Jehovah's holy day, and be subject to neither censure nor discipline for pursuing their worldly business on the first day of the week, so that they do not habitually neglect public worship in the church to which they belong. Their learning is chiefly the "one-book" learning; and that they have "right smart." Although they have no public gifts, their honest and Christian behavior has gained for them a good report of all men where they are known. They have often been assailed by the opponents of the seventh-day Sabbath, but they have so successfully used the armor of righteousness as to put to silence their opposers; and a considerable portion of the community around them have learned to say, "If there is any day of rest binding by Scripture now, it is the seventh day."

FAMILY PRAYER.

I believe that Family Prayer is very much neglected by the members of our denomination; and the reason I believe it, is, because I have for a few months past had opportunities of seeing that many families, in a number of churches, never have, while I have been in their midst as one of them, so much as once engaged in this duty, and I have tarried in the houses of some for two weeks.

Among all the duties that devolve upon Christians, there is perhaps none of more importance, none more interesting, than that of family prayer. The duty of attending to it is enforced in the Holy Scriptures, where parents are told, "Train up your children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." If parents are obligated to do this, then of course they are bound to use every instrumentality in their power; and family prayer is a very important instrumentality, and in the power of every parent to use. That it is an almost omnipotent instrumentality, I think I shall be able to show.

First—By the reactive energy of prayer, parents are prepared for giving better instructions to their children; are made more patient, more loving, more anxious for their spiritual welfare, and consequently more determined to check every inordinate desire, or any waywardness in their offspring.

Secondly—The associations of early childhood have almost the power of destiny upon the man or woman. As are the associations of a child, so is the man, amounts to almost an axiom. How seldom is it the case, that a young man, baptized from his infancy in the tears and prayers of pious parents, goes forth into the world a reckless reprobate. Those tears are remembered, and the tones of those prayers still ring in his ears, when distance or the grave separates him from his parents, rebuking every bad deed and approving every good. It was my lot to be deprived of a father when I was but two years old, but I had a praying mother. What an incalculable blessing! A praying mother! How do the tones of her voice, agonizing before God for her numerous family, still sound in my ears! I have dwelt with rapture on the lofty stains of Homer and Virgil in their own inimitable tongues; I have been pleased with the amorous sallies of Anachreon, and made sad by the mournful strains of Mœschus; I have been entranced by the eloquence of Demosthenes and Cicero, as it glows upon the pages of their writings, and awed by the sublime philosophy of Socrates and Plato; but when these are erased from memory's tablet, and no trace of them left, the prayers of that mother will still send up from the past their warnings and encouragements, never ceasing until they die away in the stillness of the tomb; and if, on the morning of the resurrection, I am gathered among the blest, it will be in answer to those same prayers. Such will be the testimony of thousands upon that day.

Thirdly—It is one important duty of parents to teach their children to pray. How can they do it better than by example? And where is there a more appropriate place than around the family altar?

I would have these exercises preceded by the reading of the Scriptures, and then every member of the family should be taught to bow, from the oldest to the prattler who has just learned to use his tiny limbs, while the older members, the parents first, and each child in his turn, shall engage in an earnest, comprehensive prayer. Were every family to practice this, there would be much less dereliction from duty by young converts almost as soon as they make a profession of religion.

Parents, and especially you who have neglected this solemn duty, will you candidly consider the foregoing suggestions, and wisely act in conformity to them? When such important results hang upon your decision, will you hesitate? Can you enjoy heaven when conscious that a child is suffering in torment, damned by your neglect? Methinks heaven were a poor boon under such circumstances; and yet such will be your case if you do not awake, provided you obtain that boon, for I see around me daily multitudes of your children pressing on to ruin. May God grant His mercy to all parents, that they may be able to know their duty and do it. MATHETES.

THE LIQUOR TRADE.

I wish to submit a question or two for the consideration of the readers of the Recorder, in respect to the "liquor traffic."

First—Which inflicts the greatest injury upon a given community, the man who sells three hundred dollars worth of spirituous liquors to be used as a beverage, or the man who steals three hundred dollars worth of property from the same community?

Second—Is it in agreement with that scripture which says, "Love worketh no ill to his neighbor," to sell spirituous liquors to be used as a beverage?

Third—Does the man who uses spirituous liquors as a beverage set a good and wholesome example in this respect before his neighbors?

JOHN BUNYAN'S WORKS.

The Christian Watchman and Reflector says that the public are at length presented with an edition of John Bunyan's works, worthy of the immortal dreamer. An attempt was made to publish his works in 1692, but it failed after the issue of the first volume. The second attempt was in 1737, in two vols. folio, published by Samuel Wilson; this edition was republished in six volumes 8vo. in 1769, and in eight volumes 8vo. in 1771. In the same year, Galbraith's edition, in one volume folio, was issued. In 1768, an edition appeared under the supervision of Whitefield, in two volumes folio; and a dozen years later, an edition under the auspices of W. Mason and J. Ryland. These editions were more or less defective; and several others still more imperfect have appeared at different times in England and in this country. The edition now presented is issued under the care of George Offor, Esq., the accomplished editor of the copy of the first edition of Pilgrim's Progress, published by the Hanserd Knollys Society. Mr. Offor's qualifications for the work which he has assumed, are of the most ample character. For more than half a century the works of Bunyan have been a frequent companion in his leisure hours. The works included in this edition are sixty-two in number, and each is furnished with an introduction and notes. Mr. Offor has likewise given a sketch of Bunyan's life, times, and contemporaries. No expense or pains has been spared to make the undertaking entirely successful. The works are comprised in three volumes. Blackie & Son, Edinburgh, publishers. Vols. I. and II. are already issued.

COLONIZING: ANOTHER VIEW.—A correspondent, alluding to the articles which have recently appeared in the Recorder in favor of organizing a colony of Sabbath-keepers to settle on the Pacific coast, says:—

"No doubt this is a very efficient way of strengthening and building up the cause of truth; but it seems to me that our people have fallen into an error in selecting inland and remote points as the sphere of their labors. Light emanates from cities and large towns. 'The candle should not be hid under a bushel.' I believe that if Seventh-day Baptists from the East were to emigrate, in numbers large or small, to the cities and villages on the shore of the mighty Mississippi, or the growing and already populous cities of the Western States, the advancement of their cause would be far more rapid than hitherto. The facilities for doing business in such places are certainly far better, and the opportunities for improvement, and consequently for disseminating truth, are far greater, than in the inland and out-of-the-way places they usually select."

OUR WESTERN MISSIONS.—In answer to inquiries on the subject, we take this mothod of saying, that the Executive Board of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society has appointed Eld. Lewis A. Davis to supply the church at Farmington, Ill., with preaching, and Eld. Stillman Coon to preach to the Society at Southampton, Ill.—the salaries of these brethren being paid one half by the Board and the other half by the brethren among whom they labor. The Board has also appropriated $100 a year to enable the church at Walworth, Wis., to maintain preaching, and Eld. O. P. Hull is now laboring in that field.

CARRYING OUT THE PRINCIPLE.—When the First Baptist Church in New York built their splendid meeting-house in Broome-st., some years ago, rooms were fitted up in connection with it for the Baptist Home Mission Society and the American and Foreign Bible Society, which were tendered to those Societies rent free. It is now stated, that the Bible Society, in consequence of its refusal to take part in the new version movement—a movement which the First Church generally approve—is to be ejected this spring.

MESHULLAM'S ASSISTANTS.—It has already been stated in the Recorder, that a company of persons sailed from Philadelphia last fall, intending to settle at or near Jerusalem, and assist John Meshullam in his efforts to benefit the Jews. We now learn that they arrived at Marseilles after a pleasant passage of sixty-four days, and were to re-embark immediately for Jaffa.

REVIVALS IN NEW YORK CITY.—Rev. Isaac Westcott, pastor of the Laight-Street Baptist Church, in a note to the N. Y. Recorder, says: "The Laight-Street Church is still enjoying tokens of the divine favor. Fifty have been converted to God, we trust, during the past few weeks, thirty-five of whom have been baptized." The Shiloh Church, also, reports a pleasing revival. Thirteen have been baptized, and more are awaiting the ordinance.

TOLERATION IN TURKEY.—The Sultan of Turkey has just issued a firman in favor of the Christian Protestants, allowing them to meet together freely, and permitting their marriages and births to be registered.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, FEB. 9.

In the SENATE, numerous petitions were presented, including one from ten Hungarian refugees, now in Iowa, praying for a grant of land, like that granted to their countrymen. The Army Register, and estimates of San Francisco fortifications, were received from the War Department. The resolution on the Irish State Prisoners was postponed, and Mr. Clarke's resolutions on Non-Intervention were taken up. Mr. Clarke of R. I., spoke on the subject at length, and against the doctrines urged by Kossuth. Gen. Cass took the floor. An executive session ensued, and afterward an adjournment.

In the HOUSE, petitions were presented from bank officers and members of the Legislature at Albany, for a Mint in New York; also, a memorial from Capt. Wilkes in favor of a new search for Sir John Franklin. A resolution inquiring into steamship contracts, was offered and adopted. A resolution looking toward a change in the Tarriff was voted down, and soon after the House adjourned.

THIRD-DAY, FEB 10.

In the SENATE, after hearing petitions and referring one or two bills, the Non-Intervention resolutions were taken up, and Mr. Cass made a speech, which occupied the remainder of the session, and in which he set forth very sound doctrines upon that question of International Law which has latterly been so much argued in this country. He goes for an official declaration of what this Republic holds to be true and right in that connection, leaving the question of positive intervention to be considered afterward, as circumstances may require.

In the HOUSE, the day was spent in discussing the reconsideration of a resolution, which had passed the day previous, asking the President to place the Regiment of Mounted Rifles in designated places. The vote was reconsidered, and then the resolution was laid on the table.

FOURTH-DAY, FEB. 11.

In the SENATE, numerous petitions were presented, including a batch for additional compensation for taking the Census. The correspondence concerning the Prometheus affair was received and ordered printed. The joint resolution relative to the Irish prisoners was taken up; Mr. Seward made a long and able speech in favor of it. When he had concluded, Messrs. Badger and Mason had to say a few words suggested by the interests of Slavery.

The HOUSE spent the whole day in talking about the Compromise, or "Peace Measures," as they are called. The discussion started from a motion to print a series of resolutions presented by Mr. Stratton, from the Legislature of New Jersey, sustaining the Compromise measures, and against any change, alteration, or repeal of the Fugitive Slave law, and promising to sustain the Executive in the stand which he has taken upon this subject. Messrs. Giddings and Stanley were the principal speakers.

FIFTH-DAY, FEB .12.

In the SENATE, the Resolution on the Irish State Prisoners was postponed. The New Jersey Senators defined their position and the position of their State in relation to the Compromise Measures. Mr. Seward proposed to pay the expenses of the Hungarians. Mr. Clemens then made a speech on Non-Intervention. He attacked Kossuth; repudiated his views; called up the history of England's wrongs inflicted on this country and Ireland; said we had no inducement to combine with England or against Russia, &c. &c. A motion to postpone till April was lost by vote of 15 to 24. The subject was then postponed till Monday week. An Executive Session followed, and then an adjournment.

In the HOUSE, a bill granting right of way and land to Missouri for Railroad purposes was discussed. The Prometheus Correspondence (sent to the Senate the day previous) was received; and, after talking a while on giving the laws of Congress a more general publication in newspapers, the House adjourned.

SIXTH-DAY, FEB. 13.

The SENATE spent the day in debating the bill to establish a Navy Yard at San Francisco, and one private bill. Without taking any vote, it adjourned to Second-day.

In the HOUSE, the Judiciary Committe were authorized to send for persons and papers in the case of Judge Watrous, of Texas, charged with malfeasance, and in considering, to no definite end, two private bills. Adjourned to Second-day.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.—Three numbers of Littell's Living Age fell in our way last week, and furnished the richest treat in the magazine line that we have enjoyed for many a day. It is one of the live periodicals, and cannot fail to interest live readers. Writing about it in 1845, John Quincy Adams said, "Of all the periodical journals devoted to literature and science, which abound in Europe and in this country, this has appeared to me the most useful. It contains, indeed, the exposition only of the current literature of the English language; but this, by its immense extent and comprehension, includes a portraiture of the human mind in the utmost expansion of the present age." What the Living Age was in 1845, it is in 1852. The following are the contents of the number for February 21:

1. Mary Stuart.—Westminster Review.
2. Spencer's Travel's in European Turkey.—Spectator.
3. Voyage of the Rattlesnake.—Examiner.
4. A Look into the Landes.—United Service Magazine.
5. Chinese in California.—Chamber's Journal.
6. Literature of the Ice.—United Service Magazine.
7. Leaves from the Note Book of a Naturalist, Part 12.

POETRY: To the City of New York, on its Reception of Kossuth; Dead Letters; To England; Memory.
SHORT ARTICLES: Wonderful Things put in Pawn; Moonlight in the Tropics.
NEW BOOKS.

Published once a week, by E. Littell & Co., Boston, at 12½ cents a number, or six dollars a year, in advance. Dewitt & Davenport, Tribune Buildings, agents for New York.

KIRK OF SCOTLAND.—The Established Church of Scotland, notwithstanding its severe loss by the secession of the Free Church, is possessed of zeal and energy enough to undertake a scheme of church extension at the cost of from £300,000 to £400,000, which they propose to raise by voluntary subscriptions.

California News.

The steamer Daniel Webster, from San Juan, arrived at New York on the 13th inst., bringing fifteen days later news from California. Her passengers were only 26 days and 19 hours from San Francisco to New York.

At San Juan de Nicaragua. Feb. 4, a terrible conflagration occurred, destroying about fifty houses, among them the United States Hotel.

A San Francisco paper of Jan. 15 says:—At present, the weather is clear, bright and beautiful, and good promise given to both miner and tiller of the soil of a bountiful harvest in future. Indeed, the gardens around the city are even now filled with almost every description of green and growing vegetables, which, ripening during every month in the year, will soon furnish abundantly and continuously our market with such supplies. During a walk last Sunday, in suburbs of the city, we saw rows of green peas four feet high and in full bloom, a few wild flowers on the hill sides, and various kinds of cultivated ones in the gardens.

The late rains and high waters have caused a cessation of mining on the rivers, but increased operations in the high dry land diggings, from which immense amounts of gold are being washed, much of the dirt having been dug and piled up during the past summer and fall. Quartz workings are progressing, notwithstanding the lack of sufficient capital among those engaging in it, unstable tenure of titles to their claims, and difficulty in obtaining the best kind of machinery.

A man named J. Q. Adams was shot at Sacramento City, on the 12th January, by a Mrs. Bond, whose daughter had been seduced by him. He had been arrested by the police for abducting the girl from her home, when the mother, a woman of unusual intellect and strength of purpose, proceeded to the Station-House, and having obtained an entrance, on the request to speak a few words with the prisoner, found him sitting in the ante-room in company with an officer. Approaching him, she asked if he intended to marry her daughter, and receiving an unsatisfactory response, drew a pistol and discharged it, the ball entering his side near the tenth rib, and lodging probably in the abdomen. Adams died on the following day, having in the mean time married his victim, whom he acknowledged to have seduced under a promise of marriage.

The Indian disturbances appear to be entirely at an end, and affairs are settled down into their accustomed channels.

European News.

The steamer Pacific, with four days later news from Europe, arrived at New York on the 12th inst.

The advices by the Pacific are commercially favorable. The improved feeling in Cotton and Breadstuffs continues, with an active demand. Money was easy at low rates. In the manufacturing districts, there was a good business doing.

Quite a panic has been raised in England on a rumor that Louis Napoleon was about to invade England. The London Times is filled with editorial and correspondential discussions on the subject, which is treated as quite a serious matter.

Louis Napoleon has committed no new trocities. He has lost a great many supporters by the confiscation of the Orleans property. The law abolishing titles of nobility has been rescinded.

The accounts from Ireland are gloomy.

There has been the most violent gale ever known in the British Channel.

The steamer Glasgow, from Glasgow for this port, put back to Greenock on the evening of the 27th ult., in distress. She had proceeded half way across the Atlantic, when she was struck by a heavy sea, on the 20th, which swept overboard Mr. Robertson, second officer, who was lost; also, after-companion, wheel-house, boats, bulwarks, &c.

The London Times of Jan. 16, has a telegraphic dispatch from Plymouth, dated at 7 the previous evening, which states that the port life-boat of the Amazon was picked up by a Dutch galliot in the Bay of Biscay, and the following persons on board have been landed at Plymouth: Rev. Wm. Blood, Mr. Gilley, Lieutenant Geylls; William Angus, second engineer; Isaac Roberts, boiler maker; C. Deudney, stoker; W. Wall, stoker; G. Webb, seaman; Wright, seamen; M'Innes, storekeeper; and Harris, boy.

Mr. Eliot Warburton, prior to the loss of the Amazon, published a new novel called "Darien: or the Merchant Prince," in which are related the incidents connected with two shipwrecks, and also the awful occurrence of a ship on fire. Mr. Warburton had insured his life for £10,000 before sailing in the Amazon.

A law has been recently passed in England compelling all kinds of Steam Machinery employed in factories, printing establishments, &c., to be so constructed as to consume their own smoke, under a penalty of from £2 to £5 for every day of delay in conforming to the law.

We observe in German papers the following illustration of religious liberty in Germany: One of the most respectable citizens of Schweinfurt, and member of a religious communion dissolved by the Government, declined to have his children confirmed according to the rites of the State Church, and was informed that if he persisted in keeping them away, he would be arrested.

A Spanish Journal mentions the following names as actually those of two clerks in the Ministry of Finance at Madrid: Don Epifanio Merurzururdua y Zengotila, Don Juan Nepamuceno de Burionagonatotorecagogeazcoechea.

Frederic Ricci, the composer, lately died in the prime of life and talent. He was stricken by apoplexy in the post-carriage between Warsaw and St. Petersburg.

Robert Burns, grandson of the Poet, was recently murdered by pirates, on the coast of Borneo.

Lady Byron, the widow of the Poet, is living at Southampton, England. She was Miss Milbanke.

A mummy has been discovered in the Crypt of St. Stephen's Chapel, London. It is supposed to be the remains of an old Bishop.

The mother of Thiers died on the 4th December, at Paris, two days after the coup d'etat, and while he was in prison.

NORTHERN TRAVEL.—Our first winter journey to Albany (says the editor of the N. Y. Tribune) was made via Newburgh, in 1838, and occupied three days; our second, in 1839 involved two days' hard riding, including most of the intervening night. On Monday we went up (via Hudson River Railroad) between 8 A. M. and 2 P. M., and yesterday we came down even quicker, leaving Saraotga Springs at 8½, (in company with passengers who left Castleton, Vt., three hours before,) left Albany a little past 11, and were set down in Chambers-st. at 4¼ P. M.—in time to do a pretty fair day's work. The Harlem Road, we understand, runs through from Albany and Troy in about the same time—five hours.

SUMMARY.

A very extensive and thorough movement in favor of the "Maine Law" is now agitating Philadelphia. About six weeks ago a primary meeting was held by Ministers of various denominations, which resulted in the appointment of a Committee to solicit the co-operation of the Clergy throughout the City and County, and also to hold public meetings on the subject. One hundred and sixteen Clergymen have signed the petition, and a meeting has been held each week in some one of the large churches, all of which have been crowded by a dignified and earnest auditory.

Several weeks ago, a Jewish lad, whose business was to sell jewelry about the city of Philadelphia, disappeared very strangely. Some two or three weeks afterward, the remains of a person about his size were found tied up in a bag, which had caught in the ice on the river. Last week two Poles were arrested as the murderers, and it is said that the chain of circumstantial evidence against the prisoners is perfect and overwhelming.

Mr. John Chancy, of Roxbury, Mass., while on his way to this City on Tuesday night, on board the steamer Massachusetts, was robbed of $337 in bills, of which $300 was in six $50 bills of the People's Bank of Roxbury—the remainder in small bills not remembered. Mr. C. says that when he went to bed he put his pocket-book inside his flannel, or in his bosom, and that he woke subsequently and found it lying on the edge of his berth, but the money was gone.

A dispatch from Charleston, S. C., dated Feb. 9, says: You have already heard about the four Massachusetts free negroes, convicted of an attempt to abduct a slave, and sold at Galveston, in consequence of their inability to pay the fines. Samuel Quall, of Ala., bought Anthony Hays for $325; Levana Smith for $370; William Brown for $505. He bought to re sell at Mobile. John Fourtkey, of Galveston, bought Jacob Thompson for $365, on speculation.

In New York, one day last week, William J. Haggerty, formerly a resident of Huron, Ohio, was fleeced out of $65 at a mock auction shop in Chatham, near William street. He thought he was buying a gold watch dirt cheap. Haggerty was waiting for a passage to California, and the $65 was all the money he had left after paying for his ticket. A Sixth Ward Police officer took pity upon the poor duped Buckeye, and obtained his money back from William Johnson, who was the auctioneer.

The Philadelphia Inquirer has been assured by a gentleman who recently returned from Europe, that large quantities of American coin are imported into France from the United States; and that, by a peculiar process, a considerable portion of gold is extracted, while the value of the silver is not impaired. Indeed, it is said that quite an extensive business is carried on in this way. The process is a peculiar one, and known only to a few scientific men in France.

A horse thief named Clay, recently arrested in Tippah County, Miss., and who turned State's evidence against his associates in iniquity, revealed the fact that horse-stealing is now reduced to a science, and that master, salesman, striker, runner and stealer constitute the different degrees of this new order. In his disclosures, he confessed himself to belong to a gang of horse-thieves, who operate from the Tombigbee, through Mississippi, Arkansas and Texas.

Gen. Martin, a member of the Senate of Louisiana, has introduced into that body a bill which proposes to place habitual drunkards in the same position, in regard to the management of their property and their family affairs, as that which the law assigns to lunatics and minors. They are to have curators, with powers of administration; they are to be incapable of sueing or being sued in their own names; they could not be members of a corporation, nor executors or administrators of an estate.

Five children of John Whipple, of Hamilton, Mass., were shockingly burned, on Wednesday evening, Feb. 4, by the bursting of a spirit lamp. They were sitting round a table, studying their lessons, when it exploded, and they were immediately enveloped in a sheet of fire. One ran and pitched into a snow bank; three were carried to the pump, and extinguished; and the fifth was soused in a tub of buttermilk. The youngest child has since died, and another is in a hopeless condition.

It is estimated from official returns and other sources of information, that the number of Indians inhabiting all parts of our country, amounts to about 418,000. Of this number 30,000 is the estimated number of those inhabiting the unexplored territories; 24,100 are the Indians of Texas; 92,130 belong to the tribes living in New Mexico; 32,231 are in California; 22,733 are in Oregon; 11,500 in Utah. Many of the New Mexican Indians are civilized, and have fixed habitations and towns.

Dr. A. H. Wilder, of Springfield, Mass., failed some time since, and went to California, leaving his wife and family to earn their daily bread for the time. A few days since the several creditors of the bankrupt met at the residence of their debtor's wife, in compliance with her invitation, when each found under his plate the amount of his claim. The husband had taken this method of paying his liabilities out of the first of his earnings on the Pacific.

Madame George Sand has, it is generally asserted, been ordered to leave France. Of all the eminent popular writers of the day, she is the only one remaining; Hugo, Dumas, Sue, all are in exile. The Courrier du Bas Rhin says that M. Hochstuhl, ex-Representative, who is included in the decree of banishment, has received a passport for America, to which country he will proceed via Hamburg.

It appears from the late report of the Board of Public Works of Virginia, that in that State 678 miles of railroads have been already completed, and that 637 miles are now under contract. The capital stock of the railroad companies amounts to $146,117,100, in which the State has an interest of $7,464,433 33. Besides her railroads, the State has 872 miles of canals already constructed.

The State of New Jersey appropriated during the past year $250,857 for the support of Common Schools. There are 1,615 School Districts in the State, where children are instructed an average of 9 months in the year. There are 145,529 children in the State between the ages of 6 and 18 years, of whom only 88,810 attend school.

James Thornton, one of the slaves of the late John McDonogh, to whom Mr. McDonogh in his will bequeathed freedom, has instituted proceedings in the Fifth District Court, at New Orleans, against the executors of the McDonogh estate, to procure his emancipation in accordance with the terms of the will.

On Wednesday morning, Feb. 11, while Henry S. McCombs, of Wilmington, Delaware, was standing in the depot of the New Jersey Railroad, at Jersey City, some expert rogue picked his pocket, which contained $2,000 in Delaware Bank notes.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co. have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Two Living Aztec Children.

A NEW AND ABSOLUTELY UNIQUE RACE OF MANKIND.—The most extraordinary and inexplicable phenomena that the history of the human race has yet produced, can be seen for a few weeks at the large Exhibition Room of the Society Library, corner of Broadway and Leonard-street. They were recently taken from a newly-discovered and idolatrous people in Central America, by whom they were kept with superstitious veneration, distinct and secluded as a caste of their priesthood, and employed as Mimes and Bacchanals in their Pagan ceremonies and worship.

They are male and female. The latter measuring 29½ inches in height, weighing 17 lbs.; the former is 33 inches high, and weighs 20 lbs.

From repeated and careful examination, the best Physiologists state the older to be 12 or 13 years of age; the younger about 10 years.

They differ altogether from examples of the dwarf kind, and from children; affording complete and undeniable illustration of a Piamean variety of the Human Race!

The Dog Market of Paris.

From "A Faggot of French Sticks; or, Paris in 1851," by Sir Francis Head.

At Paris, on one day in every week, namely, on Sunday, there is a dog market, held in a place which, on Wednesdays and Saturdays, is a horse market, and which, wearing, as is lawful in heraldry, its highest title, is called "the horse market."

On proceeding there on Sunday, at about half-past 1 o'clock, I found myself in a rectangular open space, 240 yards long by 44 yards broad, surrounded by a high wall, divided lengthways down the middle by a stout oaken post and rail fence, on each side of which was a paved road, bounded by grass, shaded by a triple row of trees. In the center of the oak fence was a large fountain of water. Beneath the trees, and parallel with the two paved roads, were stout oaken rails divided into pens, each bearing the name of the horse-dealer to whom it belonged, and which, even if empty, no one unauthorized by himself can use. The horses, affixed to these rails by rings which continue the whole length of the market, stand shaded by the trees. Near to them is an office on which is painted, in large black letters, "Office of the veterinary surgeon and of the inspector charged with the superintendence of the horse market."

At the entrance of the market there exists a little wooden office, on which is written, in letters bearing in size about the same proportion to those of the above superscription that a dog does to a horse, "The concierge receives the description of lost dogs, and endeavors to recover them. Apply under the archway in front, to the left."

Taking off my hat, I introduced myself as a stranger seeking for information to the concierge, or keeper of the dog market, before whose tiny office were arranged on tables—several were hanging on both sides of the door—a great variety of muzzles, to be hired for the day by dogs, none of whom are allowed, under any pretext, to enter the market without one.

After talking some time to the concierge, during the short intervals in which he was not professedly engaged, I entered the market, in which I found about 280 arrant curs, all wearing very odd-looking wire nose-gear, which, projecting about two inches beneath their lower jaws, gave their mouths the appearence of being what is called. "underhung."

Dogs were barking—dogs were yelping—dogs were squealing in all directions. Several were surrounded by a crowd of spectators silently gaping down at them. In one direction I saw a fox-dog—retained by a string tied to the oaken horse-rails—on his hind legs, pawing with both feet to get to another dog about twenty yards off, that appeared equally anxious to come to him. On the ground there lay panting a large, coarse-looking Newfoundland dog; near him a basket of fat puppies whining; behind them a woman nursing one of the family in her lap. A servant-maid, as she kept strolling about, was leading, as if it had been a child, an Italian greyhound. One sandy-colored dog, little bigger than a very large rat, and with cropped ears, which made him look as sharp as a flea, I was assured was a year old. Near him stood a dog barking to get at his master, dressed in a blouse, who had not only tied him to a post, but who every now and then "sacrebleued" him for barking. Beside him, looking at the faithful creature with infinitely kinder feelings, was standing in wooden sabots, with a crimson-colored handkerchief wound round her head so as to leave the ends sticking out, the dog's master's wife—in short, his own "missus," who evidently did not like to see him sold. In another direction I observed a great mastiff standing near two women; one of whom held in her arms two puppies, the other a small dog with very lank rough hair, that stuck out all around him like the prickles of a hedgehog.

Close to a very savage looking yard-dog, tied to a rail, which no one seemed disposed to approach, two women were seated on the ground, each with a dog in her lap. Near them a stout, tall peasant, in a blouse, held out and up in one hand, at arm's-length, a puppy, looking, in comparison to his own size, like a mouse. On the ground were seated several men, with baskets full of yellow, greasy looking cakes; beside them appeared stretched out for sale an immense dog-skin.

The owner of every dog pays for the use of the muzzle—if he has hired one—five sous, but the animal himself is admitted in the market free; whereas on Wednesdays and Saturdays each horse pays 10 sous, carriages on two wheels 15 sous, on four wheels 25 sous, goats and asses 4 sous apiece.

"Haste Makes Waste."

We always feel like preaching a sermon from this text, when we perambulate the market in search of butter. In all the stalls devoted to the sale of this necessary of New England life, it is very seldom that a really good article can be found, but there is every variety of poor butter, in abundance. Now and then a firkin may be found put up in rather tolerable shape—such as would almost pass current with those who know what really good butter is—but it is an exception to the general rule. On the other hand, there are hundreds of tuns of butter sold every year in our market at half the price it would bring were a little more labor bestowed upon it by the housewives in the country. In no one article do our farmers so greatly mistake their true interests, as in sending poor butter to market. We tasted of a lot yesterday, which was offered at ten cents a pound, because it was rancid, but which would have brought double that price readily, had it been properly cared for when it was made. The process of making butter is simple and easy, and the only difference between good and poor butter, in nine cases out of ten, is just the difference in labor bestowed in working out the buttermilk. If the butter be thoroughly worked in a cool place, it assumes something of the consistency of wax, and will keep for years without becoming rancid. Yet not one firkin in a hundred sent to market can be cut without the buttermilk following the knife.

The English diary women understand these things better. They never throw away one-half the rightful price of their diary products in order to spare their elbows. You seldom see any poor butter in an English market town. Not only is all the buttermilk excluded, but the butter receives a very rich and mellow flavor by reason of slightly scalding the milk before it is set away in the pans. This process costs very little labor, and in the warm season particularly, it greatly increases the quantity as well as the quality of the cream. We hope that, at no distant period, the English mode will be adopted universally in this country. Whenever it is, the profits of our national industry will be greatly enhanced, and the hills and valleys of New England will be converted into almost universal diary farms. Few branches of industry are more profitable than the diary, when it is rightly understood.

The remark that applies to butter, applies also to two-thirds of the cheese manufactured, and one-half at least, of the hams cured in this country. We have perambulated the whole market without being able to find a really good American cheese, made in the ordinary mode, and have been compelled to purchase a rather poor imitation of English cheese, or pay a high price for a "pine apple cheese," made very much in the shape of a wooden nutmeg. Nearly all the good cheese made in this country now, is sent abroad, and the poor remains at home, because foreigners know better than to purchase it.

As to bacon, we buy it as we should a ticket in the lottery—about six fears to one hope. Most of the bacon in our market, is salted altogether too much. Occasionally we get hold of a good leg of bacon properly cured, and we thank our lucky stars for it. It costs no more to cure it properly than improperly—why don't you all do it then? [Bost. Mail.

The Aztec Children.

The following article will give our readers a pretty good idea of the history of these children. We extract it from the New York correspondence of the National Intelligencer, of Washington city. As for a description of the children themselves, nothing that we have ever read or that has been written about them, gives one anything like a just conception of their strikingly singular and interesting appearance.

"While sauntering down Broadway, not many days ago, somewhat after the manner of a flaneur, I had my attention arrested at the fine building of the New York 'Society Library,' by a placard unusually modest in its typography, the object of which was to inform the public that an exhibition was being held in the said building of two 'Aztec Pigmies,' purporting to be specimens of a pigmy race of the human species, recently discovered in Central America by a Senor Pedro Velasquez, of San Salvador. It was not without a lurking suspicion of being imposed upon by some such hoax as that palmed upon the curiosity-hunters by Mr. Barnum's 'mermaid,' or the 'wooly horse,' that I entered the exhibition room; where, however, all doubts and misgivings were hushed, if not satisfied, by the spectacle that met our eyes, of two tiny and copper colored specimens of humanity, frisking and capering on an elevated platform with an agility of movement and litheness of limb perfectly surprising in creatures of such diminutive proportions—the boy being a little over two feet in height and the girl a little less, while both together weigh only thirty-seven pounds. One could hadly help fancying at first that some adventurous traveler had discovered Lilliput, or at least a colony of Lilliputians, such as those whom that favorite of our childhood, Capt. Lemuel Guliver, describes in his extraordinary and veracious narrative; and, in fact, a memoir, containing an account of an expedition into Central America, and almost equaling in its detail of romantic adventure the celebrated fiction of the Dean of St. Patrick's, was placed in my hands, the purport of which I lay before your readers.

"No reader of Mr. Stephens' Incidents of Travel in Central America, Chiapas and Yucatan, has forgotten, it is presumed, the animated account of a series of conversations he held with an intelligent and hospitable Padre of Santa Cruz del Quiche. But the most exciting statement of all was the Padre's assurance that from the topmost range of the Cordilleras he had in his youth espied 'a large city, spread over a great space, with turrets white and glittering in the sun,' evidently inhabited by Indians of the same character and in the same social condition as those of the whole adjoining country at the time of its discovery and conquest. The interest awakened in his mind by this intelligence is described by Mr. Stephens as the 'most thrilling he ever experienced.' 'One look at that city,' he adds, 'would be worth ten years of every day life. If he is right, a place is left where Indians and a city exist, as Cortez and Alvarado found them; there are living men who can solve the mystery that hangs over the ruined cities of America, who can perhaps go to Copan and read the inscriptions on its monuments!'

"Mr. Stephens afterwards proceeds to state the many corroborating circumstances that incline him to believe the Padre's statement authentic; in more than one place the belief is expressed that the race of the aboriginal inhabitants of Central America is not extinct, but still exists, scattered perhaps and retired, like our own Indians, into wildernesses which have never yet been penetrated by a white man, but not lost; living as their father did, erecting the same buildings of 'lime and stone,' 'with ornaments of sculpture and plastered,' 'large courts,' and 'lofty towers, with high range of steps,' and still carving on tablets of stone the same mysterious hieroglyphs, and still inhabiting secluded cities, composed entirely of 'unconquered, unvisited, and unsought aborigines.' It is now stated that such a city, named 'Iximaya,' has actually been discovered in Central America, by three determined explorers, Messrs. Huertis, Hammond, and Velasquez; while the imperfect and unauthenticated narrative of their adventure presented to the public would be incredible if we had no attestation of its truth, it yet becomes not only plausible but seemingly unquestionable in the presence of these unique specimens of our species, for whose origin, complexion, features, size, and general appearance we can furnish no explanation except by receiving the record of Senor Velasquez as authentic and genuine.

"I have not space in this letter to describe the city of Iximaya, with its wonders, as detailed by its reputed discoverer, which however strange, are certainly not more so than the pigmy creatures now on exhibition in this city. When the three travelors above named had procured admission in this city, a place of residence was assigned them in the vacant wing of a spacious and sumptuous structure, which had been appropriated from time immemorial to the surviving remnant of an ancient and singular order, under the care of the priesthood, called Kaanas. Fobidden by inviolable sacred laws form intermarrying with any person but those of their own caste, they had here dwindled down, in the course of centuries, to a few individuals, dwarfish in size and feeble in intellect, and were kept by the priests to act as mimes, or bacchanals, in certain ceremonies of the old Aztec worship. Mr. Hammond having died of a wound received in an encounter with the Iximayans, and Huestis having been sacrificed to the sanguinary deities of their religion, Senor Velasquez contrived to escape from the city, and persuaded a priest to accompany him in his flight, to whom it is represented the guardianship of these two Kaanas, or mimes, was entrusted, and who would not desert them in his fugitive departure from Iximaya, but insisted upon taking them with him.

"The priest Valpeor died, however, from the exposure and privations incident to his journey, leaving Senor Velasquez with the two Aztec children, who succeeded in bring them safely to San Salvador, his native city. They are lively, playful, and affectionate, and though at first unable to articulate a single sound expressive of their ideas, either to each other or strangers, they are now begining to acquire a few words of English, and manifest a considerable facility in the apprehension of the questions proposed to them by the inquisitive visitors who flock to see them. The boy is supposed to be seventeen years old, and the girl about ten; but it is difficult, of course, to ascertain with exactness the precise age of either. I should not neglect to state that the general features, shape of the head, and sitting posture of these Aztec pigmies bear a most striking likeness to the figures that are so profusely sketched in the engravings contained in 'Stephens' Central America.' There are some who trace a likeness between these children and the profiles of Assyrian faces contained in Layard's 'Nineveh,' which, if not fanciful, may be a confirmation of the tradition said to be prevalent in Iximaya, which assigns and Assyrian origin to the inhabitants of the city, and thus, too, confirming the statement of Mr. Prescott in his 'Conquest of Mexico,' that 'the coincidences in the religion, art, &c., of the Aztecs and the Nations of Eastern Asia are sufficiently strong to authorize a belief that the civilization of the former was, in some degree, influenced by the latter.'"

Weaving in Iron.

Strange as this idea may seem, it is no more strange than true, that iron, of a thickness that would make it appear impossible that it could be worked by any other agency than the forge, the anvil, and the hammer, is now, by the aid of new and powerful machinery, woven into the most beautiful patterns, and the designs varied with almost the same facility as in the weaving of a carpet, or a table cover. The specimens that we have seen, excel in beauty and finish any iron railing that we have ever seen, and do not cost more than half the ordinary cost of even cast iron railing. Many of the first class counting-houses and offices in New York are now fitted up with this railing, in preference to any other heretofore or at present in use. The uses of invention, however, are not confined to railings, as the most tasteful verandahs, window gratings, garden fences, etc., are made by it. The coal miners of Pennsylvania, prefer it above all other modes for their screens. Charleston and New Orleans each have parks enclosed with it, and many of the rich southerners have their flower conservatories enclosed in the same manner. In fact, wherever it has been introduced, it has come into almost unlimited favor. The peculiar advantage it possesses over all other kinds of railing is that in its manufacture the rod or wires is so crimped that, in the weaving process, they are crossed in a manner that one binds the other, thus giving a mutual support to the whole, that renders it more durable than work twenty times its weight, made in the old way.

Mr. John Wickersham, the ingenious inventor, also manufactures a superior article of iron wire farm fences, that cost but a little, will last a man a life time, are easily conctructed. In thinly-wooded countries, they will come into rapid demand as they already are in many parts of Europe. Add to these, one more article. Mr. Wickersham manufactures a bedstead of iron, so constructed that it can be shut up during the day-time, and will require but a few inches of room from the wall out, is bug-proof, and easily managed. Indian Method of Hunting Wild Bees.

The Canadians adopt an ingenious plan for discovering the trees that are stored with honey. They collect a number of bees off the flowers in the forest, and confine them in a small box, at the bottom of which is a honeycomb, and in the lid a square of glass, large enough to admit the light in every part.

When the bees seem satiated with honey, two or three are allowed to escape, and the direction which they take is attentively watched, until they become lost in the distance. The hunter then proceeds toward the spot where they disappear, and liberating one or two more of the little captives, he also marks their course.

This process is repeated, until the other bees, instead of following the same direction as their predecessors, take the direct opposite course, by which the hunter is convinced that he has overshot the object of his pursuit. It is a well known fact that, if you take a bee from a flower situated at any given distance south of the tree to which the bee belongs, and carry it in the closest confinement to an equal distance on the north side of the tree, he will, when liberated, fly in a circle for a moment, and then make his course direct for his sweet home, without deviating in the least to the right hand or the left.

Thus the hunter is very soon able to detect the tree which contains the honey; then by placing on a heated brick a piece of honeycomb, the ordor, when melting, is so strong and alluring, as to entice the bees to come down from their citadel. When the tree is cut down, the quantity of honey found in its excavated trunk, seldom fails to compensate the hunter for his perseverance.

EXPEDITION TO JAPAN.—A Washington letter writer says that great reserve is practiced by the Navy Department in regard to the proposed Naval Expedition to Japan. The expedition will depart under the command of Commodore Perry, as soon as the vessels can be got ready—probably about the first of March. The steam-frigate Mississippi will be Commodore Perry's flag ship. The Cumberland and St. Lawrence will form a part of his squadron. It is believed that the object of the expedition is to make a favorable impression as to the naval power of the United States upon the Emperor of Japan, and that it is to go to the port and City of Jeddo, which is at the head of a navigable bay, and is, according to English authorities, accessible. The city contains more than a million inhabitants, and is one of the richest and most magnificent cities of the East. It is the seat of a vast commerce and extensive manufactures, and is the residence of the Emperor and of the nobles of the Empire. This Government asks of the Emperor to open his ports to our commerce, and to treat with hospitality those of our seamen who may be cast on his shores.

Temperance Resolutions.

A Mass Meeting of the Friends of Temperance was held at Metropolitan Hall, New York, on the evening of the 10th inst., at which stirring addresses were delivered by Rev. Drs. Peck, Patton, and Tyng, Rev. Mr. Chapin, Hon. E. D. Culver, and John Hawkins. The following resolutions, adopted on the occasion, will show the character and design of the movement:—

Resolved, That the startling facts revealed by the Police and Prison reports, the Alms-House statistics, and other official documents, that at least three-fourths of the paupers and criminals in the State have been made such by Intemperance, ought to be carefully considered by all good men, that the source of these evils may be ascertained, and, if possible, a remedy applied.

Resolved, That the official reports of the City Government, which show that in 1851 there were, by reason of Intemperance, more than 30,000 arrests and 20,000 commitments to prison, 36 arrests for murder, two policemen murdered while in discharge of duty, and more than One Million Dollars added to the City taxes; while less than $50,000 has been received for the 5,000 licenses to sell rum, fully demonstrate that the present system of licensing the liquor traffic which causes all this intemperance, taxation, pauperism, and crime, is one of most consummate folly and incalculable pecuniary as well as moral detriment to the body politic.

Resolved, That as the sale of intoxicating drinks is, in its legitimate operations, the primary and producing cause of all the wide-spread intemperance in our land, and all the taxation, pauperism and crime that flow from it, it must be an immoral and wicked business, that no man has has a right to follow, and that ought not to be justified and screened from the public odium it deserves, by any State law, by any license or other action of the officers of Government.

Resolved, That all those State laws and municipal regulations which authorize the sale of intoxicating drinks, by attempting to make that traffic legally right which is in itself morally wrong, must tend directly to stupify the public conscience and corrupt the public morals; they ought therefore to be displaced from among the laws and ordinances of a free, virtuous, and intelligent people, by the enactment of such laws as shall prohibit and suppress the sale of intoxicating liquors to be used as a beverage.

Resolved, That expressions of gratitude and honor are due to all the Justices of the U. S. Supreme Court, who so harmoniously affirmed and so ably maintained the right of each State in the Union to prohibit entirely the sale of intoxicating liquors within its territory; and to destroy the article that would injure the morals and happiness of the people, just as they would "seize the infected cargo and throw it overboard," if its being landed would endanger the health of the community or of individuals.

Resolved, That the people of this State, and of this City in particular, have a right to demand, and we hereby do demand, from the present Legislature, that protection from the evils of Intemperance, and from the ravages of the Liquor Traffic, which can be given only by the enactment of a law similar in its main provisions and fully equivalent in its operations to the MAINE LAW.

Resolved, That those Members of the present Legislature who shall give their influence and their votes in favor of a law similar to the Maine Law will deserve and shall receive our gratitude and our future support.

Resolved, That should such a law be proposed in the Legislature for the State, excluding from its operations the City of New York, we protest most firmly against any such exclusion of this City, and we call upon, not only the Legislators from this City, but upon the Senators and Assemblymen from other counties, and upon all the friends of Temperance throughout the State, to make common cause with us in this City, and to refuse to receive any law on this subject that does not apply equally to all the cities, towns, and villages of the State.

A Robin Story.

This incident occurred in the garden of Mr. John Bromham, which is a large one, reaching from his house in Olive street, over to Warren street. While he was attending to some part of it, near his house, a robin flew about him, apparently in great excitement. He took but little notice of it at first; but the bird persevered in every effort to attract attention, and was soon successful. Mr. B. remembered that there was a robin's nest in a tree at the end of the garden, thought there might be some trouble there, and started in that direction. The bird accompanied him, keeping close by his side, and chattering violently all the way. On approaching the nest he found the female bird equally agitated, and on taking deliberate observation, discovered a very young robin sitting on the high fence, and a cat below intently watching it, and ready to pounce upon it on the failure of its attempts to reach the tree.

Mr. Bromham drove away the cat, when the two birds instantly came to the assistance of their young one, encouraged it to try its new-fledged wings for the tree, which it did, and safely reached its nest, to the great apparent delight of the whole feathered family. The bird had seen enough of Mr. B. to know that he would not injure it or its progeny—it knew that he could protect them, and knew how to attract his attention and lead him to the scene of danger—and it knew that it would not be safe for it to encourage its young one to make any effort to reach the tree, while the dreaded enemy was below, ready to pounce upon it, in case of its failure. Is not all this very near akin to human reason? [N. H. Pal.

Medal for Henry Clay.

Henry Clay's New York friends have been for some time past engaged in getting up for him a magnificent Gold Medal, which was presented to him at Washington on the 9th inst. The following description of it we copy from the N. Y. Tribune:—

The obverse side has but a single feature, and that is an exquisitely finished and remarkably correct medallion head of Henry Clay, modeled from life, by the American Sculptor, Mr. T. D. Jones, under the direction of Mr. C. C. Wright. This head is in very bold relief, and is justly considered as the most perfect likeness of the great statesman ever made. The head is surrounded, at the verge of the medal, by a finely executed wreath; the intermediate surface being plain and highly polished.

On the reverse side, in plain lettering, we have the following dates in Mr. Clay's history:

SENATE, 1806.
SPEAKER, 1811.
WAR OF 1812 WITH GREAT BRITAIN.
GHENT, 1814.
SPANISH AMERICA, 1818 AND 1822.
MISSOURI COMPROMISE, 1821.
AMERICAN SYSTEM, 1824.
GREECE, 1824.
SECRETARY OF STATE, 1825.
PANAMA INSTRUCTIONS, 1826.
TARIFF COMPROMISE, 1833.
PUBLIC DOMAIN, 1833—1841.
PEACE WITH FRANCE PRESERVED, 1833.
COMPROMISE, 1850.

Around this suggestive inscription is an exquisitely wrought border or wreath, representing six of the staple productions of the country, viz: Hemp, Indian Corn, Tobacco, Rice, Wheat, and Cotton.

The medal is of the largest size ever made in this country, the diameter being three and a half inches. The weight of gold is sixteen ounces, all of it pure California metal. The dies were made entirely by Mr. C. C. Wright, and the case and all other work was executed under his supervision. It was begun a year ago.

The case is of silver, finely engraved and chased, and is in excellent keeping with the medal itself. On one side of the case is a large engraving of the Capitol at Washington, as it will appear when the additions are completed. On the other side is a fine view of Ashland, the homestead of Mr. Clay, and a representation of the Monument on the Cumberland Road, erected in memory of Mr. Clay's unwearying efforts as the champion of Internal Improvements. The medal is firmly set in this case, which opens on either side.

GREAT LAND CASE DECIDED.—The Louisville Journal says it has been permitted to make the following extracts from a private letter written by a gentleman formerly of that city, who has been residing at Hot Springs for several years:—

"The great Hot Springs case is at last settled, after a lawsuit of thirty years' standing. It has been in litigation ever since this country belonged to the Indians. Ludovicus Belding's heirs have proved up a pre-emption claim, and have entered the quarter of a section that covers all of the hot springs—eighty odd in number—and the whole of the town of Hot Springs, which contains about 150 or 200 inhabitants. Major W. H Gaines, who married one of the heirs, has carried on the suit and brought it to a successful close: for which he receives, for his wife's part, one-half of the property. Major G. is a brother of Jno. P. Gaines, Governor Oregon. The Hot Springs property is worth at least $200,000. In its present unimproved condition the rents amount to $7,000 annually."

EVADING THE LIQUOR LAW.—The most ingenious attempts are continually made to evade the operation of the famous Maine Liquor Law; and it requires the utmost vigilence on the part of the officers of justice to thwart these devices of the rum-loving transgressors. The last dodge we have heard of was the filling of a coffin with bottles of liquor, which was taken to Portland. It was supposed, of course, that no one would think of examining a coffin to find the ardent. However, the sharp eyes of the officers detected the fraud, and the liquor was confiscated. A Down-East paper states that a famous liquor dealer has put up in quart bottles a vast quantity of pure Holland gin. These bottles are labeled with the name of some wonderful medicine which is advertised in all the newspapers as a cure for all diseases. The knowing ones have only to be a little unwell, and procure a bottle of this famous cure-all, in order to obtain what liquor they wish.

THE ACORN.—If an acorn be suspended by a piece of thread within half an inch of the surface of some water contained in a hyacinth glass, and so permitted to remain without being disturbed, it will, in a few months, burst and throw a root into the water, and shoot upwards its straight and tapering stem, with beautiful little green leaves. A young oak tree growing in this way on the mantle-shelf of a room is a very elegant and interesting object. I have seen several oak trees, and also a chestnut tree, thus growing; but all of them, however, have died after a few months, probably owing to the water not having been changed sufficiently often to afford them the necessary quantity of nourishment for the matter contained in it.

There will be five Sundays in the present month of February—the month commencing and ending on that day. This will not occur again until 1880. After that it will not occur again until 1920, as the year 1900, when it should occur will not be a leap year, owing to the necessity of dropping a day at the end of each century.

Coal of an exceedingly fine quality has been found one hundred and seventy-five miles up the Minnesota River. It is said to abound there in great quantities. Every report, every exploration, every day, adds some new and interesting feature to the value of the lands lately acquired from the Sioux Nation.

On the 29th ult., the laborers on the Great Western Railroad, on Burlington Hights, Canada West, found part of the head and the tusk of an elephant, beneath the strata of stone and gravel. The tusk measured six feet nine inches in length, and 13 inches in circumference.

THE SABBATH & THE RESURRECTION.

From "An Examination of the Authority for a Change of the Weekly Sabbath at the Resurrection of Christ; proving that the Practice of the Church in substituting the First Day of the Week for the appointed Seventh Day, is unsanctioned by the New Testament Scriptures. By JAMES A. BEGG, Author of a Connected View of the Scripture Evidence of Christ's Speedy Return, &c." [Concluded.

The same remark applies to an observation made by the apostle James, in the assembly at Jerusalem, which determined that the believing Gentiles should not be circumcised. In proposing to write to these Gentiles to abstain from pollutions which, in their unconverted state, they were prone to indulge, but from which the Jews were free, being instructed by their Law, the apostle enforces his proposal, by the words, "for Moses, of old time, hath, in every city, them that preach him, being read in the synagogues every Sabbath day." Acts xv. 21. Here, again, the Sabbath recognized and observed by the Jews, is, by this Christian apostle, still spoken of as "the Sabbath day," which it really would not have been, and, therefore, could not, with truth, have been so called, if the Sabbath had now been changed. To neither Jew nor Gentile, unbeliever nor convert, is a single word ever said of a First-day Sabbath; while, ever and anon, the Original Sabbath is thus alluded to, as such still.

Again, Paul, and others, having visited Phillipi, and "abiding certain days" there, it is recorded that, "on the Sabbath we went out of the city by a river side, where prayer was wont to be made; and we sat down, and spake unto the women who resorted thither." Acts xvi. 13. It is not our present object to dwell on the result of the teaching. We only point to the day on which it was imparted. It is, again, the unchanged Sabbath, that is, by the inspired penman, so called. The place was a substitute for a Jewish synagogue, used by the Jews where they had none; and the Sabbath observed by these Jews, so found, still bears, unrivalled, the hallowed title. The translation calls it "the Sabbath;" in the margin "day" is added, that word being expressed in the original, in which also "Sabbath" is in the plural, intended to express, as we understand it, that Paul had taught there more than one Sabbath day, before the conversion of Lydia, which ensued.

To those who make so much of the mere mention of a single meeting at Troas, on the first day of the week, as they suppose, it surely ought to appear not a little remarkable, that Apostles of the Lord, and writers guided by His Spirit, should thus continue to speak of the Seventh day as still "the Sabbath," without the least qualification, without one single word, spoken or written, of such a change as their tradition so confidently asserts. To those who truly love the law and guidance of their Lord, we trust it will be acknowledged as proof that the past and present practice of the church are opposed to each other, and lead such to return to the obedience which Christianity enjoins.

But we have not yet finished our enumeration of "Sabbaths," referred to in the history of the Apostolic church. In the next chapter, we read that, in their journey, "they came to Thessalonica, where was a synagogue of the Jews; and Paul, as his manner was, went in unto them, and, three Sabbath days, reasoned with them, out of the Scriptures; opening and alledging that Christ must needs have suffered and risen again from the dead." Acts xvii. 1—3. It is not the fact of Paul's "manner" of visiting the Jewish synagogues, at the time of their assemblies, that leads us to cite the text. The nature of his instructions, is, however, worthy of note. He shows them that "Christ must needs have suffered, and risen again from the dead." Here, indeed, is the statement of Christ's resurrection, and this proved from the Old Testament "Scriptures;" but not a word of a changed Sabbath, on that account. His reasoning with them "out of the Scriptures" admitted not of this, though it did for his opening and alledging that Christ must needs have "risen again from the dead," for the change has no predicted record there. And these three days which he spent in the synagogue of the Jews, and which they regarded as days hallowed to the Lord, the inspired penman once more informs us, were in reality, "three Sabbath days."

So, likewise, when Paul came to Corinth, he there, also, "reasoned in the synagogue, every Sabbath, and persuaded the Jews and the Greeks." Acts xviii. 4. Unchanged, therefore, the "Sabbath" still; for to the latest period the writer speaks of "every Sabbath," just as other penmen before the death of Christ. Thus, then, for the one instance, (Acts xx. 7,) by the Church supposed to make mention of the first day, without intimation, however, of any kind, of the Sabbath having been affected thereby, we thus have, in the same Book, (the only inspired historical record of the church's order and progress, under the superintendence of apostles, and prophets, and evangelists, and pastors, and teachers,) eight direct, undoubted, references to the Seventh day, as still "the Sabbath day." Not merely is it spoken of as so considered by the erring Jews, or as having formerly been the true Sabbath, now however, for an important reason altered to another day—it continues ever to be called, and that in the most unqualified manner, by all those appointed and endowed to be the church's guides, "the Sabbath day."

And, when so naming it, the circumstances and the subjects treated, were often such as might well have led to the explicit declaration of the alledged transfer, had such taken place. Reference, as we have seen, is repeatedly made in the narratives to the resurrection of Christ, without a word being spoken of any effect which this had, or would afterwards have, in regard to the Sabbath. After that event, even Jesus himself reminded His disciples how He had previously pointed their attention to the statements of Moses and the Prophets concerning Him, and how it thus "behooved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day," Luke xxiv. 36. Paul also intimated to Agrippa, that Moses and the Prophets foretold that Christ should suffer, and "that He should be the First that should rise from the dead." Acts xxvi. 23. Appeal is likewise made by Peter, in his address to Cornelius, to the fact of His having been raised up "the third day." Acts x. 40. And Paul reminds the church at Corinth, "that He rose again the third day, according to the Scriptures." 1 Cor. xv. 4. Yet, not even on such occasions, is there uttered a single word intimating or implying that that event had, in any way, affected the weekly Sabbath. By one and all of the inspired penmen, of the New Testament, the Sabbath of the Lord is left exactly as it was found; for, however common the assumption, no one, we think, who attentively considers the evidence adduced, will believe that the intimation that John "was in the Spirit on the Lord's day," (Rev. i. 10,) can refer to the First day of the week, written at a period when, as the whole testimony on the point proves, the Seventh day continued to be the only Christian Sabbath. If we were to understand the words as in allusion to the weekly Sabbath, this could only be to the Seventh day, the day which really was "the Sabbath day," and called by the Lord, through His prophet, "My holy day." Is. lviii. 13.

The alledged change is altogther imaginary; no competent authority has pronounced against, or interfered with, the weekly Sabbath. The resurrection of Christ has been wrested from its true place in the economy of redemption; and, in order to invest with unsanctioned interest, an untrue tradition, the meaning of that glorious event has been misinterpreted, and the expressive type which tells so significantly, and so assuringly, of our resurrection joy and glory, through Him who is our Head, has been sadly marred, to the church itself. Nor is this the only evil resulting from the church's unfaithfulness in this respect. In His Sabbath, God has established a memorial of Himself as the Great Creator; and, through its observance by His people, has sought to keep before the world's eye, a protest against the atheism which refuses to give to Him the full and undivided glory of His workmanship. This protest—entrusted by the Lord to the keeping of His people, to be weekly exhibited to the world, for their good—the church has refused to maintain. Yet is it as much needed as ever. Amongst ourselves, it seems more than ever so. Besides the practical atheism, which, for sin's sake, hides God from view, we have now to bear testimony against an arrogant speculative atheism, boasting a philosophic origin, and drawing its strength from science, falsely so called. Against this growing wickedness, in the varied aspects already assumed, or still to be so, we not only require to be upon our guard, but zealously also to bear, in God's appointed way, a full and faithful testimony. The conflict between light and darkness, prophecy foreshows, will yet prove more severe. The coming day will try men's faith, and will demand their faithfulness. God's Spirit can and will sustain; but for the full enjoyment of that high blessedness, His approval is ever requisite.

Friends of the Redeemer, suffert he exhortation of one who, too long in your condition, but who, now, perceiving its evil issue, has an earnest desire that others also may discern the path of acknowledged righteousness, and be encouraged to walk therein. Consider, we beseech you, your real position. Destitute entirely of scriptural authority, tradition is the only foundation on which prevailing practice rests. Its only sanction is that of erring men, in our own and other times—wide spread and of long continuance, indeed, but all the more dishonoring to God by the universality of that which is opposed to His revealed will—for neither time nor numbers can sanctify sin. With the Saviour's solemn rebukes of those, who, whilst He was on earth, made void the Law of God by their traditions, sounding in our ears, can we expect to receive His approval if we are found to do the same? What though such traditionary observance of the First day professes to seek the honor of His name! May He not, still, to our confusion, ask, Who hath required this at your hand? Jehovah is Himself the Guardian of His glory, and those alone promote it truly, who yield themselves in filial love to that obedience, through faith, which He requires. "If ye love me," says the Saviour, "keep my commandments." And "he that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me." For, "if a man love me, he will keep my words." But, "he that loveth me not, keepeth not my sayings." And it is only "if ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love; even as I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in His love." John xiv. 15, 21, 23, 24; xv. 10.

Brethren, let us not be ignorant of, or indifferent to, the obligations laid upon us, nor neglectful of the strength in which alone they can be performed aright. Called to be the light of the world, if the light that is in us be darkness, through us the world even will be misled. But we are not merely called to be lights, but valiant soldiers, also, of the Lord Jesus Christ. In this, as in every other controversy between God and the devil, the solemn question is, "Who is on the Lord's side?" There is no neutrality; nor is it desirable for us that there should be. If we are called to warfare, in Jehovah's cause, it is in His strength; and, if we abide under His banner, we shall prevail. But woe unto those who strive in their own strength, or in a cause which God acknowledgeth not.

Greviously, alas! hath the church hitherto sinned, in thrusting from her the commandment of the Lord, which, as if with special reference to what has so long prevailed, calls us to "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy," for the important reason that "in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the Seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day, and hallowed it." Exod. xx. 10, 11. A memorial of His creation, and of the order in which he gave it being, has been entrusted to the guardianship of His church, through every age. Sanctified and blessed originally to man in innocence, yet continued to Adam and his seed after the fall, the Sabbath—"made for man," and coeval with the world's existence—is still committed to our care; and still there abides its "blessing," to every son of man that layeth hold on it. Glory be to the Lord our God, the blessing pronounced on the day which first beheld His finished work, still stands unrevoked, and beyond man's power to transfer, for any reason of his devising. Yea, blessed is the man that doeth this, "that keepeth the Sabbath from polluting it, and keepeth his hand from doing any evil." "Also the sons of the stranger that join themselves to the Lord, to serve Him, and to love the name of the Lord, to be His servants, every one that keepeth the Sabbath from polluting it, and taketh hold of my covenant; even them will I bring to my holy mountain, and make them joyful in my house of prayer." Is. lvi. 1—7. The Lord ever hath honored those who honor Him, and graciously He provides for those who trust in Him. This, indeed, is blessed encouragement to those whose understandings being opened to understand the Scriptures, perceive combined against them the world and the church—the world in enmity to all truth, the church in love with her own traditions. Called to witness, in Sabbatic rest, for God's creative power and goodness, such will remember the mighty deliverances He hath wrought in every age, and the certainty of His promise to make provision for us according to our need. They will also know that His is no vain or thankless service. Present upholding is vouchsafed, and future glory promised, to those who, abiding truly in Him, as the soldiers of Christ, continue steadfast in His cause, until He come again.

THE TRIUMPH.

In the foregoing articles, we have contemplated a terrible war, foretold by all the prophets, under various names and figures, which has been alluded to in the Evangelists, and so minutely described in the Apocalypse as to enable the Bible student to discover, amid the high-wrought figures with which these descriptions abound, the characters of the parties to be engaged, the principles for which they contend, the provocation to the war, its sanguinary nature, and its glorious triumph.

The Scriptures present the Jews in the front view, in describing the struggle; probably from the fact that they, throughout, are used to represent a principle, and through them the promises apply to the people of God, of whatever country, as well as to themselves particularly as a nation; and also from the consideration that they, of all the nations of of earth known to the world in the time of the predictions, should remain a distinct people, with principles unchanged, at the close of the drama.

The kingdom of Israel was swallowed up of the Assyrian empire about 721 B. C., Judah about 588, since which time they have had no king but such as their oppressors placed over them. They have, therefore, been in a state of vassalage 2440 years, and of the suffering foretold by Moses and the prophets, they have drunk to the dregs. Subjugated by the Assyrians, they have been under each successive monarchy—the Medo-Persian, Macedonian or Grecian, and Roman; and under the last, and the ten kingdoms into which that empire was divided, their sufferings have been more, perhaps, then all who have suffered for principle, of every other creed or nation, put together. The Pagan, the Mahomedan, the Papal, and even Infidel and Protestant monarchies have been equally vindictive and relentless in their persecutions of the Jews.

I will only ask the reader now to take his Bible, and trace the fearful predictions against the Jews for their sins, in a few of the instances, viz., Lev. xxvi. 33, 36, 39, 44; Deut. iv. 27; xxviii. 25, 28, 29, 32, 34, 37, 45, 48, 58, 59, 63, 68; and let these suffice till I name a few of the cases in which these predictions have been fulfilled. After their dispersion, in an attempt to return to their own land, their whole forces of thousands were exterminated. They were banished from Judea, and by an edict of the Emperor, it was death to a Jew to set his foot in Jerusalem. But those prophecies, given thousands of years ago, are fulfilled in the present day. They are scattered among the nations, from one end of the earth to the other, the very names of which were not known in the time of the prophecies. They abound in all the nations of Europe and Asia, and in Africa; no nation is known, that deserves the name, which does not contain them. In America they are everywhere found, and in the United States only have they enjoyed security. In the first century, Jerusalem was razed to the ground, all their cities and their country were ravaged, the people were driven from their own homes, and wandered throughout the world. One of the Emperors of Rome ordered 500,000 of them slain. Persecutions raged through four or five centuries, till they dispersed as fugitives into other countries for repose. Banished from Rome at one time after having had their ears cut off; banished from Alexandria in the fifth century into Persia. Many, having sought rest in vain, were allured to the standard of a false Messiah, in the sixth century, hoping thereby to regain their country. Extermination followed by the swords of their enemies, and in many cases they were hunted from the very caverns in the wilderness where they sought safety and repose. In Spain they were terribly persecuted in the seventh century, and finally expelled. In France they were required to renounce their religion, or be despoiled of their goods. Mahomet subdued, robbed, and then expelled them from Arabia; and throughout his dominions, in the succeeding century, laws were passed encouraging apostacy by giving to any child, on his professing Mahomedanism, the property of his parents or brethren. But this catalogue, scarcely commenced, is oppressive, and we turn from the consideration of so long a period of suffering. With the account of their oppressions, sufferings, banishments, and massacres, which have been from time to time inflicted, in some of the kingdoms of Europe, our credulity would be shocked, if these statements were not well sustained by evidence. But I will pause, and allow the imagination to follow them over all the nations of the world, and extend their sufferings for more than two thousand years; and, overwhelmed at the view of their accumulated wrongs, who could but exclaim, "Though God has been just, the nations have been cruel?" And cruel will be the retribution, as sure as God is just. Here we discover the fearful account to be settled, for crushed humanity represented by that people.

The Jews represent a principle, and that principle one dictated by the God of Israel; and as they have suffered for adhering to that principle, their cause is the cause of God, and He will avenge it. However grievoulsy they have sinned against God, the nations have persecuted them for their principles, which they both hate and fear, as contemning their authority, and as dangerous to their power; for, while they sojourn among them, and persist in remaining a distinct people, and recognizing no other sovereign than God and His Anointed, they must necessarily favor no other than a popular government. They have steadily and perseveringly opposed the pretensions of Paganism, Popery and Mahomedism; and their own nation's government is based on the law and the prophets, which are comprehended in these two precepts, worthy of their Author, and eternal like Him: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind," "and the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Matt. xxii. 37, 40, Deut. vi. 5, Lev. xix. 18; or, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them, for this is the law and the prophets." Matt. vii. 12. These principles also govern the followers of the Lamb, who are the called, the chosen, and the faithful. Rev. xiii. 14. These are the principles which will govern the kingdom which the God of heaven will set up, at the termination of this dreadful issue, which is now beginning to agitate the world.

The conflict once past, and the triumph won, a new state of things will follow. The proud colossus fallen, burying in its ruins the power of the beast and the false prophet—the dragon chained, and a seal set upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more—(this binding of Satan appears to have a national object,)—he shall no more cheat the nations out of their liberty by the delusion of the divine right of kings to make them grind in the prison-house of despotism, and give their labor and tears and blood, to support and pamper oppression; nor to turn their religious sympathies into superstition, to rivet their chains, and sustain the pretensions of tyrants. "For the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom, under the whole heavens, shall be given to the people of the saints of the most High," and they shall possess it.

No more shall the expenses of standing armies, and navies, and fortresses, eat out the substance of nations, for they were only necessary for the support of despotism, and as a defense against its ambition and cupidity. A conference of nations can settle the claims of justice, and the people dispose of their own domestic concerns. Non-intervention will be the principle, as well as the policy, of nations. No more great and extensive governments, or powerful unions, or alliances of nations; for their necessity, as a balance of power, will have ceased, and their machinery will be onerous. Peace and security will prevail, and the world become a paradise so far as the condition of fallen humanity will admit.

The nations of the earth, divided into chosen communities, of dimensions convenient for national purposes, will overspread the world. Contented and happy in their own unmolested pursuits, they will dwell side by side, like families of the same household. The poor will see a friend in every face, and the oppressed and down-trodden slave will rise to the condition of a man and a brother. No overshadowing aristocracies will monopolize the portion of the landless, or seek to revel in luxury at the expense of the poor.

The church will rejoice in her present enlargement and in anticipation of her glorious future. Infidelity will be dumb. The machinations of the beast and false prophet will no more oppress the church. Faith, pure and clear, will sustain every heart, and joy and hope irradiate the countenance of all her members; and the song of angels will again go up from ten thousand voices, "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, and good will toward men."

The lovers of God, of truth, and humanity, who have labored and toiled and bled, to bring about this state of things, and shall be permitted to view, (though it be from Pisgah's top,) this glorious triumph, must view it with unspeakable satisfaction.

What a vision will enrapture the soul of the toil-worn missionary, who has labored to fertilize the valleys of Palestine, and introduce the water of life to the perishing children of Abraham, as from every quarter they are returning from their long captivity. When, from the mountains of Judea, which he has ascended to view the gathering hosts who have pitched their tents below, with the faith of the prophets in his heart, and the tear of joy sparkling in his eye, he will exclaim, "From the top of the rock I see him! and from the hills I behold him"—"How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob, and thy tabernacles, O Israel!"—"Who can count the dust of Jacob, or number the fourth part of Israel?"—"So the people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations"—"God is not a man, that he should lie; or the son of a man that he should repent. Hath he said, and shall he not do it; or hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good?"—"He hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob, or perverseness in Israel"—"The Lord his God is with him, and the shout of a king is among them"—"According to this time, it shall be said of Jacob, What hath God wrought!"

This picture, though delightful, is not overdrawn, but must fall far short of the reality. It is the necessary consequence of the downfall of monarchy and despotic governments and institutions—the fall of the beast with his image and the false prophet—and of the establishment of constitutional and popular governments, founded on the immutable principles of the Gospel and Bible morality. These results, in all their parts, are clearly guarantied in the purposes of God revealed to his prophets. Daniel's prophecy, though promulgated in the time when the Babylonish Empire was in the zenith of its glory, has been fulfilled, down to the present time, with literal exactness; and who can doubt, that the closing scene will transpire, when the world can see the image standing in the condition described, and the engine preparing to strike the decisive blow?

Here I leave the subject, that the reader may supply from his own resources what is wanting in the description. The glorious personal reign of Christ, so rich a theme of prophetic imagery, and so fondly cherished by primitive Christains, I have not entered upon. What that reign will be, and the privileges and glories of Paradise restored, may baffle the powers of more brilliant minds to describe. I have only approached the vestibule of that kingdom, and traced the events foretold to the most literal and necessary results, to prepare the kingdom for the reception of the King of kings. These desirable results are in the use of means, and will cost the world toil and suffering. Statesmen, philanthropists, and Christians, have a wide field and an open door, a rich and sure reward. With a singleness of purpose tending to the same result, we may all unite to hasten the consummation, to shorten the period of sorrow, and the woes of crushed humanity. J. M.

HONESTY IN LITTLE THINGS.

The following curious account of a pratical sermon is copied from the Vermont Chronicle:—

A brother in the ministry took occasion to preach on the passage in Luke 16 : 10 : "He that is unjust in the least is unjust also in much." The theme was, "that men who take advantage in small things of others, have the very element of character to wrong the community and individuals in great things, where the prospect of escaping detection or censure is as little to be dreaded." The preacher exposed the various ways by which people wrong others; such as borrowing by mistakes in making change; by errors in accounts; by escaping taxes and custom-house duties; by managing to escape postage; by finding articles and never seeking owners; and by injuring articles borrowed, and never making the fact known to the owner when returned. One lady the next day met her pastor, and said, "I have been up to Mr.——, to rectify an error he made in giving me change a few weeks ago, for I felt bitterly your reproof yesterday." Another individual went to Boston to pay for an article not in her bill, which she noticed was not charged when she paid it. A man, going home from meeting, said to his companion, "I do not believe there was a man in the meeting-house to-day, who did not feel condemned." After applying the sermon to a score or more of his acquaintances, he continued: "Did not the pastor utter something about finding a pair of wheels?" "I believe not, Neighbor A. He spoke of keeping little things, which had been found." "Well, I thought two or three times he said something about finding a pair of wheels, and really supposed he meant me. I found a pair down in my lot a while ago." "Do you," said his companion, "know who they belong to? Mr. B. lost them a short time ago." The owner was soon in possession of his wheels.

BUNYAN IN PRISON.

The sight of a man in the cell of a prison is always sad, even though he is suffering for his wicked acts. But when an innocent man is seen there, or one whose only offense is that he would not do wrong, we forget the cruelty of his oppressors in our admiration of his patience and firmness.

John Bunyan was confined for the greater part of twelve years in a jail, for preaching Christ and Him crucified, as the only foundation of a sinner's hope! He was torn from his family, and deprived of his liberty, and cast into prison, only because he could not refrain from preaching the gospel of the grace of God to dying men!

One of his biographers says, "that the thoughts of parting with his wife and poor children, and the remembrance of the many hardships, miseries and wants, that his family must meet with, but, above all, his poor blind child, who lay nearer his heart than all he had beside, were agonizing to him." His own record of his feelings, when thinking of his blind Mary, is very affecting:

"Poor child, thought I, what sorrow art thou likely to have for thy portion in this world. Thou must be beaten, must beg, suffer hunger, cold, nakedness, and a thousand calamities, though I cannot endure that the wind should blow upon thee. But yet, recalling myself, thought I, I must venture all with God, though it goeth to the quick to leave you."

"The company of his poor blind child," says another biographer, "was a sweet consolation to him in the prison, while with her by his side, he worked at the tagged laces which were his only means of contributing to the support of his family." [Penny Gazette.

THE FOUR ANGELS.

Though brief and vain be thy path of pain,
  Though dark and dull thy span,
Yet spirits four, for evermore,
  Are busied with thee, O man!

Thy Guardian Angel! from heaven he sped,
  When thy race of life was begun;
And he stood by thy bed with noiseless tread
  When the mother hailed her son.

Oh! wert thou not dear in the eyes of the Lord]
  When He sent from beside His throne
A spirit to guide, and to aid and preside?
  Be precious in thine own.

The Accusing Spirit next glides by,
  Divinely commissioned too,
To watch and to note, and report on high
  All you think, and say, and do.

No pause, no check to his search is given,
  No rest his vigilance wins;
From heaven to earth, from earth to heaven,
  With his burden of many sins.

The Recording Angel never descends,
  Fixed by the throne on high;
But they know him well on whom he bends
  The glance of his hopeless eye.

He sits at his task with his terrible face,
  And his fingers of flamelets made;
On diamond tables the records they trace
  In letters that never shall fade!

The Angel of Death! behold him come,
  With its calm and pasionless eye!
On a deep dun cloud, in a vapory shroud,
  Still onward—nearer—nigh.

No halo is seen around his brow,
  No wings on his shoulders hung;
But with torch reversed and expiring now,
  And one stern word on his tongue.

That word is, "Come!" no struggling here;
  His arm is round thee cast;
But if with the second and third thou art clear,
  Thou never need'st dread the last!

Then pass 'neath the arch, on that awful march
  Where millions before have trod;
And fear no wrath, in that narrow path,
  If you walked on earth with God!

But where is the Angel who led thee on
  In life's rough and perilous way?—
His task is over, his mission is done,
  He can no longer stay.

"I go," he cries, "be strong, farewell!
  "Thou must die alone to-night;
"Near the grave's long shadows I may not dwell,
  "We shall meet in the halls of light!"

"A BOW AT A VENTURE."

The history of the church in modern times is full of incidents, showing the importance of little things in the accomplishment of God's purposes. There was one man of extraordinary genius, who plunged into wickedness with a greediness which as much surpassed that of ordinary men, as his genius surpassed their dullness. One day we were told that a woman, "a notorious sinner herself, was so shocked at the oaths he uttered that she told him he was the most ungodly fellow that she had seen in her life, and that he was enough to spoil all the youth in the town, if they came into his company."

It cut him to the heart, and it seems to have been the very thing which started him from the "City of Destruction" towards the "Celestial City." Follow this man until you find him in London, preaching with such singular felicity, that a mitred bishop, a favorite of the king, and one of the most learned men in the kingdom, hears him with delight. The king sneeringly asks his favorite how he can demean himself so much as to hear a tinker preach? The bishop replied, "May it please your majesty, if I could preach like that tinker, I would willingly give up all my learning."

And need it be said that the man so affected by the words of that notorious sinner was John Bunyan; and whilst the Pilgrims' Progress arrests the attention of the young, the middle-aged, and the old mingles the fascinations of genius with the choicest wisdom an piety, and stereotypes its invaluable lessons on the hearts of multitudes, so long will we see the mighty consequences of that rebuke, uttered two hundred years ago in the town of Bedford.

About half a century ago, a young lady was on her way to the Sabbath school in London, when she met a dirty and ragged boy. She spoke to him kindly, and led him to the Sabbath school. Behold the simple act which gave to China her Morrison, whose name shall shine out with increasing lustre as the millions of that great people shall come gradually into the kingdom of Christ.

Henry Martyn once found a fellow student reading a drama to the daughter of a dying man in order to calm her grief, and he uttered a sharp rebuke for such unfit consolation. That rebuke led to the young man's conversion, and he became Martyn's co-laborer as a missionary to India.

Martyn himself was once conversing with the good Dr. Simeon, who dropped a casual remark on the great good accomplished in India by that excellent Baptist missionary, Dr. Carey. That simple remark became the pivot on which turned the future conduct of Henry Martyn, sending him away from the joys of home and friendship, to lay his splendid attainments and his life on the altar of Christ, as a foreign missionary. And when the day of judgment shall have come, when the influence of Martyn's translation of the Bible shall be measured in the conversion of the myriads of Southern Asia, when a multitude of ministers and missionaries shall tell of the impulses recevied in the way of holiness from reading his life and writings, when an unnumbered multitude of private Christians shall repeat the story of new baptisms of the Holy Ghost from the same instrumentality—then shall we begin to see the importance of that single remark of Dr. Simeon. The "bow drawn at a venture" had done great execution.

This thought is commended to the Christian parent, the Sabbath school teacher, the tract distributor, and to every Christian who is trying to do good. The true philosophy of each one is, "Cast thy bread on the waters," and then fall back on the appended promise, "for thou shalt find it after many days." Let all, in view of the importance of little things in producing great results, in faith and with prayer, often draw a bow at a venture, in the belief that in another world we may find that the insignificant instrumentality has been honored of God. TRUTH AND ERROR.

Nothing is more certain, than that the divisions in the Christian world are contrary to the will of God. The Bible does not command one man to be a Presbyterian, and another a Baptist. It does not enjoin one man to keep the Sabbath, and another to keep Sunday. It does not impose the Calvinistic form of doctrine upon one, and the Arminian upon another. It does not declare the divinity of Christ to one, and the opposite doctrine to another. These contrarieties exist in the minds of men, but not in the scriptures of truth.

Of these contrarieties, the one is truth, and is no lie; the other is a lie, without any admixture of truth; or else the Bible reveals nothing on the subject. For instance, the doctrine which teaches that Jesus Christ is truly God, is either true or false. If it is true, then the doctrine which declares him to be only a man, is false—it is a lie. And vice versa, if the doctrine which declares his simple humanity is truth, then that which proclaims his divinity is a lie. The only other alternative is, that the Bible teaches nothing on the subject; that is, does not teach us who or what he is. The same may be said in regard to other controverted points.

Now it is very certain, that all error is of the devil. John 8: 44. Those who teach false doctrine, are therefore doing the devil's work; and those who receive the doctrine, are submitting themselves to the guidance of the devil. This may seem harsh, but is it any more so than the scriptures of truth? It cannot be denied, that "whosoever committeth sin is of the devil;" for the Bible says so in express terms. 1 John 3: 8. Nevertheless, it seems to be thought by many, that sin in the conduct has no necessary connection with error in the mind. Because some sin notwithstanding their knowledge of the truth, (James 4: 17, Rom. 1: 18, Heb. 10: 26,) and others are generally upright notwithstanding their mistakes, the false conclusion is drawn, that error may be held without incurring much danger; in short, that it is of little importance whether we hold truth or not.

But how can the devil influence any one to sin, without first blinding the mind? 2 Cor. 4: 4. Is there any other way in which it is possible for him to lead men into transgression? This was the way in which he prevailed with our first parents. "The woman being DECEIVED was in the transgression." 1 Tim. 2: 14. She was made to think, that partaking of the forbidden fruit would be for her good; and, at last, Adam was made to think so too. To this day, sin maintains its ascendancy in the same way. We talk of "lusts" in the heart urging men to sin; but it must be borne in mind that these are "DECEITFUL lusts." And if we conceive of their drawing people into sin without first exercising their power to deceive the mind, we form an altogether erroneous judgment. They have no power whatever, except in connection with some false view or opinion. Is it not clear, then, that false doctrine is of the devil, and that whoever receives it yields himself to the guidance of the devil?

But are all those who hold false doctrine necessarily the servants of the devil? We have admitted already, that some maintain a generally upright behavior notwithstanding their errors. Their uprightness, however, is attributable to the truth which they hold, under the influence of which they rise superior to those sins into which their errors would otherwise lead them. The character of a man is determined, not by a few circumstances, but by his general or habitual conduct. He whose general aim is to glorify God, must be regarded, not as the servant of the devil, but as the servant of Christ. He may frequently fall into sin, but as it is not his habit to do so, he does not commit sin in that sense which characterizes him as a servant of sin, (John 8: 34,) but, on the contrary, as one that abideth in Christ and is born of God, sinneth not. 1 John 3: 6, 9. Nevertheless, the mere fact that he falls into sin sometimes, shows that he is at such times under the influence of error. The understanding is darkened. Eph. 4: 18. For though we talk about pride, avarice, sensuality, ambition, prejudice, we do not in strictness mean that these are distinct faculties of the mind, but that they signify the ill state of the reasoning faculty. And whenever any thing is imputed to the strength and violence of our passions, strictly speaking, it only means the weakness and low condition of our reason at that time. For reason governs as fully when our actions and tempers are bad, as when they are sound and good. The only difference is, that reason acting well governs in the one case, and reason acting ill governs in the other. If we could find one who never committed any sin at all, but was absolutely perfect according to the law of God, we should find one who was entirely free from error, his reasoning faculty always acting well, without any failure. Hence, if it can be admitted that the children of God are not absolutely perfect, it must also be admitted, that they are, more or less, the subjects of deception.

Should this view be thought inconsistent with the well-known fact, that men often act directly contrary to what they know to be right—that they "know to do good, and do it not"—that they "hold the truth in unrighteousness,"—"sin willfully after receiving the knowledge of the truth," &c.—we think a little reflection will show the contrary. Men are said to have a knowledge of duty, but to be unwilling to do it, when they are able to apply the rule of duty to others, or to mankind in general, while with regard to their own personal concern in it they are perfectly blind. Thus, a man given to debauchery may have such a clear knowledge of the sin of it, that he can condemn it in every body else without hesitation. He can descant upon its diabolical nature, and awful consequences, with the eloquence of an apostle. In others he sees no excuse for it whatever. But in view of the temptation for himself to indulge, his reason invents a thousand apologies. He is differently circumstanced; his case is peculiar; his constitution demands the indulgence. So of every other sin, in regard to which a person's knowledge is better than the state of his heart. In our Saviour's time, the Scribes and Pharisees were well versed in the knowledge of duty. "If ye were blind, ye should have no sin." John 9: 41. Nevertheless, they were "blind guides;" "fools, and blind;" "blind leaders of the blind." To just such people Paul refers, when he speaks of those who "know the will of God, and approve the things that are more excellent, being instructed out of the law;" and he shows, that though they had keenness enough to instruct others, they could not instruct themselves. "Therefore thou art inexcusable, O man, whosoever thou art that judgest; for wherein thou judgest another, thou condemnest thyself; for thou that judgest doest the same things." Rom. 2: 1, 17, &c.

But we are digressing too far. If imperfection of character necessarily supposes error of judgment, we do not "unchristianize" those who hold false doctrine, notwithstanding we may be well convinced that their doctrine is of the devil, as all false doctrine is. We no more reject them as unbelievers, and servants of sin, than we do those of our own sect or denomination, in whom we may discover imperfections of character. All we intend by it is to vindicate the God of truth. "Let God be true, but every man a liar." His truth is not responsible for the various conflicting opinions that prevail in the Christian world. They originate with Satan, and are perpetuated by the selfishness of the human heart. Those who ask, Why does God leave His people under the influence of so much selfishness? might as well ask, why He does not render them perfect at once? But the very fact that all error is of the devil, should make the Christian diligent and unceasing in his inquiries after truth, lest unconsciously he should be doing the devil's work. Truth, even the least atom of it, should be esteemed more precious than gold. He should buy it, no matter at what cost; he can never buy truth too dear. He should refuse to sell it, no matter what may be offered for it; no sum can compensate the loss of it. Prov. 23: 23.

THE COLONY—AGAIN.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

The remarks of your correspondent induce me again to refer to the subject of which he speaks. It is true, that the influence of our little denomination never can be what it might and should be, while they are scattered in small parties about interior agricultural districts, almost without intercourse with the world, contending for the right to worship according to the dictates of conscience, sometimes dragged to prison and robbed of what little property they possess, for obedience to what they believe to be the law of God—"Six days shalt thou labor," &c.

Wherever Sabbath-keepers have located in conspicuous places, they have been so few as to exert no political influence, and their rights have been disregarded; they have been compelled to contend with obstacles in their business, and annoyances on the Sabbath, that none but those of the firmest determination could withstand; and even these often compromise with their pecuniary interest to such a degree as to weaken their influence; and their children are likely to be even less scrupulous than they.

Our people are not censurable for selecting inland and out-of-the-way places. The more out of the way the better, unless they can settle in more important places in sufficient numbers and influence to secure to themselves equal privileges with their neighbors. They have preferred to dwell, like the Vaudois, in the fastnesses of the mountains, rather than to be decoyed into commercial places to the desertion of those principles for which their forefathers for more than two hundred years have contended so earnestly. The Stennetts, Burnside, and other eminent leaders, were not able to rally their churches successfully against the seductions of London; and the house at Newport, where a hundred years ago those pious patriots whose names have given a lustre to the history of Rhode Island, and the inscriptions upon whose tomb-stones are a perpetual reproach to their degenerate descendants, is now occupied by people of "quite another color." No; I never saw a conscientious Sabbath-keeper come to our large cities to settle, but my sympathies were strongly exercised for him, as memory recalled all the trials and temptations through which he must pass.

We are now scattered through all the Free States, and yet are not sufficiently strong in any one to demand our natural rights. I am told that Providence will take care of us, and in His own time will direct all to His glory; but to be governed by a blind dependence upon Providence, and not to recognize the truth, that God works through laws, which he has designed for us to understand, is worthy only the fatalism of the Mahomedan. I would that some Moses might appear to lead us, as the Sabbath-keepers of old, to some spot on the earth where we could be felt and heard. I fear that nothing short of another Moses would ever accomplish so magnificent a result.

Your correspondent recommends the Mississippi Valley as the proper place for a colony. However this may be, I do not see how it is to be effected, while the people already there are just the ones who are most anxious to go to Oregon. All eyes are now turned to the shores of the Pacific. There has been, is, and will be for years to come, a current in that direction which a man may stem, but which he cannot divert. Not a steamer has left our shores for months that has not carried away to California some of our young men. I would not divert this current if I could; I would take advantage of the fact, and out of a seeming evil, I would endeavor to effect a great good. Who can say that this very movement is not the appointed way of Providence? Certainly, the course of freedom and thought grows more irresistible as it moves westward. The evils of the present movement are chiefly the demoralizing influences of a camp life, away from the restraints which are imposed by the presence of woman. I would that their wives and mothers were with them, to check the follies and vulgarities, to keep the heart pure at its altar, and remind the wanderer of his duties. The great majority of those who go out as adventurers will ultimately make that country their home, but scattered over a wide region, unknown to each other, and unknown to the society in which they were reared. Who can doubt it?

I have received many letters in reference to the proposed colony. A general preference is expressed for Oregon; and there are certainly reasons for this preference. Oregon has the elements for one of the most prosperous States the world has ever seen. Its climate has no superior. The winters, even in its northern part, are almost without frost; nor are the summers excessively warm. It is remarkable for its healthfulness. Its soil is very fertile; its mineral resources, although scarcely inquired into, are proved abundant; while a market will always be found with her more richly-endowed but profligate sister. The land has never yet been sold, but is given to actual settlers in limited quantities; and Oregon will present practically the advantages of the land-reform measures. Her population consists of neither the very rich nor the very poor; the first have no disposition to go there, and the last have not the means. Oregon is soon to become a State; a constitution and laws are to be framed. It is destined to be to the vast shores of the Pacific what New England has been to those of the Atlantic. The empires of Eastern Asia are to be galvanized into new life by her christianized republicanism; their people are already mingling with ours by hundreds; and the islands of the sea, whose inhabitants have been forced to judge of our Christian civilization by the low specimens which frequent them, will take larger views of christianity. Have not we especial reason to seize the opportunity? The population of Oregon is yet sparse, the laws are yet to be formed, and her towns are yet small. A small force early, will be as effectual as a much larger one later. Our missionary field in China is but fourteen days distant. The Society Islands are, through a mistake of the missionaries, Sabbath-keepers; a family or two stationed there, or the intercourse of our own people, may be productive of great benefit there.

I am asked as to the best mode of going out, and the expense. A vessel of six hundred tons can be bought for about $10,000, which will accommodate fifty families. Freight could be charged the usual rates, which would pay the expense of victualing the ship, and taking her out. The vessel could then be sold, and the chief part of the original outlay refunded. I shall be able in a few days to furnish more particular information to those who desire it. The time employed in going out in this way would of course depend on the winds and the sailing qualities of the ship. Five months are a sufficient allowance for an ordinary sailer. The safety of the voyage may be estimated by the fact that with the 30,000 who performed it the same year with myself, no serious accident occurred. By this mode of conveyance, a greater amount of such goods as will secure comfort in a new settlement can be carried than by any other mode. Should a vessel leave here in October, she would pass the Cape in summer, and reach the coast in April, allowing for the longest passage, by which means the storms will be avoided off the Cape, and the best season will be secured for the beginning of a settlement. From the best means I have of judging, this route is preferable to that by the "Plains." This must be determined by those who are most interested. An agreement as to the mode of getting there is of less importance than the location which shall be determined upon. Whatever I can do to aid in the undertaking, I will do cheerfully; but I have no disposition to be assuming. The greatest obstacle to the accomplishment of the undertaking is the difficulty there is of comparing views and determining upon a course, where the parties are so far apart, without some one incurring the liability of the charge of officiousness.

It will be seen, by reference to the circular of the late delegate from Oregon to Congress, published in the Sabbath Recorder for Dec. 26, 1850, that the provision granting 320 acres to every married man who settles in that territory, expires on the first of December, 1853. There is no time to lose. Whatever is done should be done promptly. A small light party should go out this spring, by the nearest route, to examine the relative merits of various points, and report at the earliest possible time. I have received assurances from a considerable number of their readiness to embark in the proposed colony, but a few more are wanted.

Yours respectfully, J. D. B. STILLMAN.

"CANDIDATES" FOR THE MINISTRY.—There are no less than six thousand men in Protestant Germany, who, having finished their theological studies, and undergone the examination required by the rules of the university, have obtained the title of "candidates" for the ministry, but have no regular pastoral duties. They are doing nothing in their profession; and though the moral vineyard is perishing for lack of cultivation, they are "standing all the day idle." This is a shame to a Protestant ministry.

CARRYING OUT THE PRINCIPLE.—When the First Baptist Church in New York built their splendid meeting-house in Broome-st., some years ago, rooms were fitted up in connection with it for the Baptist Home Mission Society and the American and Foreign Bible Society, which were tendered to those Societies rent free. It is now stated, that the Bible Society, in consequence of its refusal to take part in the new version movement—a movement which the First Church generally approve—is to be ejected this spring.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

The above paragraph, in your paper of last week, gives an erroneous impression of the action of the First Baptist Church in reference to the Bible Rooms. The facts of the case are few and simple.

The First Baptist Church has for ten years permitted the American and Foreign Bible Society to occupy the premises in question at a merely nominal rent. Last May the Board of that Society, in connection with five Trustees, not members of the Church, endeavored to fasten a lease of twenty-one years upon the premises, at one dollar a year. Public indignation compelled the Society to rescind this lease, but at the same time both the Board and the Society put forth a still more offensive and injurious claim—that of a perpetual lease.

At the next ensuing meeting of the Corporators of the Church, unanimous resolutions were passed expressive of their disapprobation of such proceedings; but no notice has ever been taken of the matter by the Board or the Society. The Pastor of the Church, although specially commissioned to present the protest of that body against the Society's proceedings, was contemptuously refused a hearing at the Annual Meeting, and in every possible way the Society and the Board have indicated their determination to hold the Rooms as their own by right, and thus destroy the value of the property more than even by a lease of twenty-one years.

Under these circumstances, the Trustees, to protect their property, were compelled to order the Society to quit the premises, and the Church acquiesced in the views of the Trustees.

A FRIEND OF TRUTH.

TEMPERANCE BANQUET.

The National Temperance Society held a Banquet at Metropolitan Hall, N. Y., on the evening of the 18th inst. The eatables were of course, "all that could be desired." The intellectual part of the entertainment consisted of speeches by Gen. Houston, Hon. Horace Mann, Rev. Messrs. Crugler and Chambers, Hon. Neal Dow (Mayor of Portland and author of the Maine Liquor Law,) Rev. E. H. Chapin, "Father Taylor" of Boston, Henry Ward Beecher, and P. T. Barnum. The following were among the regular "sentiments:"—

The Liquor Traffic—We hold to it no other relation than that of strenuous and uncompromising opposition; we aim to undermine it by the most vigorous and unceasing moral influences, to cleave it down by prohibitory legal enactments, and to take away its power of resuscitation by the destruction of the contraband article.

The Maine Law for the Suppression of Tippling Houses—It infringes no man's just and lawful rights—it interrupts no proper or legitimate branch of trade; but, like laws for the destruction of the implements of gaming and counterfeiting, it operates only for the public good. We hail with joy the day, not distant, when it shall be enrolled among the main laws of every State in the Union and of every country in the World.

Our National Government—Eight years ago, it offered protection to the Indians by forbidding the sale of ardent spirits among them, and authorizing the summary destruction of all such liquors if carried into their territory. Has not the time come when Temperance men should support such candidates only for Congress or for the Presidency as will pledge themselves to protect, not only the Indians, but their constituents, by the enactment of laws which shall positively prohibit the importation of foreign liquors into the country.

Temperance and Politics, One and Inseparable—What God and the Constitution of our country have joined together, let no body of men put asunder.

LENT IN NEW YORK.—The season of Lent opens with the 25th inst., and Archbishop Hughes has issued his instructions as to the manner of keeping it. All the week days of Lent, from Ash Wednesday to Easter Sunday, are fast days of precept, on one meal, with the allowance of a moderate collation in the evening. "It is not allowed to use fish with flesh meat at the same meal. There is no prohibition to use eggs, butter, or cheese, provided the rules of quantity prescribed by the fast, be complied with. The church excuses from the obligation of fasting (but not of abstinence from flesh meat, except in special cases of sickness, or the like,) the infirm, those whose duties are of an exhausting or laborious character, persons who are only attaining their growth," &c., &c.

LENT AT WASHINGTON.—A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune, writing from Washington, under date of Feb. 17, says:—

"The people hereabouts are so pre-eminently godly, that they suspend their festivities when Lent begins. And this pious time approaches. The consequence is, that an immense amount of gayety is driven into a small corner of time. There is hurrying to and fro in hot haste; silks rustle and satins glisten; carriages whirl, door bells ring; servants fly, and everybody goes it on the neck-or-nothing maxim; in order that as little as possible of enjoyment may be lost before the gate of Lent swings on its hinges, and shuts everybody up at home. There are many humbugs at Washington, but the snubbing of the gay world by the Lent people, is one of the biggest."

SABBATH-KEEPERS AT TOWNSEND, O.—Bro. Ichabod Babcock, of Townsend, Sandusky Co., Ohio, authorizes us to say, that there are a few Seventh-day Baptists residing there, who would be glad to be visited by ministers, colporteurs, or Sabbath-keeping families, traveling through that section of country.

CHURCH STATISTICS.—Few persons have an adequate idea of the importance of full and correct statistics of Churches and Associations. It was impressed upon us, recently, in attempting to prepare a complete list of Seventh-day Baptist Churches, with their ministers, licentiates, deacons, clerks, post-offices, date of organization, and present number of members. Of the churches in the North-Western or Wisconsin Association we can find no statistics collected during the last two years; and within that time the churches at Farmington, Berlin, and one or two others, have been received, of which we have no statistics. Only one of the two churches on Hughes' River is referred to in recent minutes of the Association to which they both naturally belong. The churches at Madison and Fredonia have not been heard from in several years. Will the Clerks of future Associations think of this; and when churches are reported as having been disbanded, let the minutes state the fact; and when they make no report, state the fact, and give their statistics when last heard from?

SUNDAY-KEEPING ON THE PENNSYLVANIA CANALS.—The Canal Board of Pennsylvania have passed a resolution, closing the several divisions of the Pennsylvania Canal every Saturday night at 12 o'clock, and requiring that they remain closed until 11 o'clock on Sunday night, except for the passage of packet boats. This exception shows how much principle is involved in the movement. If it is wicked for a freight-boat, with its half a dozen hands, to travel on Sunday, why not for a packet-boat, with twice as many hands, and hundreds of passengers? If it "robs" the lock-tender of his "right to the Sabbath" to require him to open his lock for a freight-boat on Sunday, why not to open it for a packet-boat? Some of the sticklers for Sunday are sharp at hair-splitting.

METHODIST PAPERS.—It is well known, that the Methodist papers have a very wide circulation. One reason is, they are fewer in number than those of other denominations; another reason is, that among the Methodists, ministers and laymen take a decided interest in the circulation of their papers. Witness the following, which we copy from one of them:—

"A few of our brethren are working nobly for the Advocate. Br. See, from Iowa, writes that he expects to send us fifty subscribers. Br. Gossard, from Winchester, Ohio, sends us sixty-two subscribers, and says that his colleague, Br. Bennet, and himself, hope to raise the list to one hundred. Br. Kelley, from Independence, Mo., sends us eight subscribers for the Advocate, and three for the Repository, and says that is equal to one for every member of his charge. Who can surpass this?"

THE HIGHER-LAW HERESY.—We have already stated, on the authority of newspaper reports, that the Regents of the Michigan University have dismissed one or more Professors for preaching the "higher-law" doctrine. The following resolution is going the rounds as having been adopted by them; but we have some doubts of its genuineness:—

Whereas, Rev. D. D. Whedon has not only publicly preached, but openly advocated the doctrine called the higher law—a doctrine unauthorized by the Bible, at war with the principles and precepts of Christ, subversive of civil Government and society, and the legal rights of individuals; therefore, Resolved, That Rev. D. D. Whedon be and is hereby removed.

ONE WAY TO SETTLE A CONTROVERSY.—The Tennessee Baptist mentions a new mode of settling a theological controversy. It says that a bond of a thousand dollars, endorsed by several wealthy members of the Baptist Church, was placed in the hands of impartial men, to be given to any person who 'would find in the Word of God authority for infant sprinkling.' It is added, that this reward 'has four times been offered, and as many times forced the acknowledgment that God's Word contains no precept for the practice.'

TROUBLE IN BROWN UNIVERSITY.—There has been trouble in Brown University, at Providence, R. I., and three of the Professors, admitted to be among the most efficient teachers in the institution, have resigned their offices. The causes are variously stated to the public, but we hear from many quarters that a dictatorial and overbearing disposition on the part of President Wayland, and an unwillingness on the part of the resigning Professors to act as spies against the students, were prominent in originating the difficulty.

THE SABBATH AND THE RESURRECTION.—The conclusion of Mr. Begg's pamphlet on this subject, will be found on our first page to-day. Those who have read the articles carefully from week to week, must have derived from them a great deal of valuable information, which could not be found in ordinary treatises on the Sabbath. The articles he has promised us on the history of the change of the Sabbath, and which have never yet been printed, will be looked for with interest.

CHINESE CHARACTER.—Dr. Wiley, of the Methodist Mission, writes: "When we read their moral maxims and book-notions of religion, we judge them to be a polished people, endowed with high moral sense, and just ready to assume a Christian character; but when we study their morality and superstitions in actual life, we cannot hesitate to pronounce them destitute of moral principle, and inveterately attached to their miserable superstitions, and assign them their true place among the most degraded idolaters of the heathen world."

A PASTORAL PATRIARCH.—A writer in the Puritan Recorder states that the ninety-eighth anniversary of Rev. Dr. Nott's birth, was observed by a numerous company of his parishioners and friends, at his house in Franklin, Conn., January 23d, 1852. There were about one hundred and twenty persons present, whose overflowing baskets of the richest provisions, &c., showed the abiding esteem in which the people hold their venerable pastor. When all things were ready for the service, the aged divine, trembling under the blast of ninety-eight winters, leaning on the arm of his grand-daughter, stood at the end of a long table groaning under the weight of eatables, and invoked the blessing of God in appropriate terms. He also led in prayer, near the close of the pleasant and cheerful interview. The entertainment finally wound up with singing. The Doctor's bodily health is still good, though now the oldest pastor in the Union. He has ceased to perform most of the active duties of the pastoral office; and "we regard him as the most perfect model of a good old man which our eyes have ever looked upon."

THE BRITISH IN BURMAH.—Letters dated at Rangoon, Nov. 28, 1851, announce the arrival at that place, on the 25th, of two steamers and a frigate of fifty guns, from Calcutta, dispatched by the government of British India, to gain redress for the outrages inflicted by the Governor of Rangoon on the persons and property of British subjects. Commodore Lambert, to whom the negotiation was entrusted, sent a letter to the Governor, which was delivered by the captain of the frigate. The extent of his demands is uncertain. On his arrival, he found evidence of injuries so much exceeding in number and severity those in view of which his instructions had been framed, that he deferred further action till he should have communicated with the Marquis of Dalhousie. It is believed that the removal of the present Governor at Rangoon, and the residence of an English diplomatic agent, will be insisted on, with redress for past outrages; in default of which, war will at once be commenced, with no uncertain issue.

PROFESSOR STUART ON THE MAINE LIQUOR LAW.—"I feel as if I should be glad of trumpet lungs, which would enable me, ascending some lofty eminence in that State, to make my voice heard over its whole domain. I should tell the people that, first of all, 'I thank and praise my God, that by his holy providence there is one people on the face of this wicked world who dare to do their duty boldly, faithfully, and thoroughly.' I would exhort them manfully, courageously and perseveringly to go on as they have begun. The whole world of sober and thinking men will not only justify, but applaud them. In my view, they have bound their brow with a laurel fresher and more imperishable than that which the conqueror of kingdoms binds on his brow. His is steeped in blood; theirs is the emblem of life and salvation to thousands and millions of their fellow men."

TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT IN NEW YORK.—The National Temperance Society held its sixth quarterly meeting in New York on the evening of the 19th inst. Rev. Mr. Warren, Secretary of the Society, read the quarterly report. One of the prominent efforts of the Society has been the employment of a large number of men to circulate petitions for a Maine Law. These petitions were signed by 25,000 bona fide names; of which 15,000 were men, and most of them voters. In about a week another monster petition will go up; this one is signed by many of the heaviest merchants and the most distinguished professional men of the City, including about one hundred ministers of the gospel. Such has been the effect of those petitions already sent in, that several very heavy orders some time ago sent to France for Brandies and Wines have been countermanded.

LIQUOR LAW IN NEW JERSEY.—The Maine Liquor Law, with some modifications, was reported in the Legislature of New Jersey on the 18th inst. It is to be subject to the popular approval. Liquor may be manufactured under it, but not for sale; and it can only be sold by persons appointed for the purpose, for medicinal and mechanical uses. Unauthorized persons are fined $10 for the first, and $20 for every subsequent offense. Manufacturers are fined $100 for the first, and $200 for subsequent offenses, and a limited imprisonment. Private houses cannot be searched, except on affidavit that there is reason to believe that liquor is sold there. Notes, bonds, &c., given in payment for liquor, are void.

TEMPERANCE IN WISCONSIN.—The Anti-Temperance folks in Milwaukee recently held a meeting and adopted a memorial to the Legislature, setting forth the fearful disasters which so frequently result from the injudicious use of cold water as a beverage, and asking the Legislature, in view thereof, to enact that any man who drinks a glass of water, except on the prescription of a physician, shall pay a fine of $1,000. Whereupon The Free Democrat drily observes—

"We presume if nobody drank any more cold water than the authors of this memorial, such a law would occasion very little inconvenience."

THE LIQUOR LAW IN RHODE ISLAND.—Between them, the two Houses of the Rhode Island Legislature have managed to defeat the Liquor Law for the present. One House passed it with a proviso submitting it to the direct vote of the people; the other House struck out that proviso, and inserted another prescribing that it should not go into operation until next May (after election;) each House insisted on its own proviso; and so the bill was killed—and nobody is responsible.

THE MAINE LAW IN THE LEGISLATURE OF NEW YORK.—The Legislature of New York has before it a bill prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, which contains the leading features of the Maine Liquor Law. Of its passage this winter, there is much reason to doubt. There would not be, however, if the temperance people were as wide awake as the rumsellers.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, FEB. 16.

In the Senate, among the numerous petitions presented was one of 100 citizens of Rhode Island, stating that, as Congress was about to interpose its kind offices in behalf of suffering convicts in other countries, they hoped something would be done for those in prison in the United States, especially for those in prison at Washington, Boynton and Sears, convicted of aiding slaves to escape. Mr. Underwood reported a bill making Land Warrants assignable, and recommending that the Senate do not agree with the House amendments. A bill granting land to Iowa in aid of the construction of certain railroads therein, was taken up, and Mr. Bell of Tennessee took occasion to relieve himself of a speech on the subject, which occupied the remainder of the session.

In the House of Representatives, a resolution was adopted, setting apart the third week in April for the consideration of the Territorial Bills. Mr. Hendricks, from the Committee on Mileage, introduced a bill regulating the mileage of the Delegate from Oregon. The bill proposes to repeal the proviso on a law which allows him $2,500 for mileage, as no restriction is placed on that of other members. Several persons spoke on the question, but no result was reached.

THIRD-DAY, FEB. 10.

In the Senate, a letter was presented and read from Louis Kossuth, expressing his gratitude to the government and people of the United States for what they have done on his behalf. The question of printing it was referred to the printing Committee. A petition was presented from Ohio, praying the recognition of the Republic of Liberia, and for the establishment of a line of mail steamers to Liberia. Several private petitions were presented and reports made. The bill granting land to Iowa for railroad purposes was taken up, and Mr. Hunter of Virginia spoke in reply to Senators Sumner and Bell. A short Executive Session closed the day's labors.

The House spent the whole day in discussing a proposition to remove the limit of $2,500 as the amount of mileage for the delegate from Oregon.

FOURTH-DAY, FEB. 18.

In the Senate, Mr. Fish (N. Y.) presented a Memorial from Henry Grinnell, of New York, asking the United States to accept, free of charge, his two vessels—the Advance and Rescue—and praying that they and a small steam-propeller be fitted out for another search for Sir John Franklin; also, the petition of 300 citizens of New York, in favor of the same object. A long discussion arose on a report from the Committee on Printing, in favor of printing Kossuth's letter, read the day previous. The Southern Senators, with the exception of Downs and Soulé, of Louisiana, and McRea, of Mississippi, opposed the printing. The vote was finally taken, and it was ordered printed by one majority. The Yeas were all Northern Senators, with the three exceptions above. The Nays were all Southern Senators, with the exceptions of Clarke of Rhode Island, Fish of New York, Miller of New Jersey, and Upham of Vermont. After some miscellaneous business, the Iowa Land bill was taken up, and Mr. Underwood spoke for some time upon it, but gave way for an adjournment before concluding.

The House passed the bill to relieve the delegate from Oregon, who has received only $2,500 mileage for one trip to Washington. The remainder of the day was spent in considering the bill granting the right of way and a donation of public lands to Missouri, to aid in the construction of a railroad from St. Josephs to Hannibal, and one from St. Louis to the southern line of that State.

FIFTH-DAY, FEB. 19.

In the Senate, some sixty petitions were presented for additional compensation to Assistant Marshals engaged in taking the Census. The Oregon Mileage case (in connection with the bill from the House) was discussed and dropped. Mr. Seward introduced a bill to expedite the discharge of cargoes from steamships. The Iowa Railroad bill was discussed by Mr. Underwood till the adjournment.

The House was engaged generally in discussing a bill granting right of way and lands to Missouri for railroad purposes. Miller, of Mo., Rantoul, of Mass., Moore, of La., and Ficklin, of Ill., all spoke warmly in favor of the measure.

SIXTH-DAY. FEB. 20.

In the Senate, numerous petitions were presented, of which several were from New York in support of Mr. Grinnell's application to Government in behalf of a new expedition to go in search of Sir John Franklin. Documents relative to the Wheeling Bridge case were presented, and referred to the Judiciary Committee. The private calendar was then taken up, and after passing one or two private bills, the Senate adjourned till Second-day.

The House was occupied during the early part of the session in considering private bills. The Kossuth and Long correspondence, for which the House called some time ago, was presented, and ordered printed. Adjourned till Third-day.

The Erie Railroad Accident.—The Coroner's Jury called to investigate the causes of the recent accident on the Erie Railroad at Deposit, made up the following verdict:—

The Jury, after a particular and thorough investigation of the circumstances attending the death of Patrick Mooney and Miss Mosina, an Indian girl, at Deposit Station, on the New York and Erie Railroad, on February 18, 1852, find that the deceased were passengers in the mail passenger train of that day, and that they were either in the cars or attempting to jump from them, when a freight train going East at great speed, ran into said passenger train, while standing at this station, by which deceased were either crushed or scalded to death.

By the evidence before us, it appears that the freight train followed the passenger train, leaving the summit 15 minutes after the passenger train; that the freight train, after running about a mile, became unmanageable; after all the brakes being applied, the engine reversed, and back steam being applied, by reason of the snow and frost on the rails the speed of the train could not be checked; that the Engineer of the freight train, by the usual signal of the whistle, in time called the Station-man at Deposit to turn the train off the main track and avoid the collision, but the switch-man, who is under the control of the Station-Agent, was not at the switch.

In conclusion, the Jury find great cause of censure against the Railroad Company, by reason of allowing freight trains to immediately follow passenger trains, up or down grades; knowing that freight trains have, at several times previously, become unmanageable on this grade, and run by this station at the highest speed.

There was a sad accident on the New York and Erie Railroad on the 17th inst. A rail broke as the train was on a curve, and threw the hindmost car into the Delaware River. Two persons were killed, and several others wounded.

In reference to the late accident and loss of life on the Erie Road, it is said that this is the only instance in sixteen months where a passenger has been killed on the Road.

California News.

Five days later news from California was received in New York last week, by way of Panama.

Many persons were waiting on the Isthmus for passage to San Francisco, and salt provisions were selling there at very high rates for ships' stores; ten barrels of beef having been sold at $1,000 by Garrison & Fritz.

At San Francisco, the trials growing out of the voyage of the ship Challenge are still progressing before the U. S. District Court.

In the District Court, Jan. 8th, Daniel F. Whilliden, a steerage passenger by the steamship Northerner on her passage to San Francisco in September last, brought an action against Henry Randall, her commander, claiming damages in $20,000, for assault and false imprisonment.

On the evening of Jan. 10, while the messenger of Adams & Co.'s Express was crossing the plank that led from the steamer New World to her wharf, it slipped from its fastenings, and precipitated him into the water. He carried down a bag of gold dust, valued at $26,000, which was recovered a day or two afterwards, with the help of a sub-marine armor, being found imbedded in the mud to the depth of three feet. The party recovering it, demanded and received the exorbitant sum of $3,000.

A dreadful tragedy was recently enacted at Perry's Camp, on the Calaveras River. A difficulty originated at a fandango, at which Americans and Mexicans were gathered. Knives were drawn, and pistols fired, and the affray resulted in the killing of Alexander McDowell, and the wounding of James Pagmall. The next day, the Americans, being terribly exasperated, captured two of the Mexicans known to have been concerned in the fight, and after a trial hung them at 8 o'clock in the evening.

A Settlers' and Miners' Convention has assembled in Sacramento, and has continued in session from day to day. A series of resolutions were adopted, setting forth the views of the Convention relative to the disposition proper to be made of the mineral and agricultural lands of the State. They claim that the public domain should be donated to actual settlers, in parcels of 160 acres; that, in the settlement of private land claims, "it is the duty of Government to give no more vitality to any concession or grant than it already possesses," under the Mexican law, and that no latitude should be given in the confirmation of such grants; that the Board of Land Commissioners should not receive the former customs of California as evidence in the settlement of titles; that the swamp and tule lands should in no instance be granted in large quantities; that, in regard to city and town lots, actual occupants should have the right to purchase at nominal rates.

European News.

The steamer Canada, with four days later news from Europe, arrived at New York on the 18th inst.

England is still excited with the apprehension of a French invasion.

Lord Normandy has resigned his post as Ambassador in Paris, which he has held for six years. Lord Cowley, Minister at Frankfort, will succeed to the post which is become vacant by the resignation of the Marquis of Normandy.

Intelligence has been received from Christchurch, that the port life-boat of the unfortunate steamship Amazon was picked up and taken into Christchurch, and now remains in charge of the Coast Guard at that port. It will be recollected, that both the larboard and starboard life-boats forward were stated to be on fire by many of the survivors who have already reached England; it is supposed, therefore, that the boat at Christchurch is the one in which Lieut. Grylls and his party succeeded in getting clear of the Amazon, and has been sent adrift either from the Dutch galliot which picked up the party in the Bay of Biscay, or from the revenue cutter which received the 13 persons from the Dutch vessel, and took them into Plymouth. The mail bags of the unfortunate steamer Amazon, have been washed ashore.

Another shocking colliery explosion has occurred at Ringley, near Manchester, resulting in the immediate death of three colliers, besides 14 others more or less burnt, of whom two are at the point of death, and three others in a dangerous state. In all, 17 persons have suffered from this sad occurrence.

There had been a great strike of the laborers in the iron trades. They had held a meeting to take such measures for their future support as might be deemed necessary.

A document has been published, showing that in one shape or other the Duke of Wellington has received £2,613,675 of the public money, including interest on £769,000 Parliamentary grants. His Grace now holds six public offices, the pay for which amounts to £8,365 15*s*. per annum.

From France we have repetitions of the accounts of arrests for political offenses.

By the decrees of the President of the French Republic confiscating the property of the Orleans family, the children of his majesty the King of the Belgians, are deprived of an income of 400,000f.

A letter dated at St. Petersburgh, Jan. 11, in the Hamburg Borsenhalle, of Jan. 23, says: By an imperial ukase, the exportation of corn from every port of the Empire is prohibited until further orders.

Seven Days Later.—The steamer Cambria, with European news to Feb. 7th, arrived at Halifax on the 20th inst.

The British Parliament was formally opened by the Queen in person, on the 3d inst., when she delivered a very pretty speech, containing, as usual, but little information, except that her country is very prosperous, and her people very happy.

In the House of Commons, Sir Benjamin Hall asked for an explanation of the causes of Lord Palmerston's resignation, which the Premier immediately gave, asserting that Lord Palmerston was refractory—treated the Queen's interrogations with contemptuous silence—acted independently of his colleagues—and unreservedly approved the recent illegal coup d'etat of Louis Napoleon. To this Palmerston replied at some length.

Nothing of moment had taken place in the House of Lords.

A most awful disaster had taken place at a quarry at Holmsforth, in Yorkshire, by the bursting of a reservoir, by which from sixty to one hundred persons lost their lives, and damage to a great extent had been done to the factories in the neighborhood. The late heavy flood is the cause assigned for the disaster.

A movement in favor of the liberation of the Irish exiles was going forward in the chief cities and towns in the south and west.

Father Mathew had been seriously indisposed, but the last advices left him convalescent.

Affairs in France continued quiet. The confiscation of the Orleans property had called forth an energetic protest from the executors of Louis Philippe. The Abbe Lacordaire and M. Laersdiere, two of the most popular French preachers, had received orders to leave France. Paris letters state that spies are present at all social festivals. The second Court Martial, sitting at Lyons, had condemned a commercial traveler, named Guillet, to two years' imprisonment, and a fine of ten thousand francs, for using abusive language toward the President.

Accounts from Spain state that an attempt had been made on the life of the Queen. On the 2d of February, she took her first airing since her confinement, and was on her way to the Church of De Allocha, to be churched, when an assassin fired a pistol at her, the ball from which struck the Queen's shoulder. He was arrested. The last accounts state that the Queen was progressing favorably.

Steamboats between New York and Albany.—All the steamboats belonging to the People's Line are now undergoing repairs and alterations. They are to be newly furnished and otherwise improved to keep up with the fashions of the day. The owners, in anticipation of a formidable opposition from the rival railroads now connecting this city with Albany, intend, on the opening of the river, to submit for the inspection of the public six commodious and magnificent vessels, equal to any in the world, either in point of beauty of structure, elegance of furniture and equipment, or speed. These boats will form three daily lines between New York and Albany. The 7 A. M. line will be composed of the New World and the Alida. The 7 P. M. line Rip Van Winkle and the Oregon. It is intended that these boats shall carry emigrants and freight. The railroad or express line will leave Albany at 8 P. M., on the arrival of the Western trains, and New York at 7 P. M. This line will consist of the Isaac Newton and the Hendrick Hudson, and will carry only first class passengers and no freight. From the improvements in the machinery of the night boats, together with new boilers, it is expected that they will be able to make the run one hour and a half quicker than they made it last season. We learn that it is the intention to put the fare at fifty cents on the opening, and to keep it at that during the entire season.

Fruits meet for Repentance.—The Pennsylvanian says that Mr. Lucius B. Cobden, a hotel-keeper in South Twelfth-st., Philadelphia, has, under the influence of the present temperance movement, become a consistent teetotaler, and resolves to sell no more of the "ardent." To show that he really is in earnest, he made a general crash and smash of his liquor utensils Wednesday morning, on the pavement before his front door. Casks of Jamaica, apple-brandy, old rye and plebian whisky; bottles of prime Cognac, port, claret and champaigne; decanters, dimi johns, tumblers and wine glasses, with everything else breakable, were reduced to a fragmentary or atomic condition.

SUMMARY.

Mr. H. N. Houghton, of Bergen, New Jersey, has taken measures to secure a patent for a bridge to extend over navigable rivers, and to avoid all the objections heretofore brought against such structures. The Scientific American of the 14th inst. contains a plan and description of this bridge. The nature of the invention consists in erecting piers of a great hight, and placing a double track railroad on the same, sufficiently high to allow the masts of ships to pass freely underneath during the highest freshets or tides. A suspension carriage (or carriages) is employed; it is hung to run on the track above, and the platform of it is hung so far below the track on the piers, as to allow persons and carriages to pass on the suspension carriage or platform, from the main track, and to be propelled to the other side.

A gentleman in Charleston, is said to have made a valuable discovery in the art of Daguerreotyping. The advantage claimed for a picture taken by the new process is, that it requires no glass to protect it, inasmuch as it is covered with a transparent enameled surface, which renders the picture impervious to the effects of the atmosphere, and less liable to be rubbed off; in fact, the more friction that is used on the surface, the brighter and clearer the picture becomes, and so durable is it that it can be sent in a letter any distance, without the possibility of its being scratched or defaced.

A trial about the right of property in a calf, lately took place at Burlington, Iowa. The difficulty lay in the color of the calf's tail; the witnesses of the plantiff swore the tail was white; those of the defendant, that it was black. The Court was occupied two days with the case; the jury staid out till midnight, and could not agree, and a new trial is to be had; the costs amount to $300.

The Augusta (Me.) Farmer says that two barrels marked "new corn meal" came into the depot in that city, by Carpenter's express, directed to no one. Marshal Jones, happening to be round, thought that it looked like a suspicious heap. "It may be meal," said he, "but there can be no harm in examining into it." Accordingly he waited upon the Express man, and took the barrels into his own custody. On opening them each one contained another barrel surrounded by a little "new corn meal"—one of them full of rum, and the other full of brandy. As they were directed to nobody, nobody has lost any thing.

Mortimer Livingston, F. W. Edmonds, Auguste Belmont, Watts Sherman, and Alfred Pell, have been appointed trustees to obtain subscriptions to the amount of $200,000, for the purpose of erecting a building for the World's Fair, to be held in this City. Two classes of subscribers are provided for: One, those who subscribe solely with a view to promote the enterprise, seeking no other profit; these are to have their money refunded from the first receipts of the exhibition. The other class are subscribers for personal profit, being entitled, in proportion to their subscriptions, to one-half the profits of the exhibition.

An Association has been formed under the title of "The New York and Liberia Emigration and Agricultural Association," by a part of the colored population of this City, numbering in all 250 members. The object they have in view is the promotion of emigration and agriculture in the Republic of Liberia. To carry out their plans for the amelioration of their race, they are in need of funds, and have petitioned Congress for an appropriation of $25,000, to be expended by the Society in purchasing land, and fitting out and preparing emigrants for the Republic.

Hon. John E. Hinman, Mayor of Utica, N. Y., has issued an address to the citizens, warning them of the dangers of incendiarism, which still continue, notwithstanding the terrible fate of one of the convicted. The Mayor says, that since the burning of the planing machine, September 20, 1851, (4½ months,) there have been eleven fires—all but one the work of incendiaries; that the fire brigade and the most respected citizens who co-operate with them, are insulted by rowdies and obstructed in their work, &c.

Messrs. James G. King & Sons paid a few days ago, we understand, $250,000, on account of the purchase by English capitalists of the Mariposa Estate of Col. Fremont. The purchase was concluded and completed on 31st January last, between Mr. E. Flandin, the agent of Col. Fremont, and Mr. Denny Sargent, the agent of the purchasers. Col. Benton acted as Attorney for Col. Fremont. An agent has been sent to California to take possession. The tract of land disposed of by Col. Fremont measures 45,000 acres.

A Mr. Nichols has just gained a verdict of $3,300 against the Auburn and Syracuse Railroad as damages for an injury to Mrs. Nichols, by a collision which happened on the Railroad between Auburn and Syracuse, nearly four years since. Mrs. N. was injured on the back part of her head, but at the time it was thought so slightly that nothing serious would result from it. Subsequently, however, it was found that she had sustained a severe injury, for very soon after the accident she became a raving maniac, and has continued insane ever since.

Several of the Jurors in the late Forrest Divorce Case have had their shillings, which they received as their reward for about thirty-five days' labor, polished, engraved, and mounted as watch-seals. One man has on his shilling, "Kept in memorial of the innocence of Mrs. Forrest." Another has: "The reward for thirty-five days' service as a Juror in the case of Forrest vs. Forrest."

A dispatch dated Cincinnati, Thursday, Feb. 19, 1852, says the Ladies' Hungarian Association, to the number of 800, assembled to-day in the saloon of the Burnet House, and were presented to Kossuth. Mrs. Telfor addressed Kossuth on the part of the Association, and presented him with $800. He made an appropriate reply. To-morrow Kossuth is to be presented with $1,400 by an Association of Germans.

In a new edition of the regulations of the Post-Office, about to be published, it is provided, that in every case where the writer of a letter chooses to protect it from the chance of being opened at the Department, and destroyed as a dead letter, he can do so by prepaying the postage, and writing legibly on the sealed side the words "to be preserved," in which case it will be rescued from the liability of being committed to the flames, and its seal with remain intact.

A colored man entered an omnibus in Charleston, S. C., the other night. At the conclusion of his ride he handed his "fip" to the driver, who, discovering the complexion of his "fare" by the hand, held the door fast by the strap, drove around to the office of the Captain of the guard, and gave him in charge, to await the sentence to be awarded his offense by the Mayor.

A month or two since, a little girl in Boston fell, striking the side of her head, near the forehead, on a stone. The injury was thought to be slight; but she soon found her sight growing defective, until now she is nearly if not totally blind. It is supposed the optic nerves were injured by the blow.

The supply of Mexican Land Warrants in this market, is reduced to a very limited number, which are held at $120 to $130. There is, however, but small demand, as all parties are waiting for the passage of the bill making the new warrants assignable.

The Opinione of Turin, of the 12th, publishes a sentence of the court-martial sitting at Modena, by which seventeen persons convicted of robbery were condemned to death. It adds that the sentence was executed on the spot.

DIED.

At his residence, near Meadville, Pa., on the 7th of November last, Deacon Lewis Dunham, in the 60th year of his age. Bro. D. was a highly valued member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hayfield, Pa., and continued, to the day of his death, to cherish a lively interest in its welfare. He had been in declining health for some years, but was not supposed to be in any immediate danger. The day he died, he was apparently better than usual. A short time after tea, while seated in his chair, he discovered that he was bleeding at the lungs, and made the remark, "I am bleeding again." His family gathered around him immediately, and, in answer to the inquiry if any thing could be done for him, he replied, "Nothing, I am going." He leaned his head on the arm of Mrs. D., and expired without a struggle. He leaves a numerous family, and a large circle of friends, to mourn his death.

At Potter Hill, R. I., on the 17th inst., after a brief illness of fever, George Potter, only son of Joseph Potter, aged 29 years.

The Sabbath Recorder,

Published Weekly.

Terms—$2 00 per Annum, in advance.

The Sabbath Recorder is devoted to the exposition and vindication of the views and movements of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. It aims to promote vital piety and vigorous benevolent action, at the same time that it urges obedience to the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus. Its columns are open to the advocacy of all reformatory measures, which seem likely to improve the condition of society, diffuse knowledge, reclaim the inebriate, and enfranchise the enslaved. In its Literary and Intelligence Departments, care is taken to furnish matter adapted to the wants and tastes of every class of readers. As a Religious and Family Newspaper, it is intended that the Recorder shall rank among the best.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Wm. Dunn & Co. have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Two Living Aztec Children.

A NEW AND ABSOLUTELY UNIQUE RACE OF MANKIND.—The most extraordinary and inexplicable phenomena that the history of the human race has yet produced, can be seen for a few weeks at the large Exhibition Room of the Society Library, corner of Broadway and Leonard-street. They were recently taken from a newly-discovered and idolatrous people in Central America, by whom they were kept with superstitious veneration, distinct and secluded as a caste of their priesthood, and employed as Mimes and Bacchanals in their Pagan ceremonies and worship.

They are male and female. The latter measuring 29½ inches in height, weighing 17 lbs.; the former is 33 inches high, and weighs 20 lbs.

From repeated and careful examination, the best Physiologists state the older to be 12 or 13 years of age; the younger about 10 years.

They differ altogether from examples of the dwarf kind, and from children; affording complete and undeniable illustration of a Piamean variety of the Human Race!

Tickets of Admission 25 cents. Children under 10 years, half price. Season Tickets, $1 00. Doors open each day, from 11 until 1, and from 7 until 9 o'clock. dec184t

Miscellaneous.

Louis Napoleon.

Charles Louis Napoleon, now President of France, is the son of Louis Bonaparte, (a brother of the Emperor,) and of Hortense Beuharnias, daughter of Josephine Beuharnias, who subsequently became wife of Napoleon and Empress of France. It will be seen, therefore, how intimately he is allied with that period which all Frenchmen still revert to as the best days of their greatness and glory. He was born at Paris on the 20th of April, 1808, and is consequently now nearly 44 years of age. He was a special favorite of his uncle, the Emperor, who, while fondling him on his knee, used to charge him that his first duty was to him, and his second to France. He spent a great portion of his youth among the mountains of Switzerland, with his unfortunate mother. Having obtained a general and military education in these romantic valleys, with military comrades, the exciting news of revolution awakened his youthful ambition. Escaping from Austrian clutches in the brief Italian movement of 1831, he returned to his studies until his restless ambition drove him from private life to scenes of insurrection and revolution. On the 30th of October, 1831, he raised the standard of unsuccessful revolt before the walls of the French frontier town of Strasbourg. For this act of insubordination the government banished him to America. He was brought to our shores by a French ship of war; but immediately on his arrival here he took passage to England. He resided alternately at London and with his mother in Switzerland.

In 1840, France was again under the influence of one of those popular frenzies which seem to seize upon it periodically, the cause of the excitement being the expected arrival of the remains of the Emperor from St. Helena. Availing himself of the Napoleonic fever thus originated, Louis Napoleon resolved to land in France, effect a revolution, and drive out the Orleans family. On Sunday, the 14th of August, 1840, the steamer "City of Edinburgh," a small chartered vessel, dropped down the Thames from London, with what seemed a pleasure party of foreigners on board. It was the party of the Quixotic adventures of Louis Napoleon. On the 6th they landed near Boulogne. This act of folly soon terminated in their capture; and being brought to trial before the Chamber of Peers, they were found guilty, and condemned to various terms of imprisonment. Prince Louis was sentenced for life, and, with the Court Montholon, was sent to the Fortress of Ham. From this prison he escaped in the guise of a common laborer, on the 25th of May, 1846. Soon after the escaping of the Prince, the other prisoners were liberated and their offense soon forgotten.

Scarcely had the Revolution of February, 1848, occurred, when rising from their haunts in all parts of Europe, the various members of the Bonaparte family hurried to the scene of action. France received them with open arms. The result of the general election of France, on the 10th of December, 1848, is well known. The Strasbourg and Boulogne adventurer, the former prisoner of Ham, was raised by the suffrages of five millions of people to the Presidency of the French Republic.

Eventful as his history has thus far been, recent occurrences indicate that another and a still more eventful chapter is yet to follow.

The Spider.

One day a spider fell by accident into a large glass vase, which had laid for a long time forgotten in a library. It was a large domestic spider, with a large oval abdomen, and its blackish back was marked with two longitudinal lines of yellow spots. The animal, caught in the transparent snare, began to run around the bottom of its prison with all the rapidity of its eight feet. When it ascertained that no mode of egress was to be thus found, it tried to climb the clear, slippery walls of its cage, but its sharp crooked claws greatly resembling those of lions and tigers, slided on the smooth crystal; and, after spending a quarter of an hour in a useless struggle, the spider fell back, fatigued and discouraged into the middle of the vase. The owner of the library, feeling curious to ascertain how the matter would end, removed the vase and its tenant to a shady corner, where he could watch the latter without disturbing her. She remained immovable, coiled up, and to all appearance dead, until nightfall. Then the observer, who was reclining in his arm-chair, heard a gentle rustling noise proceeding from the vase. He approached it with a light, and instantly the spider resumed the appearance of death. He therefore deferred watching the prisoner until the following morning. When he visited her then, he found the bottom of the vase and the sides all around to the height of an inch, variegated with myriads of small, rough, white, spots, placed at almost geometrical distances. The spider was reposing in the center.

On the following day silver threads were drawn from the white points, and formed the warp of the web; on the third morning the woof was interlaced, and the delicate fabric, strengthened at regular spaces by additional threads, covered the whole bottom of the vase.

After all her toil, the poor spider herself was still without a lodging. She had a carpet on which she could walk in comfort, and a hunting net spread out, but still she wanted an apartment for retirement and a bed for repose. With great difficulty and patience, she succeeded in affixing to four or five threads placed above her web about thirty of the little white spots which I have already mentioned. These formed the ridge of a roof sloping towards the web, and which was interlaced with such a multitude of fine silky threads, that it at length became a retreat impervious to the eye, and even to the moisture. Some drops of water thrown on it rolled harmlessly off, and fell like wandering pearls on the horizontal web, when they gradually evaporated. The spider had drawn threads to the length, according to calculation, of two thousand feet, from six little orifices in the abdomen, which secreted a grayish liquid, transformed instantaneously by contact with the air into silken threads, pliant, and of marvelous solidity, especially when we consider their extreme tenuity. A spider's line, if not broken by a jerk, will sustain a weight of one twelfth of an ounce!

As soon as her establishment was finished, our friend spent her days and nights near the mouth of her den, watching with unexampled patience for the arrival of some chance of prey All in vain! Files were still scarce, and besides, there was nothing within the vase to attract them. Two months passed thus, and the poor prisoner grew extremely thin. At length one day, touched with compassion, the observer caught a fly, and threw it on the web, where it struggled violently. Then the famished spider hastened toward it, seized it adoritly with her eight paws, chocked it between her powerful crooked jaws, and retired with it into her den. An hour afterwards she came out, carrying the relics of the fly, which she threw into the remotest corner of her web, and covered them over with a tissue vail, so as to conceal this miniature charnel-house from sight.

Every day, at the same hour, the master of the library threw a fly into the vase, and the spider repeated her former manœuvers, with this difference, that she soon ceased to show any symptom of alarm when the hand of her feeder approached her.

After some time, instead of waiting until he had withdrawn, she used to start instantly on her prey, and eat it on the spot, without caring to retreat into her den. Curious to ascertain how far this familiarity would extend, he held a fly by the wing, and offered it to the spider. On the first occassion she retreated terrified, and hid herself in her nest; but the next day, being pressed by hunger, she seized the fly from between her purveyor's fingers, and carried it off. After ten similar experiments, she became so tame that she fearlessly sucked the fly while still held by its captor.

At length, when her master offered his finger, she used to creep on it, and thus leave the vase. She would run up his arm, and across his breast, and take a fly from his other hand, which he used to extend as far off as possible.

The naturalist became very fond of his guest, and in order to try further experiments, he one day caught a fine male spider, and placed him carefully on the edge of the web. Presently the lady of the land came out of her mansion, and advanced towards him; he also came forward, when suddenly he paused with manifest tokens of fear. The cruel dame rushed on him like a lioness on her prey, caught him, strangled him, and finished by devouring him!

Her master, curious to ascertain whether this piece of barbarity was the result of particular aversion to this ill-fated male, threw a second into the vase. Alas! he shared the fate of his predecessors; and during a month this feminine cannibal lived on the bodies of her destined mates. At the end of that time, she grew tired of eating spiders, but not of killing them, and returned to her natural fly diet with evident pleasure.

No feeling of remorse seemed to trouble the enjoyment of this ruthless murderess; but the hour of retribution arrived.

One fine summer morning, the library window being left open, a swallow flew into the room, hovered over the vase, saw the spider, and, with one vigorous dart of his beak, left the naturalist to lament the loss of his interesting pet and companion. Justice compels us to add, however, that his experiments savored too much of cruelty.

Marl as an Ameliorator of the Soil.

Marl is a compound of the carbonate of lime mixed with clay, silica, shells, and other inorganic substances in various proportions. The matters intermingled and the amount of each determine its quality and value, and give rise to the several names by which it is known. The calcareous marls are those containing the most carbonate of lime, and consequently the richest kind. Marl, properly so called, has about half its weight in calcareous substances. Clayey marl is that which contains three or four times as much clay as marl, and marly clay, is that which has but a small portion of calcareous carbonate. The marls are also distinguished by their colors —white, gray, blue, &c.—and there are numerous varieties besides those above named, which it is unnecessary to describe.

Marl, like lime, strictly speaking, is not a manure. When added to the soil its acts as an ameliorator in improving its texture and modifying its natural condition, rather than by giving materials for the growth of vegetation. Its action upon the soil and the benefits derived from its application, are akin to those of lime, for it is in fact, but the carbonate of lime reduced to powder, and mixed with earthy matter. It slakes and expands when exposed to the air, and in common with lime, possesses the property of rendering stiff soils friable and easier of cultivation, and of giving more compactness to those too sandy and light. It also promotes the decomposition of vegetable matter, neutralizes acids, and induces the formation of the nitrates requisite to the highest fertility. It gives activity to the inert vegetable matters often present in barren soils, as its successful employment in the renovation of over-cropped and worn-out lands in many districts in this country, particularly along the sea-board and in the South-Western States most abundantly prove.

This substance cannot always be distinguished by the eye alone, but its tests are very simple and can readily be applied. The presence of calcareous matter in any soil is shown by its effervescence upon the application of an acid. Common vinegar will produce this effect. But to ascertain the amount of carbonate of lime in any specimen of marl or earth, we take a set of delicate scales, and after drying, without hardening, one hundred grains of the earth to be tried, put in a vessel with water sufficient to crumble it to the consistence of naturally moist earth. Upon this a few drops of nitric acid are thrown, and the mixture worked over with a wooden spatula —effervescence immediately takes place, and the carbonic acid gas escapes. This last is replaced by the nitric acid, which then forms nitrate of lime. This nitrate has the property of remaining suspended in water, and may by successive washings be removed from the earthy matter, which, in the process, should be allowed to settle at the bottom of the vessel. The residuum is nothing more than clay and silica, the weight of which, as compared with the quantity submitted to the test, will determine the proportion of calcareous matter present in the marl—the carbonic acid gas and lime composing it having been removed by the process.

Upon calcareous soils, marl would, of course, be of little benefit unless the clayey kinds were used as a corrective and ameliorator of the lighter sands. In this case, so large a quantity would need be added that the expense would generally prevent the application. Upon all soils which would be improved by the application of lime, there is no question but marl may be used with immediate and important benefits. It is found in many places in this State, and its cheapness —as it is to be procured at the mere cost of digging and carting—should incite to its use, that we may test, by actual experiment, whether it will produce the effects here which it has in other localities.

As to the amount to be applied, sandy lands need much less than clayey, and it is upon the latter that it produces the most decided effect. From twenty to sixty wagon loads per acre, are generally employed. It is best applied when it can be drawn out in the fall or winter and left in heaps until spring, as then it can be spread more easily and evenly over the surface.

Going to California.

'All the world' seems bent on a trip to the Gold Region. If there were steamship accommodation on the Panama and Nicaragua lines for taking fifty thousand passengers through in the course of the next two months, we believe it would all be eagerly taken up. An immense army will this year cross the Plains and the Sierra; and, though many will perish or stop on the way, we cannot estimate the emigrants during 1852 to California at less than one hundred thousand; and, should means of transportation be provided, and the news from the Pacific continue cheering, it may even exceed that number.

—We believe in California, and always did. Our judgment was early made up and proclaimed, that its product of gold would exceed that of any other country known to History. We believe it has in the main a good climate and an abundance of fruitful soil, though it has probably more that is rugged and impracticable. And we do not doubt that, for those who go well prepared and provided, there are as good chances in California now as there ever were. Yet the rage of the Fever at present is rather appalling. What are all these thousands to do in California? Gold-washing must, in the nature of things, grow less and less productive: there will be rich 'pockets' and 'holes' for years yet; but a good deal of the ground has been gone over, and fifty thousand diggers in 1852 can hardly hope to average as much of the shining sand as five thousand did in 1849. Many will do well; but washing must naturally grow less fruitful and more precarious. Quartz Mining, or rock-chrushing, seems to be generally doing very well; but there will hardly be one set of adequate machinery in the Gold Region this summer to every thousand gold-seekers. How are all the rest to be employed?

We do not doubt the luck of a strong, willing, two-handed man, who knows how to chop, team, plow, dig, blast, &c., and can do three or four of them well. A first-rate blacksmith, sawyer, carpenter or builder, who can turn his hand readily to something else where his own trade happens to be glutted, will be apt to get along. But we hear of men setting out for California who have never been able to hold their own here, and who have very little rough and ready capacity for manual labor. Most of these, we apprehend, will rue the day they left their Atlantic homes. Even dainty women are trying to get across, with the idea that there must be chances for them to make fortunes on the Sacramento. So there may be; but for any but the stoutest sort of rugged workers, who can cook, wash, make beds, mend clothes, and don't mind doing each exposed to a burning sun or a pouring rain—for the miners' houses in the diggings are often very primitive—we fear California will prove anything but an Eden.

Friends all over the country! be careful! Remember that 'all is not gold that glitters.' If you don't know how to make a good living here, we fear you will hardly improve your condition by crossing the continent. Do not go empty-handed; do not trust blindly to luck; and do not fancy yourselves ruined if obliged to stay on this side. There are very good 'placers' even here for those who know how and are willing to work. Try one!

Interesting Incident.

On the afternoon of the 30th ult., Kossuth, though in feeble health, addressed the citizens of Alleghany City, Pa., in the Associate Reformed Church of that city, Rev. Dr. Pressley's. At the close of his (Kossuth's) address, the Rev. Doctor rose and said that some months ago a lady, a member of his congregation, had named a child after Gov. Kossuth, at a time when she had entertained no expectation of ever having the happpiness of seeing him. She wished now that the child might be presented to him. Gov. Kossuth expressing the pleasure which it would afford him, the little stranger—"Louis Kossuth Johnston"—apparently about six months old, was brought forward, and very affectionately received by Kossuth, who said, in a tone of the deepest feeling: May he be wiser—may he be happier than his namesake. But one pride I am permitted to feel. May he love his country as I love mine—love justice and freedom as I, and be honest as I, before God, believe that I am.

The enthusiasm of the audience at this point could no longer be repressed, but manifested itself in the tears of the women and the applause of the men. At the close of this affecting incident the meeting dispersed.

English Luxury.

Few of us, whose lives are passed in republican simplicity, have any definite idea of the amount of wealth and splendor that surrounds many of the English nobles in their princely residences. An intelligent American, writing from England, describes some of these things.

The Earl of Spencer's homestead, about sixty miles from London, comprises ten thousand acres, tastefully divided into parks, meadows, pastures, woods, and gardens. His library, called the finest private library in the world, contains fifty thousand volumes. Extensive and elegant stables, green-houses and conservatories, gamekeeper's house, dairy house, dog-kennels, porter's lodge, and farm-houses without number, go to complete the establishment. Hundreds of sheep and cattle graze in the parks about the house.

The Duke of Richmond's home farm, at Goodwood, sixty miles from London, consists of twenty-three thousand acres, or over thirty-five square miles. And this in crowded England, which has a population of sixteen millions, and an area of fifty thousand square miles, or just thirty-two millions of acres, giving, were the land divided, but two acres to each inhabitant. The residence of the Duke is a perfect palace. One extensive hall is covered with yellow silk and pictures in the richest and most costly tapestry. The dishes and plates upon the table are all of porcelain, silver, and gold. Twenty-five race-horse stand in the stable, each being assigned to the care of a special groom. A grotto near the house, the ladies spent six years in adorning. An aviary is supplied with almost every variety of rare and elegant birds. Large herds of cattle, sheep, and deer are spread over the immense lawns.

The Duke of Devonshire's place, at Chatsworth, is said to excel in magnificence any other in the kingdom. The income of the Duke is one million of dollars a year, and he is said to spend it all. In the grounds about the house are kept four hundred head of cattle, and fourteen hundred deer. The kitchen-garden contains twelve acres, and is filled with almost every species of fruit and vegetables A vast arboretum connected with the establishment is designed to contain a sample of every tree that grows. There is also a glass conservatory, 387 feet in length, 112 in breadth, 67 in hight, covered by seventy-six thousand square feet of glass, and warmed by seven miles of pipe conveying hot water. One plant was obtained from India by a special messenger, and is valued at ten thousand dollars. One of the fountains near the house plays 276 feet high—said to be the highest jet in the world. Chatsworth contains thirty-five hundred acres, but the Duke owns ninety-six thousand acres in the county of Derbyshire. Within, the entire is one vast scene of paintings, sculpture, mosaic-works, carved wainscoting, and all the elegancies and luxuries within the reach of almost boundless wealth and highly refined taste.

Buckwheat as Manure—Wire-Worm.

The following experiment, communicated by a Pennsylvanian farmer to the Germantown Telegraph, shows most conclusively the value of buckwheat as an ameliorator of exhausted soils. This crop is said also to effect the destruction of wire-worms, when grown upon soils in which they abound.

"Last season I broke up about one acre of light, poor, sward land, which had been so much exhausted by long cropping as not to repay the expense of fencing and tillage by the scanty and meagre crop which it produced, when worked with the greatest care. It was ploughed just as the grass was in blossom, rolled, harrowed thoroughly, and sowed in buckwheat, half a bushel to the acre. As soon as the grain commenced blossoming, the roller was taken on, and the crop rolled or laid for ploughing in. This was performed with two horses, and the ground again rolled, harrowed, and suffered to remain till last spring, when it was limed lightly, and sowed with oats. The crop was remarkably fine, and much more vigorous than the same kind of grain, sowed about the same time, on land considered much richer, and in better heart.

"The experiment will, by its result, go far to confirm the belief that old soils, which have become almost hopelessly and irremediably worn out, may, by this process, be rendered speedily productive. There are, probably, in this State, thousands and tens of thousands of acres of arable soil, which are annually becoming poorer, and which require the adoption of some process to secure them from utter sterility and ruin. By ploughing in some green crop, say buckwheat, clover, green corn, or millet, and cropping judiciously for a few years, such lands will be vastly improved, in my opinion, and rendered fit for a course of culture which will secure ample profits to the owner, and without any very heavy outlay for labor or manure."

Newspaper Debts.—In a case recently tried in Philadelphia, where a suit was brought by the Germantown Telegraph against a subscriber, for twelve years' subscription, the Judge charged the jury, as reported by the Philadelphia papers, as follows:—

"When a person subscribes for a paper, and give directions where it shall be left, he is bound to pay for it, unless he prescribes the time for which it shall be left. If a subscriber wishes to discontinue the paper, it is his duty to square his accounts and then give notice of a discontinuance. If a paper is sent to a person through the post office, and he takes it out, he is bound to pay for it. If a subscriber changes his residence, it does not follow that the carrier must take notice of it; and a delivery of the paper at the place where he was directed to leave it, is a delivery to the subscriber, unless the publisher receives notice to discontinue or send it to another place."

A Word to Young Men.—Of the three modes of using tobacco, smoking is that which seems to have insinuated itself most extensively among the youth of our community. Tobacco employed in this way, being drawn in with the vital breath, conveys its poisonous influences into ever part of the lungs. There the noxious fluid is entangled in the minute spongy air-cells, and has time to exert its pernicious influence on the blood—not in vivifying but in vitiating it. The blood imbibes the stimulant narcotic principle and circulates it through the whole system. It produces, in consequence, a febrile action in those of delicate habits. Where there is any tendency to phthisis and the tubercular desposit in the lungs, debility of these organs, consequent on the use of tobacco in this way, must favor the deposit of tuberculous matter, and thus sow the seeds of consumption. This practice impairs the natural taste and relish for food, lessens the appetite, and weakens the powers of the stomach.

Statistics of Labor in Paris.—The following are a few facts lately pointed out by M. Blanqui, in his last lecture on Political Economy, at the Conservatoir des Arts et Metiers, where he is a Professor of that science. Parisian industry produces annually from fourteen to fifteen hundred millions of francs' worth of goods of various species. There are 325 principal branches of industry, 64,000 patented masters, 342,530 workpeople, of whom 204,000 are men, 112,000 women, and 26,530 children. Proceeding then to the study of special branches of industry, the Professor noticed that of bronze work, unrivaled in the world, and producing twenty millions; hat making, sixteen millions; glove making, fourteen millions. The wages vary among this immense population of workpeople from twenty centimes (2d.) a day to from 35f. to 40f. (from 28s. to 32s.) The average wages are 3f. 80 (3s 2d.) a day for a man, and for a woman 1f. 65 (1s 4½d.)

The greatest number of bushels of Wheat produced by any one county of Ohio in 1850, was 1,314,741. The greatest number of bushels of Corn, was 2,918,958. Brown was the banner county for Wheat, and Ross for Corn.

VARIETY.

A letter in the Richmond Times states that a few days ago, while several men were engaged in blasting out limestone, near Buchanan, Botetourt County, they discovered a cave, with a entrance of some six or eight feet in height, and upwards of one hundred long, with two apartments. In the first they found some earthenware, and a large stone cross; on the cross there was some carving, but it was so much defaced by the hand of time, that it was scarcely discernable. A number of citizens, with a lantern subsequently entered the second apartment, where they found a skeleton seated on a large iron chest, with its back resting against the wall. On opening this chest they found it to contain gold coin, perfectly smooth on one side, and a cross with some characters on it on the other. The gold in the chest by weight is worth seven hundred and eighty-three dollars.

A report will soon be presented to the Imperial Geological Society of Vienna relative to the production of Gold in Austria. Austria produces the most gold of any European State. It amounts yearly to 7,500 marks, which promises a sum of 603,000 ducats. Much of this is obtained by the Gipseys by sand-washing in Hungary and Siebenburgen. There are two ways in which the gold is found—one is in the deposits of sand and soil; the other in the strata of ore. The latter is the most common method of finding it in Hungary and Siebenburgen. A famous place for finding it in Hungary, is near Weisskirchen, where, by the Convent of Slatiska, a piece of gold was found, weighing ¾ of a mark, and worth 62 ducats. The Gipseys are very clumsy in gold-getting.

A Gibraltar letter from John E. Gowan, of Boston, contractor for raising the remains of the U. S. steamer Missouri, which took fire and sunk at Gibraltar in 1843, says that the work is going on successfully. By a series of submarine explosions he had deepened the water to such an extent that any vessel can now float over the wreck with perfect safety, although, when he arrived, there was not over two feet of water above various portions of machinery, such as wheels, cranks, shaft, and the timbers of the sunken vessel. He has removed nearly all her machinery, and is now rapidly breaking the hull in pieces, and hoisting them to the surface of the water.

Elder Knapp, while preaching recently in Rockford, Illinois, observed many of his congregation sleeping. He stopped in his sermon, and requested the deacons to pass the contribution boxes, saying that he learned the society had not yet raised money enough to pay for the new bell, adding that there were some there who he knew would like to pay for their lodging, the usual price of which was twenty-five cents. About forty dollars were raised. He then finished his sermon.

A melancholy accident occurred lately in Venice. The Hercules of a Circus Troupe performing there was in the habit of holding three men upon his shoulders, in the form of a pyramid. One evening he unfortunately tripped, lost his balance, and the highest man of all fell violently to the stage, struck his head, and was instantly killed; the second was fatally injured in his breast, and a frightful panic ensued among the spectators. The victims were fathers of children whom they have educated to the same profession.

Representations have been made by a cultivator in the Rhine Provinces, that he has in his garden a bulbous plant called the Russian Potato, four or five feet in hight, and yielding a third more sugar than the beet-root. It is of inestimable value to a region unfavorable to the growth of the beet, and it is afforded at a much cheaper rate. Measures are taking to bring it into notice.

By far the greatest Plank Road project in this country, says The Detroit Tribune, is that from Milwaukie to Mackinac, through the Counties Saginaw, Midland, Gladwin, Clare, Missaukee Omena, Calkasca, Antrim, Charlevox and Sheboygan. The line of said road is some two hundred miles long, extending through an unbroken wilderness.

The value of the taxable property of the Territory of Minnesota, returned by the Assessors, is between $1,200,000 and $1,300,000, and has increased fifty per cent. within the last year. About 80,000 acres of land have been entered, in one form or another, at the Land Office during the same time.

The amount of specie manifested at the Custom-House, and shipped from San Francisco for the six months ending Dec. 31, 1851, was $24,234,155. The amount of duties collected during the same time was $1,012,128. During the last six months of the year 1851, the clearances exceeded the arrivals by 51,006 tuns.

The amount given by the King of Prussia to the support of the Protestant Bishopric in Jerusalem, amounts to upward of $125,000, (about £18,000,) out of which sum the actual Bishop receives his annual salary of $4,200 (about £650.)

A poor old cooper, of Ollerton, Notts, says the Derby Mercury, who for several years has earned his bread by the sweat of his brow, has, we are informed, by a late decision of the Court of Chancery, been declared entitled to property to the extent of £30,000.

The Wetumpka (Ala.) Guard, in an article on the Penitentiary, says: "It is a fact that of the one hundred and sixty now in the prison, the use of liquor, and the habit of getting drunk, has been the cause, directly or indirectly, of the committing of over two-thirds."

The Judiciary Committee of the Indiana House of Representatives have been instructed, by a vote of the House, to report a bill providing for an annual appropriation to aid in the removal of free colored persons from that State to Liberia.

Mr. Seydell, naval architect at Stettin, and Mr. Ruthven, an English engineer, have constructed a ship which is impelled neither by wind, oars, nor steam, but by retro-active hydraulic power. The essay they have made is said to have entirely succeeded.

Flavel Clark, a soldier of the Revolution, died at his residence in Mohawk on the 29th ult., aged 91 years. Jeremiah Sweet, also a Revolutionary veteran, died at Granville, Washington Co., on the 8th inst., in the 90th year of his age.

The Board of Aldermen have rejected for the fourth time, a resolution inviting Kossuth to visit Louisville. The vote was unanimous.

The Vice-President of the French Republic has resigned.

A Popular Book for Agents.

HEADLEY'S LIFE OF KOSSUTH.—The undersigned have in press, and will publish in January, "The Life of Louis Kossuth, Governor of Hungary," with notices of Distinguished Men and Scenes of the Hungarian Revolution. To which is added an Appendix, containing the most important of the Addresses, Letters, and Speeches of the great Magyar Chief, by P. C. Headley, author of "Life of the Empress Josephine," "Life of Lafayette," &c., with an Introduction by Horace Greeley; in one elegant 12mo volume, with steel portrait, uniform in size and style with "Headley's Josephine." Price $1 25.

Agents wanted in every county in the United States to canvass for the above popular work.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year commences the last Wednesday in August, and closes the last Tuesday in June of each year.

Board of Instruction.

Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress.
Rev. J. W. MORTON, } Assistants.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, } Assistants.

The Terms for 1851 and 1852 are as follows:—
The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.
" Second " Dec. 3 " " March 16.
" Third " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one of two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term. Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.

Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS.

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00
Drawing,	1 00
Monochromatic Painting	3 00
Oil Painting,	5 00
Writing and Stationery,	0 50
Vocal Music, Elementary,	1 00
Advanced Class,	2 00
Instrumental Music,	8 00

Use of Organ or Piano, $2 00 per quarter.

Board, in private families, per week, from $1 25 to $1 50; in clubs, from 60 to 90 cents.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall Term, and at the middle of the Winter Term, and continue seven weeks. The course will embrace a thorough review of the common school branches, with daily lectures on "The Art of Teaching," Chemistry, Physiology, Laws of Health, School Laws. &c., &c. Tuition $2 50.

Students should not be furnished with unnecessary pocket-money, neither should minors be allowed to contract debts in the village. Either member of the Faculty will superintend the financial affairs of pupils placed under their care, by special direction from parents and guardians, if funds are furnished in advance.

THE MOTHER OF LAMARTINE.

When a man, great, good, or original, arises, we have a desire to know the first secret influences that awakened his latent powers, and gave the particular bent to his mind. We wish to know of his infantile training—his home scenes—to know what first attracted or repulsed him—who it was that first discovered the peculiar characteristics of his intellect—what part his parents took in his education, and in giving the peculiar bent to his genius.

Morally great men almost universally ascribe their greatness to early impulses given them by their mothers. These early impressions of maternal affection and influence, become a part of the child—a kind of second nature—growing with their growth, and strengthening with their strength. As clay in the hands of the potter, so is the infantile mind in the hands of the mother; and, as is the mold given to the plastic mind, so will be the general outline in its more firm, unyielding stages. In the language of Lamartine, "Happy is he on whom God has conferred the blessing of having sprung from a good and pious family. It is the chiefest blessing of his lot. . . . The future fate of the child depends upon the house in which he is born. His soul is nourished and grows above all by the impressions which are made on his memory. Our mother's look is a portion of our soul. Which among us is there, who, on seeing that look again, merely in a dream or in thought, does not feel a something descending on his soul, which soothes its trouble, and diffuses serenity around it?" Her voice, her look, her every act, comes to us in the strife, labor, and anxiety of a busy life, soothing and encouraging us amidst the hardest conflicts. In that period when the bustle and fever of life are over, and the quietness of age leads to contemplation, we look back to those days when a mother's smile beamed continually upon our pathway, as the happiest days of life.

Biography continually points to the influence of home in youthful years, as one of the great influences that controls and directs in after life. Most of our ministers, missionaries, and reformers—most of our eminent statesmen, that have advanced and elevated the social and political condition of nations—have been blessed with like-minded parents—at least, have had pious mothers, whose prayers and examples have descended like holy dews upon their heads throughout their earthly journey.

Alphonse De Lamartine adds another example to the list. He says: "God has conferred on me the privilege of being born in one of those favored families, which are, as it were, sanctuaries of piety." His strength of mind and of character—his love of liberty—his patriotism—his poetic fire and inspiration—his mellowness of soul—his religious sensibility—in a word, his greatness—is but the development of that character implanted by his mother.

She was born at St. Cloud, "and was brought up there along with the king, Louis Philippe, in that respectful familiarity which springs up between children nearly of the same age, and sharing the same lessons and the same sports." She suffered much in the revolution of 1789. Her husband was cast into prison, and she gave many and touching examples of conjugal and maternal love. On being liberated from prison, his scrupulousness prevented his taking advantage of the right of primogeniture by the revolution, and he was reduced to a state "which wavered between frugal competence and pinching poverty." This rendered the early years of Alphonse humble and severe; yet, from their associations, sweet. Necessity thus concurred with his mother's inclination in regard to his education.

The basis of his physical education was exercise, neatness, simplicity of clothing, and rigorous frugality in respect to food. His exercise and clothing were the same as the children of the peasantry. His mother never permitted him to eat any meat until he left home for college. His food was milk, bread, vegetables, and fruit. She thought, and Lamartine still thinks, that "this hardening of the heart with regard to the gentlest animals, our companions, our aids, our brothers in labor, and even in affection here below, that these immolations, this appetite for blood, this sight of palpitating flesh, are made to brutalize and to render ferocious the instincts of the heart."

She manifested but little anxiety about what is usually termed an education. She asked, as the first thing, that he should be truthful and good, and she labored to attract him to these virtues by a continual manifestation of them in her own character. She labored, by example as well as by precept, to make him "a happy child, with a healthy mind, and a loving soul—a creature of God, and not a puppet of men." She thought that in all conditions of life, it is necessary first to make a man, and when the man is made—that is to say, a being intelligent, sensible, and placed in just relations to himself, to other men, and to God—it matters little whether he be a prince or a workman; he is that which he ought to be. What he is is good, and his mother's work is accomplished." All that he was taught in childhood, was taught as a recompense, not as a task—taught amid pleasures and sports, not as a labor.

She was endowed by nature with a mind naturally pious, tender, and with the most sensitive and vivid imagination. "All her thoughts were sentiments, and every sentiment was an image." With a luminous imagination and loving heart, she made all nature appear to her children luminous and lovely, and led them from nature up to nature's God, and made them feel that He was a God of love. She was a woman rather of soul than of profound intellect. She believed humbly, loved ardently, hoped firmly. She wrote much, but not for the public eye. It was the "intimate communings with herself and with God."

She spent much time in labors of love among the sick and needy of the neighboring peasantry. For their sakes, she made medicine a study, and was daily engaged in making prescriptions, preparing medicines, waiting upon the sick, dressing their wounds, supplying their bodily wants, and administering consolation to their spirits. Each morning her house was thronged with the sick, or their friends, who came to seek advice and aid. In all her errands of mercy, her children were her constant companions. They went with her to the sick room, assisted in administering to the wants of the afflicted, or were sent to carry food or medicine, so that they were familiarly known, for six or eight miles around, as the children, the messengers, the angels of "the lady." For her labors, she desired no reward but the "blessings of the poor, and the approbation of God." These she obtained—with a treasure in heaven.

Her piety was a constant and brightly-burning flame. "One might say, that she lived in God, as much as it is permitted to any creature so to do. There was not one of the phases of her soul which was not unceasingly turned towards the ray from on high." "The unceasing stream of love, of adoration, of gratitude, and prayer, which gushed from her heart, was her sole and natural preaching. Prayer—but rapid, lyric, winged prayer—was associated in our minds with the slightest acts of the day." "God formed, as it were, one of our circle. We never remembered not to have known Him. There never was a day when we had not been spoken to of Him. What she attached the greatest importance to, was to direct my thoughts unceasingly towards God, and to give life and energy to these thoughts by implanting in my soul a constant sense of the presence of God, so that my religion became a pleasure to me, and my faith a communion with the Invisible One."

Such was the mother of Lamartine, as described by himself; and the influence of her teachings and character were not lost upon him in after life. Whatever happened to him of joy or sorrow, whatever has been his situation in life, whatever position he has occupied among his countrymen, he has ever turned to his mother as the guiding star of his destiny. Whether wandering amid the linden groves of Macon, or beneath the cedars of Lebanon; whether standing amid the ruins of Jerusalem, or bowing in prayer upon Olivet or Calvary; whether from the Tribune, the Hotel de Ville, or in the streets of Paris, staying by his eloquence the surgings of the revolution; whether acting as a pilgrim, statesman, orator, or poet, he feels that the spirit of his mother is with him, smiles upon him, and that he "holds communion with her in the regions of eternity." ALLEGAN.

PERSONAL EFFORTS.

The following incident, showing the blessed results of faithful personal efforts and earnest prayer for the conversion of men, is worthy of record.

The writer has just commenced laboring one half of the time as a minister of the gospel in the place where it occurred. One Friday evening, as he was making calls among the people, he entered a house in which lives a Scotchman and his family. The wife is a member of the Wesleyan church, the husband of the Congregational. In conversation, during the evening, he related, in substance, the following, "which," said he, "I have often thought of putting in print."

"Seven years ago next February, I was building for myself a small log-house. There were three other men at work with me upon the building. It was nearly completed. One afternoon, just as we were about closing work, I saw a man on horseback coming along the road. As he came against the house, and saw us at work, he stopped and spoke. My fellow-laborers were not pious; one or two of them were apparently much hardened in sin. The colporteur—for the stranger was one—told us he wanted we should come off from the building and pray. This request was made with so much earnestness and sincerity, as to impress our minds. We hastened down. He said a few words to us, and then requested us to kneel and pray to God. Down he fell, among the chips and dirt, upon his knees. He prayed. If ever I heard a prayer, that was one. It seemed as though God's presence could be felt. When we arose, he gave two of our number a tract; his stock of books and tracts was nearly exhausted—and, with a few more words in conversation, left us. The next day he addressed a congregation in the place. I was present to hear him then, but have seen and heard nothing from him since.

A short time after the occurrence at the log-house, at a religious meeting, Mr. W., one of my fellow-laborers upon the house, who knelt during the colporteur's prayer, and received from him a tract, arose and surprised the audience by expressing his love for Jesus Christ, the Saviour of sinners. He referred to Mr. S., the colporteur—his prayer and conversation and the tract, as the agency used by God in his conversion. He afterwards united with the church on profession of his faith in Christ, and still keeps that tract choice as a remembrance of him who gave it."

On the Sunday following the Friday before referred to, the writer was introduced to Mr. W., who remarked, his face brightening with a smile, and his eye assuming a peculiar lustre, "I shall always remember the circumstances of my conversion. I shall remember the man who was the instrument of it—the prayer he made—the feelings I then had. It set me thinking on my way home that night. I wish there were a great many more such men as he. It would be a good thing if there were."

That colporteur is not aware, probably, of the result of the effort made at the new log-house. But he then laid up for himself treasures in heaven. From this incident we see the good effect produced by faithful personal effort and prayer for the conversion of men. "Blessed are ye that sow beside all waters." Unto such shall be given, in the day of the Lord Jesus, a crown of rejoicing, sparkling with gems.

A PASTOR'S MORNING WALK.

We cut the following from the Pesbyterian. It teaches a good lesson on written and unwritten sermons, doctrinal and practical preaching, on pastoral study and pastoral visiting, with a happy incidental notice of the ribbons on the minister's wife's bonnet.

Mr. Jones was the pastor of a church in a small country village. In its seclusion but little bustle of business was known, and each individual was consequently much interested in the concerns of every other individual of the parish. The pastor and his family were the prominent objects of scrutiny, and all felt at liberty not only to make his public exercises, but his domestic arrangements, the subject of free remark. This was done, not from unfriendly feeling, for he was much beloved by his people, but in the absence of other engrossing topics of common interest, the movements of the pastor and his family became of primary importance.

One pleasant morning in the month of April Mr. Jones took his cane and set off to visit, as was his custom, the families of his charge. He first entered the house of a family, the mother of which was a member of his church, but the father was an irreligious man, and but seldom seen at public worship on the Sabbath. He had conversed but a few minutes with this pious mother before her husband entered, and with the well-meaning, but blunt and careless air of a reckless man, addressed him:

"Good morning, sir; good morning. Happy to see you. I had the pleasure of hearing you preach yesterday afternoon, sir."

"Yes; I observed that you were at church, and was pleased to see it."

"Well, Mr. Jones, I am a plain man, and you must excuse me if I am pretty honest in my way of talking. If you always preached as you did yesterday, I should go to church oftener. You preached yesterday afternoon without notes, and that is what I call preaching. When a man goes up into his pulpit, and reads off a sermon, why, I may just as well stay at home and read a sermon out of a book. If you would always preach without notes, I should almost always go to church."

"I think, myself," said Mr. Jones, "that extempore preaching is, on many accounts, preferable to written sermons; but still extempore preaching will not suit all. I should be perfectly willing to preach without notes all the time, if I thought it would be equally profitable to my people."

"Well," said the man laughing, "if you will let me know when you are going to preach without notes, I will always come and hear you. But it is against my religion to go and hear men read instead of preach."

After a little further conversation, Mr. Jones bade them good morning, and continued his walk. Though the man had addressed him in rude style, he knew that there was no intentional disrespect, and he was too much accustomed to such rencontres to allow his feelings to be much disturbed. Yet he could not help mourning over the strength and unreasonableness of men's prejudices.

The next door he knocked at was that of a lawyer, who was telling every one by his conduct that he had a most profound respect for himself. In self-respect he went to church upon the Sabbath; in self-respect he attentively listened to the preacher; in self-respect he bowed, in dignified courtesy, to his more humble neighbors. He did many things which were honorable and of good report, not because he feared God, but because he respected himself. A little girl opened the door, and ushered Mr. Jones into the house, and then went to the wing of the house which contained the office of the lawyer, to inform him that the clergyman had called.

"Good morning, Mr. Jones," said this respectable gentleman, in slow and courteous accents. "I am happy to see you this morning, and to have an opportunity of telling you how much we were gratified with your forenoon sermon yesterday, (placing special accent on the word forenoon.) I trust you will not think, Mr. Jones, that I intend to flatter you, when I say that your forenoon sermon was an admirably written discourse. That is the kind of preaching, Mr. Jones, which elevates the people; it improves their minds, it cultivates their taste. A discourse well digested and carefully written, is substantial food to the mind. You will pardon me, Mr. Jones, for making the remark, but I think that clergymen generally, if they have not time to write out two sermons a week, had better exchange a little more frequently, so that they never will be under the necessity of preaching extempore."

Mr. Jones was a man of acute sensibilities. He felt such remarks, but under the teachings of his Saviour he had learned self-control. Natural feeling recoiled from the insult of such supercilious remarks. He, however, was sufficiently acquainted with human nature to know the folly of arguing with such a mind, and therefore quietly endeavored to waive the subject, and, bidding the family good morning, (for the lady of the house had, during the conversation, entered,) he escaped further torture.

"How do you do, Mr. Jones?" exclaimed a man who was ploughing in the field by the road-side. Mr. Jones raised his eyes from the ground, for he had been walking along almost lost in thought, and kindly responded to his salutation. The farmer was a member of the church, active and useful, but want of humility was his infirmity. Mr. Jones inquired of him respecting the state of religion, if there was anything of particular interest among his neighbors or in his family.

"Why, yes, sir," said the farmer; "yes, things look more encouraging. My neighbors are more ready to talk upon the subject of religion than they have been for some time. It appears to me that all we want now is, forcible appeals to the heart. I know there are some persons who like doctrinal sermons, and I suppose they are important in their place; but the trouble of our folks is, that they know their duty, but they won't do it. It isn't enlightening that they want; it isn't instruction, but melting appeals to the heart to make them feel. That is my view of the matter, Mr. Jones."

"There certainly is some good sense in what you say, but a man cannot feel unless he believes. We must convince a man of his danger before he can feel it. We must convince him of God's goodness before he can feel gratitude. All correct feeling must be founded on correct belief."

"True, sir; true," said the farmer; "but if I may be so bold, it appears to me you preach doctrinal sermons a little too much, Mr. Jones. I have been reading some of Whitefield's sermons lately, and I am taken with them mightily; all heart, sir, all heart. And only see how successful he was! It is really astonishing."

Mr. Jones continued the conversation a little while longer, to lead the man to more correct views of himself, and then went on his way. As he was passing the door of his aged deacon, he thought he would step in a minute and chat with him. The deacon was eighty years of age, a man of old fashions, and deeply versed in theological lore. The good old man gave his pastor a cordial greeting, for he loved him; but he thought the times were sadly degenerate. He took down from his shelf a musty old volume of sermons, preached some half century ago, and placing it in the hands of Mr. Jones, said:

"There is a very interesting volume, which I have been reading lately. It is a real treat to me to get hold of good, old fashioned, doctrinal sermons. The fact is, Mr. Jones, you modern preachers are altogether out of the way. The doctrines are the very marrow of the gospel. And it is doctrinal preaching that we want to enlighten the public mind. Now I have lived eighty years, Mr. Jones, and have seen the effect of all kinds of preaching, and you may depend upon it, that the great thing needed is to have men well indoctrinated. The public mind wants enlightening; it needs instruction. Now, I like your preaching as well as any body's I hear in modern times; but I do think it would be a great improvement if you would preach doctrinal sermons more. Shan't I lend you this volume, sir? Perhaps you would like to look it over."

Mr. Jones smiled at the delicate hint which his good deacon supposed he was giving, and, taking the book, endeavored to lead the conversation to subjects of practical godliness, and, after uniting with the venerable deacon in prayer, continued his parochial calls.

In the middle of the little village there was a millner's shop, where Mr. Jones occasionally called, to converse with the females whom he could see no where else. The front shop was arranged with articles for sale; and a little room behind it, connected by a door, was the sewing room of the females who made the millinery of the village. As Mr. Jones entered the door of the outer shop, he heard the voice of a female in the sewing room exclaim, "Well, now don't you think it is very improper for a minister's wife to dress as Mrs. Jones does? Last Sabbath she had two large bows upon her bonnet; I do think it is inconsistent with the spirit of the gospel for Christian people, and especially for ministers' wives, to be so much given to dress. It will do very well for worldly people, but it is scandalous for Christians to act so."

"Why, Mary," said another, "I was working last week for Mrs. Bentley, and she said that she thought it was too bad for Mrs. Jones to dress so meanly. She was finding fault with that very bonnet, and said that Mrs. Jones acted as though she thought there was sin in every pretty color. And you know Mrs. Bentley is not at all gay in her dress. She says Mrs. Jones is a lady, and it is proper that she should dress as one, and she feels provoked to see her assuming such a demure appearance."

"Well," replied Mary, "I cannot help what Mrs. Bentley thinks, but I think that a minister's wife ought to avoid every ornament whatever, and if I have a good opportunity, I shall make bold to tell Mrs. Jones my mind upon the subject."

Mr. Jones was a very unwilling listener to this conversation, and endeavored, by walking about the shop, to make a noise to attract their notice. But the inmates of the back shop were too much interested in their discussion to hear him. He therefore quietly left the shop, and went on his way. He felt pained at heart to think there was no possibility of pursuing a course which would not be made by some the occasion of confirming themselves in sin. He knew that his wife was ready to do anything which she thought would promote the spiritual welfare of the people, and he walked along, sad and disheartened to see how many obstacles were hedging up his way.

He went home to his study, and felt discouraged, rather than animated, by his morning walk. He took up his pen to write, but it moved tardily and heavily along the paper, as he thought, "There are not a few of my people who will not be profited by written sermons." He laid down his pen and endeavored to arrange his thoughts for extemporaneous address. But the ardor and the energy of his mind were paralyzed as he thought there are not a few who would look with cold disdain upon such efforts, and who could exert and influence upon the minds of others to prevent the possibility of good. He kneeled in prayer. "O God! it is my desire, while I live, to glorify thee. Wilt thou give me wisdom to pursue that course which is best adapted to do good in this place? My mind is disturbed and disquieted. Wilt thou in mercy soothe it? I am undecided and perplexed. O! make the path of duty plain. I hope that I am willing to bear censure, to take up the cross, but O! lead me, that I may know what my duty is, and that I may not spend my life in vain." He was here interrupted by a tap at the door. He rose from his knees to open the door, and admitted a parishioner who had been for some weeks absent from the village. "How do you do, Mr. Jones?" said the new visitor; "I have come to tell you the good news from P——. I have been there for some time, and they have quite a revival of religion there." "I am glad to see you," said Mr. Jones; "I understood that there was more than usual interest in that place, and have felt anxious to hear from them."

"O!" said the visitor, "they have a most precious minister there. He is the most faithful and active man I ever saw. He is all the time among his people; from morning till night visiting from house to house. It appears to me that such activity and zeal as he possesses must be successful any where. People cannot be unconcerned when the importance of religion is so incessantly urged upon them in their homes."

Now, the fact happened to be, that there was no particular interest in Mr Jones' parish at that time, and he was not in the habit of spending his whole time in parochial visiting. He, however, paid no attention to those gentle hints, for he did not consider it necessary to enter upon a defense of his views of duty. His good parishioner supposed, therefore, that he had been rather too obscure in his hints, and was growing more and more personal in his allusions, when we was interrupted by the entrance of another visitor. Mr. ——, who last entered, was a gentleman of sincere piety and refined mind. He was fond of close reasoning, and his sensitive feelings shrunk from every departure from good taste. After the usual salutations, "Well, Mr. Jones," said he, "I had the pleasure of hearing Mr. C—— preach last Sabbath. He certainly is a most eloquent preacher. I never heard so thrilling a sermon in my life. They say he is the most indefatigable student in the region. You always find him in his study. I understand he devotes ten hours a day to his books. And now, though so young, he has risen to be one of the most eminent men in the country. How wretchedly those ministers mistake it, who fritter away their time in running about from house to house! There is the minister of P——, for instance, they say he is a very friendly man indeed, and talks very pleasantly in the family, but it is no matter what text he takes, he always preaches the same sermon. Some of the people tell me that they would give a great deal to have a more eloquent preacher. After all, the men who spend most of their time in their study, and give all their energies to preparation for the pulpit, are the men who do most good."

Now, the fact happened to be with Mr. Jones, that though he loved his study, he did not feel it to be proper for him to spend his whole time with his books. He considered it important to give a considerable portion of his time to parochial visiting. It may well be supposed that the sentiments expressed by Mr. D—— did not accord with those of the first visitor. They were immediately engaged in an ardent dispute. Mr. Jones smiled as he listened a few moments to their contest, and then pleasantly suggested to them the propriety of embracing some other time and place for their discussion.

As they withdrew, Mr. Jones found his own mind lightened of its transient load, and with a cheerful heart he resolved, as he had done a thousand times before, that he would do that which he thought right, and leave others to say and think what they pleased.

THE GRIP OF FAITH.

John Welsh, one of the early reformers of Scotland, born 1570, has given a lively picture of faith, which may serve to encourage some trembling believer.

"It is not the quantity of thy faith that shall save thee. A drop of water is as true water as the whole ocean. So a little faith is as true faith as the greatest. A child eight days old is as really a man as one of sixty years; a spark of fire is as true fire as a great flame; a sickly man is as truly living as a well man. So it is not the measure of thy faith that saves thee; it is the blood that it grips to, that saves thee; as the weak hand of a child that leads the spoon to the mouth, will feed as well as the strongest arm of a man; for it is not the hand that feeds thee, albeit it put the meat into thy mouth, but it is the meat carried into thy stomach that feeds thee. So, if thou canst grip Christ never so weakly, he will not let thee perish.

"All that looked to the brazen serpent, never so far off, they were healed of the sting of the fiery serpent; yet all saw not alike clearly, for some were near hand, and some were far off. Those that were near hand might see more clearly than those that were far off; nevertheless, those that were far off were as soon healed of the sting, when they looked to the serpent, as those that were near hand; for it was not their look that made them whole, but He whom the serpent did represent. So if thou canst look to Christ never so meanly, he can take away the sting of thy conscience, if thou believest; the weakest hand can take away a gift as well as the strongest. Now, Christ is the gift, and weak faith may grip him as well as strong faith; and Christ is as truly thine when thou hast weak faith, as when thou hast come to these triumphant joys through the strength of faith." Let every trembling sinner grip Christ by faith.

WHITEFIELD'S FIRST SERMON.

Whitefield began with as small a stock of sermons as of worldly wealth. It had been his intention to have prepared at least a hundred wherewith to commence his ministry. He found himself with only one; it proved a fruitful one; for, having lent it to a neighboring clergyman, to convince him how very unfit he was, as he really believed himself to be, for the work of preaching, the clergyman divided it into two, which he preached morning and evening to his congregation, and sent it back with a guinea for its use. With this sermon he first appeared in the pulpit in the church of St. Mary de Crypt, where he had been baptized, and where he first received the sacrament. Curiosity had brought together a large congregation; and he now, he says, felt the unspeakable advantage of having been accustomed to public speaking when a boy at school, and of exhorting and teaching the poor people at Oxford. More than this—he felt what he believed to be a sense of the Divine presence, and kindling as he went on in this belief, spoke, as he thought, with some degree of gospel authority. A few of his hearers mocked; but upon the greater number a strong impression was produced, and complaint was made to the bishop that fifteen persons were driven mad by the sermon. The good man replied, that he wished the madness might not be forgotten before the next Sunday. [Southey's Wesley.

"I LOVE TO STEAL AWHILE AWAY."

In the collection of Village Hymns by Dr. Nettleton, is one which probably more than all the rest, has been read and sung. Those familiar with that collection, need only be reminded of the first line:

"I love to steal awhile away," &c.

With most Christians, its words throughout are household; and next to the pious breathings of David, come home to their experience, and give wings to their aspirations. The spirit of the hymn, so Christian and subdued, so pure and hopeful in thought, so beautiful in expression, and true in fact, makes it one of the few things not soon to die. Probably few of the thousands whom it has refreshed and delighted, know its author is still living. In the quiet town of Monson, not far from Springfield, Mass., she may be found, and though her "toilsome day" is drawing to a close, she has still a hand and heart ready for every good work.

The occasion of the hymn, as related by herself, was this: At one time she had to walk in the lowliest vale. She was pressed sore with poverty, and obliged to struggle hard to help support a large family, part of whom were invalids, with several small children. In one of the darkest periods, shut up in a small, unfinished house, where not a retired spot could be found; invaded by sickness, and anxiously toiling from morning till night, when the cares of the day were over, she used to steal out to a quiet and shady retreat, and there, on her knees, "where none but God was near," she would pour out her soul and draw from the living well. There she gathered strength for the "toilsome day."

Her visits to this loved spot, so regular at the evening hour, drew the attention of a neighbor—a lady of wealth and influence. This lady, (long since gone to her rest in heaven,) after observing her for a time, was led to pass censure in the presence of others, and more than intimated, that instead of rambling out in the evening, she had better be at home, with her children. Nothing, of course, could be more crushing to a sensitive heart. She was grieved beyond measure, that an hour's relief from most exhausting labors, employed in communing with the God she adored, should be construed into a neglect of her family. Grieved and sorrowful, she sat down at evening with a babe in her arms—the tears of anguish, as she said, rolling from her eyes, and wrote her "Apology for her twilight rambles," intending the next day to send it to the lady whose words had so lacerated her heart. But feeling keenly the contrast of condition, she never had courage to send it, and laid it by, supposing forever. It never once occurred to her that a hymn could come out of it, till about the time Dr. Nettleton was preparing his collection, when a friend, in looking over her manuscripts to find something suitable for that collection, was overjoyed to bring this gem to light, and at once had it inserted. None but herself, not even her husband, knew of the hymn, till it was published. Some stanzas were stricken from the original copy, and alterations made in others—alterations necessary for its general use, but which, if the circumstances could always be known, we might wish had not been made—as in the first stanza:

"I love to steal awhile away
From every cumb'ring care."

What can be more touching, in view of the circumstances, than the original, which reads:

"I love to steal awhile away
From little ones and care,
And spend the hours of setting day
In humble, grateful prayer."

In the original copy were nine stanzas, from which selection was made, and some left behind, which, to say the least, are equal to any published, as for example, the seventh, in allusion to death:

"I love to meditate on death—
When will his message come,
With kindly smile, to steal my breath,
And waft an exile home?"

It may be well to add, that a pen gifted as such a hymn would indicate, has not been wholly idle. [N. Y. Observer.

IMPORTANCE OF TRUTH.

In our remarks, last week, upon "Truth and Error," we admitted that there were some who maintained a generally upright behavior, notwithstanding their adherence to false doctrine in some particulars. But the drift of our reasoning was to show that they were upright, only so far as sound views exerted an influence upon them, and that the tendency of error was always to sin. If false doctrine, by deceiving the understanding, leads men to do wrong, it is evident, that the only way to deliver men from the power of sin, is to impart to them the knowledge of the truth. "The truth shall make you free." John 8: 32. Their alienation from the life of God is "through the ignorance that is in them, having the understanding darkened." Eph. 4: 18.

If this be so, what an important agency in the regeneration of fallen humanity, is the ministry of the gospel! Men may say what they please against missions to the heathen, but it were madness to expect "the DARK places of the earth" to become any thing else than "the habitations of cruelty," so long as the Book of Divine Revelation is kept from them. It is true, God has power over the minds of men, to turn them in whatever direction He chooses; and some may think, therefore, that nothing is necessary on our part, but to pray to Him to exert that power, and that in his own good time he will do it. But we believe that whatever influence God exercises upon the mind, is of such a nature, that it is exactly adapted to the mind's constitution; and, for this reason, we have no expectation that He will ever bring the heathen to cease from sinning, till they by the law are made to know that they are sinners—till they are made to have something more than that general knowledge of duty, which enables them to "accuse and excuse one another"—to have such a knowledge of it as will stop every man's mouth, and make him feel that he is personally guilty before God. And as we have never heard of any prophet being raised up among them to declare the will of God, nor of any messenger being sent down from heaven for the purpose, nor of any other miracle by way of communicating to them the knowledge of duty, we conclude that God expects those who have received the gospel to carry it to them. We should draw this cocnlusion, even if there were no command on the subject. We are as firmly convinced of the power of God to direct the minds of men in whatever direction seems good to him, as any one can be; yet we have no expectation that they will quit sinning, till their abominations are shown to them. It is in accordance with the constitution of things, that we teach one another.

Again, how important it is, that "the priest's lips should keep knowledge!" How important that his ministry should be conducted with an eye to the instruction of the people! We mean, not merely instruction in the nature of God's law in general, and in the danger of transgressing it, but in the bearing which it has upon particular sins, and upon particular persons on account of their sins. Unless it is a close, personal, heart-searching ministry, so as to make the hearer feel as David did under the preaching of Nathan, "Thou art the man," it is not properly an instructive ministry. We may discourse upon sin and holiness in general, upon the divine attributes, and upon the divinity of Christ, upon the Judgment-day, and upon the Resurrection; yet, if we do not search out particular sins, and make the subjects of them feel that they have no excuse, we do not really instruct them—we do not make them wise unto salvation. "Let there be light;" and, by God's blessing, it shall be "the light of life."

Very important, again, is it, to "train up a child in the way he should go." And God's truth being the great means—the only means, in fact—by which the soul is freed from sin's power, causing the child to read and to commit to memory the Scriptures, as he grows up, not omitting to show him the application which they have to his own state, is a method of instruction which nothing else will adequately supply. "When he is old, he will not depart from it." When tempted to break the Sabbath, he will call to mind how many times he has repeated that commandment, "Remember the Sabbath-day, to keep it holy." If tempted to secure to himself the advantage in trade by cheating his neighbor, he will remember the command, "Thou shalt not steal." Tempted to uncleanness and debauchery, he will remember that "whoremongers and adulterers God will judge;" and that "drunkards inherit not the kingdom of God." He will remember that he has read and repeated these things many-a-time, and thus "by the word of God's lips he will keep himself from the paths of the destroyer." As the Saviour repelled the assaults of Satan by saying, "It is written," so will one who from a child has been instructed in the Scriptures, guard himself, and walk uprightly. T. B. B.

"Foreknowledge."—We have received from Bro. Hull two more communications on this subject, and had intended to give one of them an insertion in our present issue. But its great length forbids its appearance on our editorial page, accompanied with any remarks of our own; and this, together with an accumulation of other matter, must be our apology for its postponement till next week. CHURCH ORDER.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

I wish to ask two questions, which it would be gratifying to me to have some brother answer:

1. Would it be a deviation from the faith of Seventh-day Baptists for a proper administrator to administer the ordinance of baptism to an individual who gave evidence of a change of heart, but did not keep the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath?

2. Would an individual who was an ordained deacon, and licensed to preach the gospel, be a proper administrator to administer the ordinance of baptism? C. R.

Reply.

We shall not undertake to answer these questions on behalf of the Seventh-day Baptist denomination, but we are willing to give our own views. We consider—

1. That according to the New Testament, the ordination of a brother to the ministry originates with the church of which he is a member. That whatever agency may be called to aid in formally inducting him into the office, whether it be a council of ministers, presbytery, or any thing else, the act is truly the act of the church. From the church he receives his ordination, and by the church it can be taken away.

2. That, by virtue of this his ordination, he has a right to administer the ordinance of baptism to such as the church may have examined, and agreed to receive into its fellowship. He has no right to baptize them first, and then demand their reception by the church. He acts as the servant of the church.

3. That, by virtue of his ordination, he has a right to go out beyond the precincts of the church, and preach the gospel; and if any who hear him believe the message, he has a right to baptize them, though he has no right to demand their reception into fellowship by the church that sent him out. They may voluntarily enter into an organization by themselves; and when they do so, and statedly meet together for worship, and observe the ordinances of the gospel, they become thereby a church, according to the New Testament model, and may ordain one of their number as pastor, if they choose.

4. That, by virtue of his ordination, he has the right to baptize any one, whom, after suitable examination, he may honestly consider a believer in Jesus Christ. Whether the professed intention of the candidate to keep the first day of the week instead of the Sabbath should be taken as invalidating his claim to the character of a believer, must be determined by circumstances. It is certainly the minister's duty to do all in his power to convince the candidate of his obligation to obey the law of the Sabbath; but if, after having done so, the candidate appears unable to see it, yet gives proof, notwithstanding, that the love of God is shed abroad in his heart, we do not see that it is right to refuse him the ordinance any longer. "If thou believest with all thine heart, thou mayest." Acts 8: 37.

5. That, as the minister receives his ordination, in virtue of which he has the right to administer baptism, from the church, so the church, having resolved to receive into its fellowship one or more persons who have made application, may by vote depute, appoint, or ordain any one of its number to administer the ordinance of baptism to them. It is not orderly, however, to do so, when the minister is present, to whom, by virtue of his ordination, the work of baptizing belongs. The church may do so, when destitute of a regularly ordained minister; and they may appoint one of their deacons, or any other brother, to perform the duty. T. B. B.

DOCTRINES TO BE TAUGHT THE JEWS.

In a recent article on the subject of a Mission to Palestine, a question was raised as to the doctrines and practices which should be insisted upon in teaching the Jews. Referring to that question, Eld. Elias Burdick writes as follows:—

"In my opinion, the course pursued by the Apostles in receiving them and walking in fellowship with them, is our only proper guide. In relation to circumcision, there is nothing plainer than that, as a religious rite, it was entirely set aside by the Apostles, and never to be practiced on the Gentiles to accommodate the feelings of the Jews. But whether the Jews should be allowed, when christianized, to practice it as a national rite, is quite another question. The covenant of circumcision made with Abraham, in the 17th chapter of Genesis, was declared to be an everlasting covenant, and the land of Canaan was given to his posterity for an everlasting possession. They have never yet possessed all the land of promise, the countries of Moab and Ammon in particular. And there is nothing plainer in prophecy, than that they will yet possess all their promised inheritance. Will they possess it without complying with the terms of the covenant? Paul circumcised Timothy, who was of Jewish descent by one of his parents; but he resisted the circumcision of Titus, who was not of Jewish origin, at the risk of his own life. My opinion then is, that the Jews should be left to their own decision about practicing it as a national rite, but never fellowshiped in making anything more of it, or in enjoining it on others.

"In regard to other national institutions, Paul clearly shows, in the 14th chapter of Romans, that they may observe such holy days as they choose, if they will not enforce them upon others. The Apostles themselves observed their principal national feasts; though, it is evident, they did not offer the sacrifices which were formerly connected with them. What is more reasonable, than that they be allowed to commemorate the great events of special interest to their nation? But every thing of a typical character should be laid aside.

"In regard to diversity of opinion on unfulfilled prophecy, there seems to be no occasion for disfellowship among brethren, unless it results in diversity of practice, or a subversion of the fundamental principles of the gospel."

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

A Sabbath-keeper in London—Opening of Parliament—French Affairs—The Holy Sepulchre, &c.

GLASGOW, February 6, 1852.

Having little to record of efforts towards Sunday sanctification in this country at present, I am the more at liberty to occupy a portion of the space afforded me with a rather remarkable testimony by an unknown brother Sabbath-observer in London. It is difficult, as most are aware, to get access to the columns of the journals which uphold the Sunday; and any public testimony thus given must be made at great expense. As an evidence of zeal, as well as of fidelity to the cause of truth, it was with no common interest that I this week read in the London "Athenæum," a literary periodical of the highest standing in the land, the following advertisement, conspicuously printed:—

"THE AUTHORITY FOR THE NON-OBSERVANCE OF THE SEVENTH DAY.—It is universally admitted, that at the creation of the world, Almighty God 'blessed and sanctified the Seventh Day;' this He did, without exemption of any nation, or limitation to any time; the command, therefore, is universal and imperative.

"It is asserted, that though our blessed Lord or His Apostles are not recorded in Holy Scripture to have commanded, yet the Apostles and first Christians, in addition to their observance of the Seventh Day as a Sabbath, are recorded to have observed a second day in each week as a day for assembling together for religious purposes, namely, the First Day of the Week; and further, it is asserted, that this day, in Holy Scripture, is called 'The Lord's Day.'

"This is all that Holy Scripture does, or is asserted to record on this subject; and as our inquiry has relation to a command of God, we cannot give heed unto tradition, without incurring our blessed Lord's condemnation of the men of His time, whom He condemned not for any fallacy in the argument they had constructed, but for the impiety of constructing any argument on tradition to change any command of God. See Mark vii. 13.

"It therefore appears, that there is no authority for the non-observance of the Seventh Day, above Dogmatic Teaching, or the Edict of a Living Infallible Head.

May Almighty God grant us to consider, Whether if the non-observance of the Seventh Day is not preached by St. Paul—and where does he preach it?—we are not cursed by the apostle if we so preach, even though we claim to have powers equal to the angels of heaven. See Galatians i. 8. HERMAN HEINFETTER.

"17 FENCHURCH STREET, 1*st Sabbath of* 1852."

From the style and name of this brother, he is probably a foreigner; but he seems from other evidence also to be a student of Scripture; for the advertisement which immediately follows, in the same journal, is the announcement of a "Literal Translation of the Epistles of James and Peter, on Definite Rules of Translation, and an English Version of the same," by the same author.

Our Parliament has opened, and the Queen's speech, of the usual vagueness, has been delivered. The Prime Minister and the late Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs have given their respective versions of the circumstances which led to the dismissal of the latter from the Cabinet. The differences seem to have been more of a personal than political character; it is, however, much to be feared, that the exchange of Earl Granville for Lord Palmerston in the Government is one unfavorable to the interests of Protestantism abroad, if not for civil liberty also. It seems ominous that, cotemporaneous with the Earl's acceptance of office in London, was the dismissal of the Free Church Missionaries to the Jews at Pesth. British subjects as these men were, the Austrian Government ordered their immediate departure from the Austrain States, and that by a prescribed route, excluding them from Vienna. Their petition for longer delay, on account of the state of their families, was refused. They have since reached London; but the influence in their favor, we fear, is not great at the Office for Foreign Affairs, although no charge whatever was brought against them, or reason assigned for their summary removal. Their labors had been confined to the Jews at Pesth, and their success encouraging. More recently, a Sunday School for children there, conducted by one of the Jewish converts, has been shut by order of the Government, and an interdict has been laid upon the dissemination of the Scriptures, and the confiscation of those imported into Hungary has been imposed.

In France, matters do not amend. The same high-handed despotism prevails. Thirty thousand persons are stated to be imprisoned in that country for political offenses. In the forthcoming elections, "universal suffrage" is to wear a new aspect. The President intends to nominate the candidates for the Legislative Assembly, and universal suffrage will be enjoyed by the people to say "Yes" or "No," to those so nominated. The new sovereign President says he does not intend to be "following the old erroneous ways." A question, however, suggests itself, Will the people long bear his new erroneous ways? The answer is alone with God, who for his own purposes can make the worm a sharp thrashing instrument with teeth, when he has a work of judgment to execute. Meanwhile, it can hardly be supposed, that even "the Prince President" is without fears for himself. An attempt has been made upon his life by the wife of an ex-prefect. By his decree confiscating the property of the late King of the French and his family, an opposition has been created on the part of influential parties, who had previously expressed favorable opinions of his usurpation. Even M. de Montalembert, who so formally gave in his adhesion, and who is the Jesuit organ with the Government, resigned his place as member of the Consultative Commission—although, as he explained in a published letter, that Commission "has not been consulted on any of the acts of the Executive." The priesthood, however, seem to continue their influence in behalf of the President, and he, it may therefore be presumed, will load them with favors in return.

The Papal Church and the Eastern Church (with the Emperor of Russia at its head,) have lately been conflicting for ascendancy relative to the regulation of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem. The dispute, which occasioned considerable trouble at Constantinople, has, however, been got settled, and it is chiefly worthy of note now as one of the many evidences of increased interest in Immanuel's land, which we expect to progress until it become the scene-ground on which the claims of Christ and Antichrist will be decided preparatory of the reign there, in visible glory, of the Prince of Peace—the Son of David and the Son of God. The King of Prussia has recently sent out M. Valentiner, formerly pastor of Holstein, to take the oversight of the German Protestants in the Holy City. That king's Protestantism has of late assumed a rather dubious character; but he has long taken a deep interest in the Jerusalem Mission, and is at joint expense with our Episcopal Establishment for its maintenance. Our Puseyites have never got reconciled to the Jerusalem Bishopric, as they consider that it evidences disrespect to the Episcopal ordination of the eastern churches. The Morning Chronicle, the organ of the party, speaking on the subject, last month, said of these apostate churches, they "have a religion that suits them well enough, which produces certain substantial Christian virtues, which is molded into and reflects the national character." The power of vital godliness is little evinced among those churches, if we can place credit in the representations of travelers, and it becomes us not to speak of any thing less than a living faith, producing an examplary conversation, as suiting "well enough" the disciple of Christ. If contentedness with their condition only is meant to be implied, the remark would equally apply to Mahomedan or Pagan communities. J. A. BEGG.

MESHULLAM'S COLONY.

A few months ago, seven practical agriculturists, under the direction of Chas. A. Miner, left this country for Jerusalem, with a view of aiding John Meshullam in his efforts to benefit the Jews of Palestine, by inducing them to till the soil, and by teaching them in a practical way the doctrines of Christianity. They took with them farming tools, seeds, &c., and expected to commence operations at once in the vicinity of Jerusalem. Their agent in this country, (Mr. James L. Boyd, of No. 222 North Ninth-st., Philadelphia,) has sent us extracts from letters written to Mr. Miner by John Meshullam and his son Elijah, about the time that this company set sail. We very cheerfully comply with his request to give them a place in the Recorder.

Letter of John Meshullam.

JERUSALEM, 1851.

BELOVED CHRISTIAN FRIENDS,—On Sept. 21st we received your welcome communication of the 21st of July, and I willingly embrace the offered opportunity to dispatch the news I can afford at present. My son, Elijah, on whom I depend to give a regular statement of my affairs and progress, has this year been uncommonly occupied in his medical duties, so that he could not answer your letter immediately.

I had, in my last letter, informed you of the sale of our hotel, furniture, &c., and of our entire settlement in Artoss (Bethlehem.) Here I soon found my presence necessary, to reinstate the order and tranquillity that had been marred by my personal absence; my directions having been entrusted to the charge of unruly (Arab) men, who began to strive against one another, would have been productive of the worst results, had I not taken them by surprise, and made them relent their proceedings. My first object, after quelling the quarrels of my laborers, was to build some enclosures round my lands, and continue raising the various American productions I received, and my success redounds in thankfulness to those friends who gratuitously presented them to me.

My farm is wonderfully progressing, and maintaining its verdure, notwithstanding the sultry dryness of the surrounding country. I have added to my establishment two new rooms, conveniently situated on the eastern part of the valley, so that, in all, I am proprietor of three neat rooms for lodging, one for keeping my sheep, and another for provender; adjoining these I have a small enclosure for poultry, and further down the valley a stall for the cows, horses, &c. I have recently also added a camel to my domestic animals, as the most convenient beast to carry my vegetables to the city. It being the first year of the entire establishment at Artoss, I received frequent and repeated visits from the English residents of Jerusalem, and from my brethren; the latter are, beyond all doubt, persuaded that my object will one day be effectual in leading the Jews to follow my example, were it not for the strictness of the bigoted Rabbis, of whom those that are minded to labor fear greatly, particularly of forfeiting by it their allowance. As it is, my farm would already be crowded with poor Jewish laborers. All I could promise them at present, would be a mutual share of my productions, but could not afford to allow them means for the private wants of their families.

Respecting the purchase of land, I beg to suggest, that the Arabs are ever willing to dispose of as much soil as one has means for purchasing; but my circumstances at present being very limited, I cannot soar above my limits. You could easily buy up a fine large tract of land for the sum of £80, ($400,) being the amount of 8,000 piastres in Turkish money, which would render the purchase a permanent possession, granted by Government; but you are aware, that land must be purchased through the medium of a rajah, (or Turkish subject,) as foreigners are not allowed to buy land on their own account. This amount, however, would be far from affording the animal subsistence of a family, as the work required beforehand would be great to clear it of stones, &c., and make it ready to undergo a thorough, good ploughing. To purchase land manured, and ready-worked for sowing, requires higher price, and this would vary according to the circumstances of the seller: one must always take his occasion when land is to be sold; to buy cheap, he must be stocked with ready money. This year, had I only £80 ($400) in hand, I could not only have purchased a tract of land, but also hired several pieces in addition.

I will also venture to add, that if I were now stocked with sufficient means, I could—much more than I have hitherto—aid the poor, inquiring Jews, whose families I have repeatedly supplied with various products from my farm; but further than this I have no prospect yet to do for them. A poor woman (with a large family) recently applied to me, and I gave her twelve measures of wheat for their support, for which she was very thankful; and my poor brethren generally are united in prayers for my prosperity, and I trust that God is well pleased with our poor and weak efforts for ameliorating, in the least degree, the starving condition of the sons of Israel.

But what is of the first and greatest importance, beloved friends, is, that well-supplied co-workers should be HERE to hold up my feeble hands in this great labor. I shall be happy to hear from you by the first opportunity that offers, and especially to know how long you will have to tarry in America. This news will be most important to me, for I am left alone, without assistance, (excepting Arab helps,) and I soon fear that the extensive tract of land—that I leased in view of your speedy coming—will leave me without means to carry it on without early aid of American men and means. I therefore am anxiously awaiting your arrival in Palestine—and beg to know how far I may proceed. I remain yours and the servant of Jesus Christ, JOHN MESHULLAM.

Letter of Elijah Meshullam.

My pressing duties as druggist in the English Medical Dispensary, brings me in constant contact with the numberless poor, sickly, famishing Jews, who, owing to their poverty and scanty mode of living, are mostly the prepared victims of the distressing and fatal malady that prevails annually in this uncleansed city of the East. I have dispensed medicines to as many as 1400 patients, nearly all Jews. Many of these poor outcasts and wretched people have, from time to time, entreated me to recommend their condition to the sympathy and charity of American friends of Israel. The Jews in Palestine are indeed, collectively, a poor set of people, mutually laboring under various calamities, oppressed by their bigoted Latin and Greek Catholic neighbors, and still frequently harrassed by the depraved sons of the "bond-woman," the reckless, self-conceited Mahomedans; and individually they afford a striking picture of patient endurance of privation and wretchedness, such as none can realize but those who have to visit the hateful Jewish Quarter, and witness their condition and wants, in these miserable, dark-vaulted, and subterranean abodes, and behold a series of misfortunes and woe, that must move the hearts of Christians to their claims upon them as worthy of their greatest commiseration and charity. Some of these, my poor brethren, have addressed in terms so movingly appealing to the heart, to introduce their case before any charitable community of American friends, who may take an interest in remedying their condition and state. These are principally those who are personally known to me, who have large families, with a very scanty allowance from the "Rabbi's fund," and scarcely any means to support them. I have, therefore, in conformity to my promise to them, considered it my duty to introduce their plea and complaints before you, and all other friends who are actuated with a love for the temporal, as well as the spiritual welfare of the Jews. Should American friends be moved to promote this charitable purpose, I would say, that clothing of the common sort, such as trousers, shirts, vests, drawers, stockings, &c., and flannel and woolen stuffs for female dress, and any unsaleable cotton goods, would be highly acceptable and prized by these needy applicants. I am perhaps too bold in my requests on their behalf, but "the love of Christ constraineth me" to feel for their wants as if they were my own. In my father's last letter, we mentioned the case of one Mordecai, (who is an inquirer into Christianity,) with his family of little children, whose necessities are very pressing, from their scanty clothing exposing them to the cutting chills of winter, and to the burning heat of summer. These things I would prefer should be directed to me personally, as it would more effectually satisfy the applicants that I had performed my promise, and thus probably tend to win them over to have an interest in our Christian work of love.

The retirement of my father with his family to Artoss, has created a great sensation among the gentle-folks in the city, at the hazard of my father venturing to reside among the wild Arabs in the open valley of Bethlehem, depending only on the products of a farmer's life. But he, on the other side, being fully aware what he was about, and, to use his own words, "that even should his American friends desert the cause of Zion—which I believe they are engaged and laboring to establish—my own mind would still remain the same, unaltered, and I would, as hitherto, persevere ALONE with my ever-present Help—'the Divine assistance;'" knowing that the God of his father Abraham will never leave him nor forsake him—but make friends out of the natural enemies of Israel, even the wild and untamed Arabs.

I trust, therefore, that friends in America will not conclude that my father is at all discouraged in the work, which now constitutes his only support, and the avenue through which he expects to help his brethren unto Christ's benefits; but he daily loses many opportunities to improve his position to that end; first, from a want of sufficient means; secondly, from want of intelligent assistance.

I am, dear friends, yours truly,

ELIJAH MESHULLAM.

Another Victim.—Rev. Calvin Fairbanks, charged with stealing negroes, has been tried at Louisville, Ky., found guilty, and sentenced to be imprisoned in the Penitentiary for fifteen years.

"SPIRITUAL MANIFESTATIONS."

In the New York Herald of the 26th ult. we find the following:—

"On Tuesday evening, Dr. Scott gave a lecture on 'Spiritual Manifestations,' at Montague Hall, Brooklyn. He was accompanied on the stand by the Rev. Mr. Harris, pastor of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Eleventh Street, New York," &c.

Mr. Harris is not the pastor of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in New York, nor does he hold any ecclesiastical connection whatever with our denomination. The Seventh-day Baptists of this city hold their meetings weekly on Saturday—the seventh day of the week. Not being in the occupancy of their house of worship on the first day of the week, it has been their custom to rent it on that day to other congregations. In this way, the congregation over which Mr. H. presides has occupied it the past year, the same as the Episcopalians did previously. As a people, we disclaim all connection with "Spiritual Manifestations." Those who wish to become acquainted with our religious character, we trust, will not look to the Herald for information. T. B. B.

Revival in Boston.—The Christian Watchman and Reflector says that the revival in Boston not only continues but expands. Several of the Orthodox Congregational and Methodist churches are sharing in the rich fruits of the present harvest season. The agency of morning prayer meetings, and that of the union prayer meeting, which has been continued through months past, is believed to have exerted a happy influence in the commencement and promotion of this work. In fact, no agency appears to have been more honored by the Holy Spirit than that of the quiet, unostentatious meeting for conference and prayer. But little extra preaching has been had.

Revivals.—Zion's Herald reports revivals among the Methodists at Scarboro, Me., and at Saxonville, Chester Factories, Holmes Hole, and Salem, Mass. In Saxonville, the revival has been progressing for the last four months. The number received into the Methodist church on trial is one hundred. The Orthodox Congregational society in the same village has shared largely in the work.

The Morning Star gives intelligence of a number of revivals in Free-Will Baptist societies in different States. We notice among these, Pike; and First Columbus, N. Y.; Marcellon, Wisconsin; West Bolton, Vt.; North Bangor, Me.; Sparta, Alpine and Waverley, Michigan; and Hawpatch, Indiana.

Sunday Labor in Canada.—The Hamilton (Canada) Gazette says that because it appeared, by the evidence at the inquest lately held on the bodies of the ten men killed at Burlington Heights, on the line of the Great Western Railroad, that some of the men had worked on the Sunday before, and on one or two Sundays previous, the Mayor has issued his proclamation, enjoining the due observance of the Sunday. Also, that said proclamation be put up in some conspicuous place, in every hotel within the limits of the city. The foreman who was working on the Sunday has been brought before the city magistrate and heavily fined.

National Anti-Slavery Convention.—The Committees of the Ladies and Gentlemen of Cincinnati favorable to calling a Convention of the Friends of Freedom, have issued a call, inviting Delegates from all parts of the Union, at Cincinnati, April 27, 28, and 29, "to inquire what more can be done for the three millions of slaves in these United States, and to take such advance measures as a pure Christianity, a true patriotism, and an exalted charity, require of sound-hearted philanthropists." The call is signed by Christian A. Donaldson, Wm. A. Brisbane, Mrs. Sarah H. Ernest, Julia Harwood, and others, and the hospitalities of the city are offered to all who will be in attendance at the proposed Convention.

The Memory of Cooper.—A meeting in memory of the American novelist James Fennimore Cooper, and to aid in the erection of a statue to his name, was held in New York on the evening of Feb. 25. Daniel Webster presided, and a lengthy oration was delivered by Wm. Cullen Bryant, which was followed by brief addresses from several other persons, all in a strain of admiration for Cooper, over whose faults the grave seems to have thrown a mantle.

Sunday Railway Traveling.—Hereafter the night express passenger trains on the New York and Erie Railroad will run both ways every day (Sundays included) between Dunkirk and Elmira, and between New York and Elmira they will run as usual. The public are likely soon to be accomodated with facilities for traveling on Sundays as well as on other days.

Anti-Liquor-Law Meeting.—The opponents of the Liquor Law now before the Legislature of New York, held a mass meeting at Metropolitan Hall, New York, on the evening of Sixth-day last. The attendance was quite respectable for numbers, and the speeches of course spirited.

The Assembly of New York, last Sabbath morning, after a sitting of some nineteen hours, ejected from his seat Col. E. L. Snow, of New York. The controversy really turned on the temperance and anti-temperance question—Mr. S. being a leading advocate of the Maine Liquor Law.

Prof. Park says there is annually preached in the United States an amount which, if published, would make 120,000,000 octavo pages.

More than one-sixth of the deaths in Boston during the past two years, have been by that fearful scourge, consumption.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, FEB. 23.

In the SENATE, numerous petitions were presented, among which were several against Sunday Mails, and one praying Congress to protest against the violation of the law of nations by armed interventions. Various reports on private bills were then made. Mr. Geyer, from the Judiciary Committee, to whom was referred the petition from Rhode Island asking for the liberation of Drayton and Sears, now confined in Washington Jail for aiding slaves to escape from their masters, reported the same back, and asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, which was agreed to. The private bills ordered to be engrossed on Friday, were taken up and passed, and then the Senate adjourned.

The HOUSE was not in session.

THIRD-DAY, FEB. 24.

The SENATE listened to a large number petitions, including several against Sunday Mails. A bill was reported to increase the pay of the army and navy engaged in California and Oregon. The bill granting land to Iowa for railroad purposes was then taken up, and Mr. Geyer made a long speech in favor of it.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Briggs presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New York asking for the removal of the Mint from Philadelphia to New York. The House then resumed the consideration of the bill granting the right of way and a donation of public land to Missouri to aid in the construction of a Railroad from St. Josephs to Hannibal and from St. Louis to the western line of that State. Mr. Orr spoke in favor of it; and Mr. Welch gave notice of an amendment, which he prefaced with remarks. Before he concluded, the morning hour had expired, and the House went into Committee on the bill explanatory of the Bounty Land Law of 1850, and for other purposes. Amendments were offered and debated in five-minutes speeches, but no conclusion was arrived at when the Committee rose.

FOURTH-DAY, FEB. 25.

In the SENATE, Mr. Hunter reported a Bill to establish a Branch Mint in New York, with a proviso, "that the act shall not take effect until the Legislature of New York shall have passed such a law as may protect all the property, real and personal, connected with the Mint, from all taxation without the consent of the United States; nor shall this act be in force until the Government of the city of New York shall tender such a site for the Mint as may be satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury, and make to the United States a clear title to the same by proper conveyances." A bill amending the present warehousing system was also reported. The Iowa Railroad Bill was then taken up, and Mr. Geyer concluded his speech in favor of it. Mr. Underwood followed in support and defense of his amendment, which distributes among the seventeen States in which no Public Lands lie, 15,000,000 of acres of land.

The HOUSE spent the morning hour in discussing a bill giving the right of way and donations of public lands to aid in the construction of the St. Louis and St. Josephs Railroad in Missouri; Mr. Welch of Ohio, and Mr. Bennett of New York being the principal speakers. Then, after a short time spent in considering Kossuth's letter of thanks, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, and took up the bill explanatory of the Bounty Land Act of September, 1850. After having debated the bill at some length, and voted on an amendment, the Committee rose, and the bill was reported to the House; whereupon a motion to adjourn was made and carried.

FIFTH-DAY, FEB. 26.

In the SENATE, after the presentation of petitions, a Select Committee on Mexican claims was chosen. Then followed a personal explanation by Mr. Rhett, on remarks of Messrs. Cass and Clemens. Finally, the non-intervention resolutions were taken up, and Mr. Miller read a speech in favor of the present policy of non-intervention. Mr. Seward then obtained the floor, and the subject was postponed till the 29th of March.

The HOUSE had under consideration the bill explanatory of the Bounty Land Law of Sept. 1850, and for the purpose of providing additional compensation to Land Officers who locate the Warrants, and extending the provisions of the law to a new class of cases. It was amended, and read a third time, but pending the question of its passage, the House adjourned.

SIXTH-DAY, FEB. 27.

In the SENATE, the whole day was taken up by a bitter personal explanation between Senators Rhett of South Carolina and Clemens of Alabama. It is quite likely that a duel may result from it.

The HOUSE took up the Bill explanatory of the Bounty Land Law of 1850; and pending the question of its passage, Mr. Fowler moved to lay it on the table—a motion which carried—100 ayes, 84 noes; so the bill was killed. A bill was passed to extend the time of the Commission on Brazilian claims. Mr. Churchwell (Tenn.) introduced a bill granting Public Lands to the several States, for a permanent and efficient system of Common Schools. Mr. Chandler (Pa.) introduced a bill granting Public Lands to Pennsylvania, to aid in the construction of the Sunbury and Erie Railroad. Both were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on Private Bills. Several were reported without action, when the House adjourned till Second-day.

SABBATH-DAY, FEB. 28.

The SENATE galleries were crowded in expectation of the continuance of the Rhett and Clemens controversy. Clemens finished his speech, and Rhett replied. In demeanor and language, the latter had decidedly the advantage. He stated that he should not challenge Mr. Clemens, for the reason that his religious convictions are opposed to fighting duels. He has long been a member of a church, and, as such, fears to offend God more than to incur the disapprobation of man. Mr. Clemens admitted the validity of this excuse, and said that had he known Mr. Rhett was a church member, he would not have used such provoking language toward him. The subject was finally postponed for two weeks, and the Senate adjourned.

European News.

The steamer Atlantic, with four days later news from Europe, arrived at New York Feb. 26.

Lord John Russell had introduced his new Reform Bill into the House of Commons. It enlarges the boroughs which are notoriously small, that is, those with only 500 inhabitants, but studiously avoids everything like equal electoral districts. It reduces the property qualification of voters, so that householders, in towns and cities, occupying tenements that pay £2 rent, shall be endowed with the franchise, as are persons paying £20 rent in the country. Hitherto £10 rent has been the qualification in town, and £50 in the country. All who pay £2 direct taxes are also to be voters under this bill. The property qualification for members is to be abolished, and that clause in the oath of office which requires a member to profess himself a Christian, is to be stricken out.

Of the recent disaster at Holmfirth, the following particulars are given:—

"At the village of Holmfirth, near Huddersfield, a reservo r used for supplying the woolen mills and a number of the dwellings in the neighborhood with water, and known as the Holme Reservoir, on Thursday morning, Feb. 8th, about 1 o'clock, burst with a tremendous roar, and the water rushed down the valley with terrific force, carrying away an immense mill, built of stone, with all its heavy machinery, &c., several out-buildings, two rows of new houses at Holmfirth, and part of the village of Hinchliffe Mills. Nearly all the inhabitants were asleep at the time, and were swept to a considerable distance, a number of bodies having been taken from the river fifteen miles from the spot.

"In the neighborhood of Holmfirth, upward of sixty lifeless bodies have been found, and it is likely that many more will yet be discovered when the waters further subside. In one row of houses swept away, there were fifty-four persons. Holmfirth presented a scene of ruin and desolation such as has seldom been witnessed in this country. The number of lives sacrificed by the flood in the neighborhood of Holmfirth is now ascertained to be upward of 100, and the damage sustained is estimated at the enormous sum of £600,000. One family, said to be worth £30,000 the day previous to the bursting of the embankment, has been left penniless, their entire property having been swept away by the devastating deluge which poured upon it.

"At Holmebridge, a little further down the river, the church was inundated, the pews being lifted from their position and thrown transversely in rows across the aisle; the walls inclosing the yard were thrown down; gravestones were torn up, and coffins and corpses floated out of the new graves down the river. Near the center of Holmfirth, at Upper Bridge, the flood burst through the Elephant and Castle public house, and made a complete wreck of the furniture, but the inhabitants escaped. The battlements of the bridge were carried away. A three-story house adjoining the bridge, with its owner, Mr. Haner Bailey, tailor, and his wife and two children, were all swept away. Mr. Bailey was afterward rescued, but his family perished.

"On the night of the occurrence, it is said that upward of fifty people were on the embankment watching the result, amid the driving storm, of the constant influx of water. Had it not been that some of these parties rushed down the valley and roused the people from their slumbers, many more lives would have been sacrificed. The rushing torrent of water, however, overtook them a little beyond the entrance of the populous town of Holmfirth."

Feargus O'Connor, the Chartist Member of Parliament, has been sent to prison for seven days, by a Bow-st. Police Magistrate, for assaulting a Police Constable. Feargus is supposed to be crazy.

A dispatch is published, which Lord Granville, the new Foreign Secretary, has addressed to Foreign Courts, in reference to the revolutionary proceedings of refugees in England. He says the Government can't expel them, but will restrain them by all legal means, and that it would be unfair if the Continental Governments should molest honest English travelers because their exiles receive hospitality in England.

The Queen of Spain has recovered from the wound inflicted at the late attempt to kill her.

The Austrian Lloyd states that Patacki, the Hungarian who was arrested at Rendsburg on a charge of attempting to seduce some Hungarian regiments from their allegiance to the Emperor, and of being an agent of Kossuth and Mazzini, and who, upon these charges, had been sentenced to death by an Austrian court-martial on the 30th ult., was executed on the 5th inst. On the same day a person named Goslar was executed, upon a charge of high treason, by conspiring to bring about a revolution.

A powder magazine at Loudden, near Lidingobro, Sweden, exploded on the 24th. The shock shattered several thousand panes of glass in the city of Stockholm, particularly in the palace. The magazine contained 2,800 cwt. of gunpowder, and the loss is estimated at 115,000 thalers. Two bodies only have been found among the ruins.

Three Days Later.

The steamship Africa, with three days later news from Europe, arrived at New York last Sabbath.

Nothing important in Parliment. There had been a discussion as to applying the Parliamentary Reform Bill to Scotland and Ireland. Leave was given to bring in a bill to that effect.

Mr. Layard, who was long attached to the Embassy at Constantinople, but who is better known by his discoveries at Nineveh, has been appointed Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

A body has been washed ashore at Bedford, North Devon, supposed to be that of one of the Amazon unfortunates. Two casks of oil, much charred, were found floating at sea off Weymouth and Shoreham.

In France, the decree ordering the liberation of some of the political prisoners has led to some disturbance in some of the Departments where the population is badly disposed. The people understood that a general amnesty was proclaimed, and that the authorities were placing every obstacle in its way.

The Swiss journals mention that the Government of the Republic is in a state of great alarm on account of a new note which has been sent to it by the French Government. The latter not only insists on the expulsion of all the French refugees who are suspected of plotting against the Government of their country—to which demand the Swiss Government at once, and without the slightest hesitation, gave its consent—but it insists on the Swiss government closing all unions, and on its employing energetic measures against any popular manifestations which have been got up in that country for the purpose of forcing the Government to have new elections.

An order has been issued forbidding the entry of any more English Bibles into Austria, and the schools established by the Missionaries have been closed by the police.

The Italian journals state that in the village of Temu, a short distance from Bergamo, a terrible fire broke out during the night, and two hundred dwellings were consumed. The old women and many cattle perished, and nearly forty persons were more or less hurt while endeavoring to extinguish the flames.

A horrible accident has happened at Mayence, on the Rhine. A party of Austrian sappers, on leaving their work in the passages under the fortifications, locked in one of their comrades by mistake. On his non-appearance it was supposed he had deserted, and no search was made in the excavations. The place was not opened until six days afterwards, and the man was found still alive, though he had bitten the flesh of his arms in hunger or madness. He died a few hours afterward.

California News.

The steamships Prometheus and Crescent City, from San Juan and Chagres, arrived at New York on the 28th and 29th Feb., bringing California dates to Feb. 2, and nearly two million dollars in gold dust.

The mining news from California is favorable. There had been more rain, and the washings were doing well. Quartz mining was attracting large attention, and the results of the mills which were working were such as to attract capital to similar enterprises. Gold dust was more plenty in San Francisco, and the tendency was downward. The standard price was $17 50 per oz.

The San Francisco Custom-House books show that $34,000,000 in gold dust was shipped from that port during the year ending Dec. 25, 1851.

A few bloody rencontres have taken place in various parts of the State, but these occurrences are each month growing more rare.

Col. Fremont came passenger by this arrival. He brings his wife and daughter, with whom he proposes making the tour of Europe.

An important piece of intelligence reaches us by the way of the Dalles, in Oregon, which states that great excitement exists among the Mormons at the Great Salt Lake. The difficulties between that people and our Government agents have made them resolve upon defending themselves against further interference with their affairs on the part of the General Government.

The Panama Echo says:—"We have conversed with very many of the passengers now here, and ascertain that the amount of funds calculated upon by them, to defray their expenses to San Francisco, fell far below the liable cost. They say, that the general impression of their own communities is defective in the same way. Once more, then, we would say, that no man desiring to go to California should have one cent less than $250 after arriving at Chagres, even for traveling in the cheapest style. Parties should have just as much in proportion for each individual member. Those who have it to bring, should not come with less than $300—and those who have not $250 had much better stay at home, whatever their situation be."

"China" is the name of a large settlement near Jackson, composed entirely of Celestials. They are a very quiet and industrious community, and have done much toward unfolding the vast resources of this County. A large number of Chinese passed through Mokelumne the past week, en route for the camp above named. Additions from the late arrivals from Hong Kong are daily flocking into this County, and before long we may expect to see quite a town where Little China now stands.

The farmers of Ion Valley are making extensive preparations for putting in heavy crops during the present year. Large quantities of ground are already plowed and sown with every description of vegetables, the staples being corn, oats, barley and hay. Beef is remarkably scarce in this place at the present time, and a few herds of good cattle would sell well. Bullocks are now worth from 18 to 20 cents per pound, on foot.

A ledge of Marble and Limestone has recently been discovered twenty-five miles above Sacramento on the Placerville road. The specimens exhibited us, are beautifully variegated, and the lime burned is of the finest quality for building. The deposit is sufficiently extensive to afford an exhaustless supply.

Terrible Tragedy in Iowa.

A dispatch dated St. Louis, Wednesday, Feb. 25, 1852, says: We learn from Burlington, Iowa, that a terrible tragedy was enacted on Friday last, near Fort Snelling, which for fiendishness and cold-blooded atrocity has seldom been equaled. It appears that some five years since a man named Wm. Wingate, and possessed of considerable property, settled with his family in Pottawattomie County, in Iowa, and took up a large tract of land. Soon after he became a convert to Mormonism, and abandoned his family, but about a year since returned and claimed possession of his property, which was all yielded to him by his sons, two of whom had married during his absence; and the mother and sons refusing the overtures toward a reconciliation, removed and settled a short distance from Fort Snelling. Wingate seems, since that time, to have associated himself with a gang of half-breeds, of the most lawless character, and on Thursday last, in company with several of them, again visited his family, and claimed shelter. His sons offered every hospitality to him, but would not admit his companions, and they all accordingly left together, but on Friday night returned again, and on being refused admittance, and the door being closed against them, they fired upon the inmates, killing Mrs. Wingate and the eldest of the two young men. They subsequently set fire to the building, and as the surviving inmates attempted to escape, the two young women were killed, and the dwelling and outhouses then burned to ashes.

FROM THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.—The bark Ocean Wave, from Cape Town, Cape of Good Hope, arrived at Boston Feb. 25th, bringing intelligence to Jan. 1st.

The war at the Cape still progresses. The latest accounts from the Interior bring but little news, but what there is, is discouraging. The English force on the Kei amounts to 4,000 men, but they had made no progress, and had suffered much. The enemy, in the mean time, were acting with increased audacity near the border forts.

The whole country is flooded, owing to excessive rains, and much property has been destroyed. The troops were without tents, wagons, or any shelter whatever. The Cape Town paper says: It seems as if Heaven was fighting against them, for when success was almost within their grasp, the clouds opened their deluge upon them, preventing all military operations.

During the year 1851 there were about 20 engagements, of more or less magnitude, between the English and the Kaffirs; the loss of the former being less than 500, while the latter have been killed by thousands. Still they do not appear to be any the less numerous.

Accounts have been received from an expedition sent to explore the interior of Southern Africa. Large rivers, fertile valleys, and powerful black tribes, are described.

FORTUNES OF A CALIFORNIAN.—Many of our readers will remember the account published in all the newspapers, nearly two years ago, of a California emigrant, who crossed the plains "on foot and alone," with a wheelbarrow, conveying all his earthly goods, that is, his provisions, clothes, tools, &c., in that humble vehicle, and outstripping in his march numbers who started for the land of gold with more showy and expensive appointments. His name was Brookmire, and he is an Irishman by birth. His residence, says The Syracuse Journal, is at Warren, in Pennsylvania, where he left a wife and family of children in very indigent circumstances, when he went over the Rocky Mountains to "try his fortune." Brookmire has lately returned from California, with about $15,000 of the "dust," all of which he dug and washed out with his own hands. And, as it is very apt to pour when it rains, his wife received legacies during his absence to the amount of $10,000, falling to her upon the death of some relations in Scotland.

THE CAPITAL OF UTAH.—A writer in The National Intelligencer states that Brigham Young and his associates, being well satisfied that upon a fair representation of facts to Government by the returned Judges, the civil authority of the Territory would be withdrawn from their control, have, with their usual cunning, located the capital in one of the most out-of-the way, inconvenient and unsafe districts to be found within the limits of the Territory, with the view not only to expose the officers who might be sent there to Indian hostilities, but to remove them so far from Salt Lake City as to prevent their taking cognizance of crime and offenses there, over which the Church claims to exercise exclusive jurisdiction. Recent letters from Salt Lake City announce these as the reasons for the act.

SUMMARY.

A melancholy event occurred near Lockport on Saturday, Feb. 21. The house of William Gibson took fire, he and his wife being absent, and their only three children were smothered to death. The eldest was five years, and the youngest but one year old. Mr. Gibson, at great personal risk, succeeded in saving the bodies of his unfortunate children, and the distracted mother was with difficulty prevented from plunging into the flames.

Dr. Ray, Principal of the Rhode Island Insane Hospital, reports its flourishing condition. The number of patients is 127; 54 have been discharged during the year; 26 have recovered, 8 improved, 4 unimproved, and 16 have died. The Dr. estimates the number of insane persons in the State at 420, of whom only 180 are receiving the benefits of the hospital.

A letter from John E. Gowan, Esq., the contractor for removing the remains of the U. S. steam frigate Missouri, dated Gibralter, Jan. 14, states that all the machinery has been removed, except the shafts, which would be taken out in the spring. The light which has been kept for eight years over the wreck has been dispensed with.

The emigration to California is having a disastrous effect upon the western farmers in the prices of labor. In Jackson County, Michigan, 500 young men, it is stated, are going to the gold country. The excitement is similar in the surrounding counties, and farmers have to pay $26 a month and board for working hands.

Since the first day of November last, the agent of the California Steam Transportation Co., in Cleveland, has sent to his employers $95,000 which was received by him for passage money from persons bound to California. This immense amount of money has been received from persons principally in Ohio and Indiana.

A correspondent of The Boston Traveler states it as a fact, that Biela's Comet was rent in twain in November, 1845. The two pieces were seen, both from Europe and America; one brighter and larger than the other, and side by side they retired in the same path the unbroken comet would have pursued.

The Southern Press says that there are twelve thousand marriageable girls in Lowell. This last year there were only six hundred married, and The Press makes the melancholy reflection that at this rate it would take twenty years for them all to get married—and a large majority would become old maids.

A bill is before the Louisiana Legislature requiring every person desirous of emancipating a slave, to give a bond to the Governor, before doing so, for his transportation beyond the limits of the State. In case such slave neglects to leave the State, he is to forfeit his freedom.

Notice was lately given by an agent or owner from the South, of a colored man residing in New York, whom he claimed to be a slave. The party, with others, went to where he was supposed to be, but it was ascertained that the man had left the City about fifteen days ago.

In New York, on Sixth-day last, Otto Grunzig was hung for the murder of his wife. His execution had been postponed by the Governor once or twice, to enable his friends to collect testimony in his favor which was alledged to exist.

In 1840 the population of Long Island was only 110,315; in 1850 it had reached to the number of 211,557, and in all probability in 1860 the population will exceed 400,000. At the present time Long Island has a larger population than any one of the seven small States, which have two Senators each in Congress.

On the 12th of January last, a band of 70 robbers, well mounted and armed, fell upon a village in the State of Jalisco, Mexico, and plundered its people of above $30,000 worth of plate and horses. A pleasant state of society that.

A dispatch dated Indianapolis, Wednesday, Feb. 25, 1852, says: Hon. Ethan Allen Brown, who had acted during yesterday as one of the Vice-Presidents of the Indiana Democratic Convention, died last night, a few moments after reaching his hotel, without a struggle.

A young man named Haines has been arrested at Middletown, Va., on charge of having robbed the U. S. mail. It is said that the robberies are quite extensive, and that Haines acknowledges his guilt.

Fourteen bags, containing in all $7,500 in specie, were found buried in the sand at Falmouth, Mass., on Saturday night, Feb. 21. This is supposed to be about one-half of the specie alleged to have been stolen from the wreck of the bark Missouri.

The oldest inhabitant of Minnesota is Jean Baptiste Farribault, of Moadota, who visited St. Peters County in 1798. He is about 80 years of age. More than 60 years ago he emigrated from Canada as one of the North-west Fur Company.

The steamship Baltic, the largest of Collins' Line, has been on a week's excursion to Washington, to show the Congressmen what American steamships are, and induce them to make liberal appropriations for the support of the line.

Within the last year, forty-eight ships have been added to the fleet of whalers belonging to New Bedford. Nearly half the importation of sperm and whale oil, for the whole country, is entered at that port.

On Sunday morning Feb. 29, the steeple of the Unitarian Church, Syracuse, N. Y., was blown down, falling upon the body of the house and and adjoining dwelling house, which were crushed.—Loss $6000.

A colony of planters is organizing in South Carolina, with from five to eight hundred slaves. They have sent a memorial to the California Legislature, asking leave to settle there with their slaves.

DIED.

On the 17th ult., at Potter's Hill, Westerly, R. I., of pleurisy, GEORGE POTTER, 29 years of age, the son of Joseph and Mary Potter. His health had not been as good as usual for several weeks, and from the time he was attacked with the complaint above named, he lived only about ten days. He was a member of the first Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton, R. I., and was justly esteemed as one of the most promising young men in the vicinity; especially because, to a retiring and unassuming disposition, and sound judgment, were joined in him a strong attachment to the cause of Christ, and a deportment so uniformly discreet and kind as to win the esteem of all who knew him. And he having been so suddenly taken from our midst, the recollection of those valuable traits of character induces a feeling of sympathy for his afflicted parents, who are left childless by this painful event.

As it has been requested that the following lines should be forwarded for insertion in the Sabbath Recorder, in connection with the above notice, it may be proper to say, that they formed part of the discourse preached on the death of Bro. Potter, from the text—"All flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of the grass. The grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away." 1 Peter 1: 24

As grows the grass in yonder meadow wide,
Where the clear river's nurt'ring waters glide,
When June's warm sunshine brightens vale and hill,
And flowers of promise fringe each winding rill;
So man comes forth beneath a favoring sky,
Grows up maturing, till the admiring eye,
Pleased with the grace and dignity he wears,
Dotes on, and in that grace and glory shares.
And on him loved-one, father, mother, build
A train of hopes, which gay-plumed Fancy gilds,
And decorates in splendor from the store
Wrought by her genius from her tinsel ore.
Yet, as the grass so fresh, and oderous flowers,
Warmed by the sun, and nourished by the showers,
Fall in their beauty at the mower's feet,
Or wither from the drought and burning heat,
Or fade, touched by the frost of autumn eves,
As when she dips in blood the proud oak's leaves;
So fades man's glory; and his dying sighs
We hear, while Fancy's vision from us flies.
We see no more that form, except in dreams;
Nor see that eye's soft light, except it gleams
From where in kindred orbs it sometimes glows,
And for a moment the same radiance shows.
We hear that voice no more; its tones were hushed,
When Death's dread dead-fall, like an av'lanch crushed
The noble frame-work and symmetric form
Of man, as when the driving, drenching storm,
Beats on the lofty, rocky mountain's brow,
And 'neath the jutting cliff, as with a plough,
Gorging its ancient bed, its dreadful fall
Shivers the mountain pine, so straight, so tall,
And lays its waving tassels on the ground,
And through the forest sends the trembling sound;
Then all is silent, and the forests sleep,
While roots and branches for the body weep.
Yes, such is flesh; and such its glory here.
But think not thus, at last, ends man's career;
For, while we brood in sadness o'er him slain,
He listens to the soul-entrancing strain,
Chanted by angels on yon flowery mount,
And drinks, where flow life's waters from their fount.
Such is our Brother, as we fondly hope;
Though so untimely passed this earthly cope.
Oh, the conception! Oh, the hope sublime!
Oh, the vast gain! Eternity for time!
Then, man, look up; oh! haste where endless life
Succeeds the present scene of death and strife;
And build thy habitation in that clime,
Beyond the reach of death—the dirge of time;
Where, in thy Maker's image, thou mayest grow,
And in the brightness of His glory glow.

The Sabbath Recorder,

Published Weekly.

Terms—$2 00 per Annum, in advance.

The Sabbath Recorder is devoted to the exposition and vindication of the views and movements of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. It aims to promote vital piety and vigorous benevolent action, at the same time that it urges obedience to the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus. Its columns are open to the advocacy of all reformatory measures which seem likely to improve the condition of society, diffuse knowledge, reclaim the inebriate, and enfranchise the enslaved. In its Literary and Intelligence Departments, care is taken to furnish matter adapted to the wants and tastes of every class of readers. As a Religious and Family Newspaper, it is intended that the Recorder shall rank among the best.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co. have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call. that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Two Living Aztec Children.

A NEW AND ABSOLUTELY UNIQUE RACE OF MANKIND.—The most extraordinary and inexplicable phenomena that the history of the human race has yet produced, can be seen for a few weeks at the large Exhibition Room of the Society Library, corner of Broadway and Leonard-street. They were recently taken from a newly-discovered and idolatrous people in Central America, by whom they were kept with superstitious veneration, distinct and secluded as a caste of their priesthood, and employed as Mimes and Bacchanals in their Pagan ceremonies and worship.

They are male and female. The latter measuring 29½ inches in height, weighing 17 lbs.; the former is 33 inches high, and weighs 20 lbs.

From repeated and careful examination, the best Physiologists state the older to be 12 or 13 years of age; the younger about 10 years.

They differ altogether from examples of the dwarf kind, and from children; affording complete and undeniable illustration of a Piamean variety of the Human Race!

Miscellaneous.

☞ FRANCIS C. WOODWORTH, editor of the Youth's Cabinet, sailed in the steamer of Feb. 21st, for a six-months' tour of Europe. During his absence, he will furnish notices of his adventures for each number of his magazine, and will also correspond regularly with one or two New York papers. The following adieu to his country, we copy from Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet for March:

"The Friends I leave behind Me."

BY FRANCIS C. WOODWORTH.

Adieu, Columbia, adieu!
Though I must leave thee, yet I love thee,
And my fond heart shall still be true,
True to the flag that floats above thee.
Where'er I roam, or far or near,
Shall memory oft of thee remind me;
My spirit still will linger here,
Amid the friends I leave behind me.

Home of my sires! beneath thy breast
Lost ones, too fondly loved, are sleeping;
Land of all lands on earth the best,
I leave these treasures in thy keeping.
Until this hour I never knew
How strong the cords of love could bind me—
How dear the home I bid adieu—
How dear the friends I leave behind me.

My home, my native land, adieu!
I'll bless thee ever, till I perish.
Shall I return, and shall I view
Again the forms of those I cherish?
I cannot tell; yet this I know:
Whate'er the lot by Heaven assigned me—
Or life or death, or weal or woe—
I'll bless the friends I leave behind me.

The Maine Liquor Law in New York.

In the Assembly of New York, on the 24th of February, Mr. Snow, from the Select Committee on Temperance and Intemperance, presented a Report, accompanied with a Bill, embodying the principal features of the Maine Liquor Law. An effort was made to lay it on the table for a week, but was defeated by a majority of six. It was then referred to the Committee of the Whole, with a resolution to print ten thousand copies. As the subject is in itself vastly important, and is likely to be extensively discussed, every person ought to make himself familiar with it. We therefore copy the Bill entire.

AN ACT entitled an Act to prevent pauperism, crime, and taxation, by the suppression of drinking and tippling houses.

The People of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. No person shall be allowed, at any time, to sell, by himself, his clerk, servant, or agent, directly or indirectly, or to sell or furnish, under pretense of giving any spirituous or intoxicating liquors, or any mixed liquors, a part of which is spirituous or intoxicating, except as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. The Supervisor of any town, and the Mayor of any city, on the first Tuesday of June, annually, or as soon thereafter as may be convenient, may appoint some suitable person, who shall not be an inn or tavern keeper, in each town and city, or ward of any city, as the agent of said town, city, or ward, to sell at some central and convenient place within said town, city, or ward, spirits, wines, or other intoxicating liquors to be used for medicinal, mechanical and sacramental purposes, and no other; and said agent shall receive such compensation for his services as the officer appointing him shall prescribe; and shall, in the sale of such liquors, conform to such rules and regulations as the Supervisor or the Mayor aforesaid shall prescribe for that purpose. And such agent, appointed as aforesaid, shall hold his situation for one year, unless sooner removed by the officer from whom he received his appointment, as he may be at any time, at the pleasure of said officer.

SEC. 3. Such agent shall receive a certificate from the officer by whom he has been appointed, authorizing him, as the agent of such town, city, or ward, to sell intoxicating liquors for medicinal, mechanical, or sacramental purposes only; but such certificate shall not be delivered to the person so appointed, until he shall have executed and delivered to said officer a bond, with two good and sufficient sureties in the sum of six hundred dollars, in substance as follows:

Know all men that we, as principal, and and as sureties, are held and firmly bound to the inhabitants of the town of , (or city, as the case may be,) in the sum of six hundred dollars, to be paid them, to which payment we bind ourselves, our heirs, executors, and adminstrators firmly by these presents. Sealed with our seals, and dated this day of A. D. . The condition of the obligation is such that, whereas, the above bounden has been duly appointed an agent for the Town, City, or Ward, intoxicating liquors for medicinal, mechanical, or sacramental purposes, and no other, until the of A. D. , unless sooner removed from such agency. Now, if the said shall in all respects conform to the provisions of the law, relating to the business for which he is appointed, and to such rules and regulations as now are, or shall be from time to time, established by the officer making the appointment, then this obligation to be void, otherwise to remain in full force.

SEC. 4. If any person, by himself, clerk, servant or agent, shall at any time sell any spirituous or intoxicating liquors, or any mixed liquors, part of which are intoxicating, in violation of the provisions of this act, (always excepting the manufacturer or importer, who may sell to such agent or agents, or to persons engaged in chemical or mechanical employments, for their specific objects, or to such person or persons as may be conducting or transporting the liquor or liquors to some place in or out of the State for lawful sale,) he shall forfeit and pay on the first conviction ten dollars and the cost of prosecution, and shall stand committed until the same be paid; on the second conviction he shall pay twenty dollars and the cost of prosecution, and shall stand committed until the same be paid; on the third and every subsequent conviction he shall pay twenty dollars and the cost of prosecution, and shall be imprisoned in the common jail not less than three months nor more than six months; and if any clerk, servant, agent or other person in the employment or on the premises of another, shall violate the provisions of this section, he shall be held equally guilty with the principal, and on conviction shall suffer the same penalty.

SEC. 5. Any forfeiture or penalty arising under the above section may be recovered by the action of debt or complaint before any Justice of the Peace, or Judge, or any municipal or police court, in the county where the offense was committed. And the forfeiture so recovered shall go to the town or city where the convicted party resides, for the use of the poor, after deducting the costs of prosecution, including counsel fees; and the prosecutor or complainant may be admitted as a witness on the trial. And if any Supervisor or Mayor shall approve of the commencement of any such suit, by endorsing his name upon the summons or complaint, the defendant shall in no event recover any costs. And it shall be the duty of the Mayor and Aldermen, or Overseer of the Poor of any city, and the Supervisor and Overseer of the poor of any town, to commence action against any person guilty of a violation of any of the provisions of this act, on being informed of the same, and being furnished with proof of the fact.

SEC. 6. In case the Mayor, or any Alderman, or Overseer of the Poor, or Supervisor of any city or ward, or the Supervisor or Overseer of the Poor of any town shall fail to perform the duties assigned him by the last preceding section, any other person may assume and perform the same in the name of the Overseer of the Poor or Supervisor by giving security to the Court or officer before whom he prosecutes, for the payment of all costs if he shall fail to recover judgment, and making oath that such Overseer or Supervisor has had (10) ten days notice of the offense and has neglected to prosecute the same; and in all cases of such recovery under this section, one half of the sum recovered shall go to the complainant or person prosecuting in the name of such Supervisor or Overseer of the Poor.

SEC. 7. If any person shall claim an appeal from a judgment rendered against him by any Judge or Justice, on trial of such action or complaint, he shall, before the appeal be allowed, recognize in the sum of one hundred dollars, with too good and sufficient sureties in every case so appealed, to prosecute his appeal, and to pay all costs, fines, and penalties that may be awarded against him upon a final disposition of suit or complaint. And before his appeal shall be allowed, he shall also in every case give a bond, with two other good and sufficient sureties, running to the town or city where the offense was committed, in the sum of two hundred dollars, that he will not, during the pendency of such appeal, violate any of the provisions of this act. And no recognizance or bond shall be taken in cases arising under this act, except by the Justice or Judge before whom the trial was had. The forfeiture for all bonds and recognizance given in pursuance of this act, shall go to the town or city where the offense was committed, for the use of the poor; and if the recognizances and bonds mentioned in this section shall not be given within forty-eight, hours after the judgment, the appeal shall not be allowed; the defendant in the meantime to stand committed.

SEC. 8. The Mayor of any city, and the Supervisor of any town, whenever complaint shall be made to them that a breach of the conditions of the bond given by any person appointed under this act, has been committed, shall notify the person complained of, and if, upon a hearing of the parties, it shall appear that any breach has been committed, they shall revoke and make void his appointment. And whenever a breach of any bond given to the inhabitants of any city or town in pursuance of any of the provisions of this act, shall be made known to the Mayor and Aldermen, or Supervisor, or shall in any manner come to their knowledge, they, or some one of them, shall, at the expense and for the use of said city or town, cause the bond to be put in suit, in any court proper to try the same.

SEC. 9. No person engaged in the unlawful traffic in intoxicating liquors, shall be competent to sit upon any Jury in any case arising under this act. And when information shall be communicated to the Court that any member of any panel is engaged in such traffic, or that he is believed to be so engaged, the Court shall inquire of the Juryman of whom such belief is entertained, and no answer which he shall make shall be used against him in any case arising under this act; but if he shall answer falsely, he shall be incapable of serving on any Jury in this State; but he may decline to answer, in which case he shall be discharged by the Court from all further attendance as a Juryman.

SEC. 10. All cases arising under this act, whether by action, indictment, or complaint, shall take prcedence in said court of all other business, except those criminal cases in which the parties are actually under arrest awaiting a trial; and the court and prosecuting officer shall not have authority to enter a notle prosequi, or to put the cause over in any case arising under this act, except when the purposes of justice shall require it.

SEC. 11. If any three persons, voters in the town or city where the complaint shall be made, shall, before any Justice of the Peace or Judge of any Municipal or Police Court, make complaint, under oath or affirmation, that they have reason to believe, and do believe, that spirituous or intoxicating liquors, by some person not authorized to sell the same in said city, ward or town, under the provisions of this act, are kept, or deposited, in any store, shop, warehouse or other building, vessel, float or place in said city, ward or town, said Justice or Judge shall issue his warrant of search to any Sheriff, City Marshal or Deputy, or to any Constable, or Special Marshal or Constable to be appointed by the Judge or Court, who shall proceed to search the premises described in said warrant, and if any spirituous or intoxicating liquors are found therein, he shall seize the same and convey them to some proper place of security, where he shall keep them until final action is had thereon. But no dwelling house in which, or in part of which, a shop is not kept, shall be searched, unless at least one of said complainants shall testify to some act of sale of intoxicating liquors therein, by the occupant thereof, or by his consent or permission, within a least one month of the time of making said complaints, and contrary to this act. And the owner or keeper of liquors, seized as aforesaid, if he shall be known to the officer seizing the same, shall be summoned forthwith before the Justice or Judge by whose warrant the liquor was seized, and if he fails to appear, or unless he can show by positive proof that he lawfully holds under the provisions of this act, they shall be declared forfeited, and shall be destroyed by authority of the written order to that effect, of said Justice or Judge, and in his presence, or in the presence of some person appointed by him to witness the destruction thereof, and who shall join with the officers by whom they shall have been destroyed in attesting the facts upon the back of the order by authority of which it was done. And the person in whose possession the liquor was found shall pay the costs, or stand committed until paid.

SEC. 12. It shall be the duty of any Mayor, Alderman, Supervisior, Assessor, City Marshal or Deputy or Constable, or Police Officer, if he shall have information that any intoxicating liquors are kept or sold in any tent, shanty, hut or place of any kind, for selling refreshments in any public place on or near the ground of any cattle show, agricultural exhibition, military muster, or public occasion of any kind, to search such suspected place, and if such officer shall find upon the premises any intoxicating drinks, he shall seize them and arrest the keeper or keepers of such place, and take them forthwith, or as soon as may be, before any Justice or Judge of a Municipal or Police Court, with the liquors so found or seized; and upon proof that such liquors are intoxicating, that they were found in the possession of the accused, in a tent, shanty or other place as aforesaid, he or they shall pay the costs of prosecution, and shall be sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail for thirty days, and the liquors so seized shall be destroyed by order of said Justice or Judge.

SEC. 13. If any person arrested under the preceeding section, and sentenced as aforesaid, shall claim an appeal, before his appeal shall be allowed he shall give a bond in the sum of one hundred dollars, with two good and sufficient sureties, that he will prosecute his appeal and pay all fines, costs and penalties which may be awarded against him. And if, on such appeal, the verdict of the Jury shall be against him, he shall, in addition to the penalty awarded by the lower Court, pay a fine of twenty dollars. In all cases of appeal, under this act, from the judgment of a Justice or Judge of any Municipal or Police Court, to the County Court, they shall be conducted in say County Court by the prosecuting officer of the Government, and said officer shall be entitled to receive all costs taxable to the State in criminal proceedings under this act, in addition to the salary allowed to such officer by law; but no costs, in such cases, shall be remitted or reduced by the prosecuting officer of the Court. In any suit, complaint, indictment, or other proceeding against any person for a violation of any of the provisions of this act, other than for the first offense, it shall not be requisite to set forth, particularly, the record of a former conviction, but it shall be sufficient to alledge, briefly that such person has been convicted of a violation of the fourth section of this act, and such allegation, in any civil or criminal process, in any stage of the proceedings before final judgment, may be amended without terms, and as a matter of right.

SEC. 14. All payments or compensations for liquors sold in violation of law, whether in money, labor or other property, either real or personal, shall be held and considered to have been received in violation of law and without consideration, and against law, equity and a good conscience; and all sales, transfers and conveyances, mortgages, liens, attachments, pledges and securities of every kind, which either in whole or in part shall have been for, or on account of spirituous or intoxicating liquors, shall be utterly null and void against all persons and in all cases, and no rights of any kind shall be acquired thereby; and in any action, either at law or equity, touching such real or personal estate, the purchaser of such liquors may be a witness for either party. And no action of any kind shall be maintained in any Court in this State, either in whole or in part, for intoxicating or spirituous liquors sold in any other State or country whatever; nor shall any action of any kind be had or maintained in any Court in this State, for the recovery or possession of intoxicating or spirituous liquors, or the value thereof.

SEC. 15. All acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed. This act shall take effect on the first Monday of July next, and no license to sell intoxicating drinks shall be valid from and after that day.

An Interesting Story.

Dr. Kane, widely known as one of the heroes who sailed in search of Sir John Franklin with Mr. Grinnell's Expedition, has led a life of unexampled adventure, as the following account of it, up to his departure upon the Arctic expedition, shows:—

No American, of his age, has ever seen so much of the perils of the world, or of the world itself. He was Surgeon of the American Legation to China, and on his way to the Celestial regions, he spent some weeks on a foot-tramp through the orange groves of Brazil, and about a month in tiger-hunting near Bombay. Hence, after a dozen unsuccessful attempts to smuggle himself in the forbidden lands of China, he went over to the Phillippines, and by the aid of the good Monks of the interior of Manilla, explored its fastnesses and volcanic wonders. He was the first man to descend into the great crater of the Tael, lowered down two hundred feet over the brink, by a bamboo rope tied round his middle, and brought back a bottle full of its sulphur waters, burning off his boots in the lava cinders. Leaving China, after a second visit, in which he encountered shipwreck, he passed to India as physician of the Dremendhar Dagore, and was palanquined for some three months through the wonders of its mountain architecture, the ancient glorious of Candy, the stupendous passes of the Ghaut county, visiting Madras, Poncicherry and every spot that we have read of in the trial of Warren Hastings. Next, to Upper Egypt and Abyssinia, crossing the desert on his camel to the basis of Jupiter Ammon, climbing at break-neck risk to the topstone of the sounding Colossus of Memnon, and exploring the tombs of the Pharaohs for a fortnight or three weeks, with Prof. Lepsius and his associates. Wrecked again while passing down the Nile, and wounded, in an encounter near Alexandria, he pushed across to Greece, and traversed every scene of classic interest, climbing to the Hippocrene Spring, and sleeping on the shore of Marathon. He returned by Italy, France, and England, only to rest a few weeks, before a cruise on the coast of Africa. Renewing here some acquaintances which had been formed in Brazil, he was allowed to inspect the entire machinery of the slave-trade, and to pass up into the interior, under the firman of Desouza, the great intermediary between the chiefs of the slave-making districts and the Brazilian carriers. The coast fever was his pay for this trip, and he was sent home by Commodore Read, invalided. Imperfectly patched up from the effects of this visitation, he volunteered for service with the army in Mexico, and was ordered, with dispatches, on a dare-devil race, through the country our troops had left, to overtake Gen. Scott. Availing himself, at Perote, of a miscreant escort of jail-birds, that Gen. Worth had employed as a spy company, he got into a series of fights, in the last of which he received the swords of Gen. Gaona and Gen. Torrejon, and had his horse killed under him, and was himself desperately wounded, while protecting the lives of his prisoners against his own men. Since then he has been cruising, and practicing hydrography on the Coast Survey, up to the moment of receiving his telegraphic dispatch, accepting his urgent proffer of services for the Arctic Expedition. He had the rice fever in the Canton River, the plague in Egypt, the yellow fever at Rio, the congestive at Puebla, and the African fever on the coast. These, and wounds, and an organic disease of the heart, which he has had from boyhood, have been his preparations for the hazards he is encountering now.

Correspondence of the National Intelligencer.

Baron Humboldt.

At Leipsic I was favored by Dr. Flugel with a letter of introduction to Baron Humboldt, in which some mention was made of my wandering on the east coast of Africa and in California. During my stay in Berlin I heard so much about the annoyance to which the great old traveler is subjected by the intrusive visits of tourists, who had no claims upon his attention, that I had some misgivings about the propriety of delivering my letter. I thought the matter over some time before I could satisfy myself that I had a right to one moment of a life so valuable as his, and now so near its close. However, I went down to Potsdam, and wandered about the gardens of the palace till I felt inspired by the music of the Prussian band and the bracing air of the morning. After all, thought I, it will make no great difference. I might as well have a little of Baron Humboldt's time as the King, who no doubt bores him every day talking about Cosmos.

Kings are not expected to understand Cosmos; besides, the King of Prussia has never slushed down a topmast, or captured a whale, or chased the great elephant in Africa, wherein I have the advantage of him. So, to make an end of it, I called upon Baron Humboldt, and was received with great kindness and cordiality. Giving me his hand as he advanced to meet me, he said—no matter—a great many good natured things, that made me feel very happy, and very well satisfied with myself and the world generally. It was only 8½ o'clock, and yet he had already commenced his labors. The unfinished manuscripts lay upon his table, giving evidence of his great industry.

There is some thing quite enchanting in the simplicity of his manners and the expression of genuine benevolence that characterized his venerable features. As he talked of the world, its progress, and the destiny of mankind, his fine eyes flashed with all the enthusiasm of by-gone years, and his whole countenance seemed to grow with intellect. He dwelt with a peculiar interest upon the Isthmus of Panama, the projects for crossing through Nicaragua, the discovery and effect of the gold mines in California, the ancient ruins upon the Gila river, the opening of a new commerce with China, and the progress of civilization in the western continent, drawing upon the rich stores of his memory for rare and curious facts, and throwing a flood of light upon every subject; evincing at times a versatility of knowledge, a power of comprehension, and a readiness of application truly wonderful. But it was not the greatness of his intellect and knowledge that charmed me. It was his enthusiasm, his entire freedom from all the affectation of greatness, the unguarded flow of thought and language, the beautiful expression of goodness, sincerity, and earnestness that played upon his features.

I thought if ever true greatness, in all its essential attributes was stamped upon the human brow, his bore the mark. It was with strange feelings that I listened to the voice of the venerable man, whose works I had read in early youth, whose wanderings had filled my mind with the love of travel and of the wonderful revelations of nature, and whose name seemed to be of a past age. Several times I rose to take my leave, but he always had something kind to say, which prevented me from leaving, till at length, after an interview of an hour, I had to apologize once more for occupying so much of his time. "Don't say a word," said he, "you are most welcome. I am an old man, a mere wreck, as you see. I have but little longer to stay here; some more work to accomplish, and I am done forever in this world. I wish you great success. God bless you!" Such is Alexander Von Humboldt, the author of Cosmos.

Ernest Kiss.

This is the singular name of a singular man, and one of the most distinguished of the Hungarian Generals, who were taken prisoners and executed by the Austrians in the late war. The following notice of him is condensed from an interesting account of Hungarian Generals, published in a foreign journal:—

Ernest Kiss was a wealthy proprietor, owning twenty-three villages, and was a man of excessive personal elegance as well as of chivalric courage. He regularly sent his linen all the way from Hungary to Paris to be washed, and was in similar respects a D'Orsay as well as a Bayard. His coolness in danger was remarkable; and it is told of him that on one day, within reach of an Austrian battery, making an observation, he ordered his servant to bring him a cup of chocolate. A shot took it from his hand and killed his horse. "Clumsy rascals!" said Kiss, "they have upset my breakfast." When taken out with three others to be shot, he was superbly dressed. The order was given to fire, and his companions fell, while he stood untouched. "You have forgotten me," said Kiss, in his usual tone of voice. The corporal of the platoon then stepped up and fired, and the ball striking him in the forehead, he fell dead without a struggle.

SUGAR FROM CONNECTICUT.—A resident of New York has taken out a patent for making sugar out of Indian corn and oil of vitriol. The process, though familiar to all chemists, is doubtless novel to most of our readers. A quantity of corn meal is placed in a boiler, to which is added nearly an equal quantity, by measure, of water, together with a small proportion of common oil of vitriol or sulphuric acid. The mixture is then boiled at a very high temperature, when common brown sugar is produced, held in solution of course, with the acid. A quantity of common chalk is now thrown in, which has the effect to remove the vitriol from the sugar, the vitriol uniting to the chalk, and falling with it as sediment to the bottom of the boiler. The liquid sugar is then drained off into another vessel, boiled down to molasses, and finally chrystalized and clarified in the usual manner. [N. Y. Courier.

Revival of the California Fever.

The late glowing accounts from California have in a measure revived the spirit of adventure, so prevalent two and three years ago. Men are again becoming dissatisfied with the slow and toilsome accumulation of riches, and are anxious to stake all on the issue of a desperate adventure. Not satisfied to travel moderately and ploddingly the road to certain wealth, they are anxious to dash along on a canter, at the risk of life and limb. Profitable occupations are thrown aside, comfortable dwellings are converted into ready money, interesting and dependent families are left to shift as best they may their way through the world for years, and the very equilibrium of society is disturbed by a spirit of rash and desperate adventure—adventure which looks not to the consequences, and heeds not the warning voice of reason or conscience.

The four years that are now past have revealed some of the saddest consequences of unbridled adventure the world ever saw. A few have returned rejoicing in the smiles of an indulgent fortune; others have returned with blasted hopes and ruined prospects, while thousands are mingling their own with the "dust" they sought to hoard. We can never realize the terrible consequences, near and remote, of these desperate expeditions.

And now the demon of wild adventure is abroad again, and enlisting thousands under his banner. A cotemporary says that "last week, at one hotel in New York, there were two hundred persons waiting for the steamer Cherokee to sail. A great portion of them were from Maine. A Lowell man informs the Boston Traveler that no less than seventy-five persons belonging to that city left New York last week for California."

At this late day—with already two hundred and fifty thousand people toiling at the mines—the more accessible "placers" all exhausted, and the consequent necessity of large investments to make even a beginning, to say nothing of subsequent uncertainty of productiveness—with every profession, art, and trade thronged to more than repletion, and the impossibility of realizing—even in case of an "opening"—more than five or six dallars per day—what, let us ask, are the probabilities of realizing a fortune by those who go there depending upon the simple might of a strong arm?

VARIETY.

A little son and daughter of the late Mr. Charles Gregory, of Norwich, Conn., went on the ice to slide last Wednesday, when the little girl broke through and fell into the water. She called to her brother for help, and the little fellow ran to assist her, when he too fell in, and both were drowned. Their mother is left a widow, poor and childless. Her husband was drowned a few years since.

Among the remarkable gold specimens noticed in the last California papers, are two lumps from Sonora, at or near the locations of the Sonora Mining Co., picked up by a Mr. Street, of that vicinity, since the late rains, one of the value of $1,100, and the other $900. Another lump, weighing 91 ounces, valued at $1,500, were found at Holden's Garden, Sonora.

Letters have been received from Copiapo, Chili, dated Dec. 30, which state that on the Friday previous an attack was made on that city by the rebel troops, who succeeded in overturning the existing Government. The occasion had been celebrated by illuminations and bonfires.

Near St. Albans, Vt., the only daughter of a blind mother and decrepit father, rushed before a train of cars, was run over and killed. Cause, seduction under an unfulfilled promise of marriage. How much better than a murderer is the villain who ruined this girl?

The Annual Report of the Pennsylvania Hospital for the Insane, states that during the year 1851 these were 204 patients admitted into the Hospital, and 201 discharged. Of these 107 were discharged cured; 13 much improved; 32 improved; 23 stationary; and 26 died.

Samuel Olney, a teacher in one of the public schools in North Providence, R. I., was fined ten dollars and costs in the Court of Magistrates for severely flogging Charles E. Peckham, aged eleven years, son of Charles Peckham, and a pupil of Olney.

The Illinois papers say that Mr. Charles Denton, of Peoria, has invented a reaping machine which surpasses McCormick's, cutting the grain, whether standing or lodged, green or dry, upon rough or uneaven surface, laying it in bundles, and doing it well.

The water level in Lake Superior is higher this winter than it has been for a long period. At the mouth of the Ontonagon River, it is sweeping over the marks of the ancient boundaries, and uprooting trees of 20 or 30 years' growth.

A Custom-House Officer lately seized six bottles of Gin, (Schiedam Schnapps,) marked S. C. & Co., while on their passage from the Provinces towards Bangor. The seizure was for a violation of the United States revenue laws.

The Alabama Legislature have passed resolutions instructing their Representatives at Washington to urge upon Congress the propriety of building a ship canal across the Peninsula of Florida.

Levi Cole, the Westerly Bank robber, pleaded guilty before the Supreme Court at Kingston, on the 19th ult., and was sentenced to four years' imprisonment.

The wife of A. B. Johnson, President of the Ontario Branch Bank, Utica, N. Y., was recently burned (it is feared fatally) by her clothes taking fire in her own parlor.

The wife of Mr. James Roe, at Brooklyn, Ill., shot a man named Davidson dead at that place, on the 23d ult., for insulting her.

Accounts from St. John, N. B., to Jan. 29, state that, owing to the extreme cold weather, the herring fishery has proved a failure.

The late Miss Lind gave $50 to the head waiter of the house in which she was married in Boston, and $30 each to the other servants.

Gov. Allen has signed the bill abolishing capital punishment in Rhode Island, and it has now become a law.

At Massillon, a young lady "medium" was arrested for causing rappings in church during divine service.

The bill before the Senate of Indiana, in favor of the Maine Liquor Law, has been defeated.

Rev. J. W. MORTON, } Assistants.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, }

The Terms for 1851 and 1852 are as follows:—
The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.
" Second " Dec. 3 " " March 16.
" Third " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one or two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term, Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.

Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS.

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00

FOREKNOWLEDGE.

DEAR BROTHER BROWN:

I sincerely regret my dullness of perception in not possessing myself of your real meaning in the use of the term necessity as employed in this controversy, and also my awkwardness in expressing my opinion thereof. Please accept of this apology, and also of my thanks for the patience thus far shown me. And be pleased, also, to accept of this exhortation, from your short-coming but well meaning brother, to "let patience have her perfect work"—an abundant need of which, I fear, you will experience while this controversy lasts. But of one thing I am assured, and that is, my intentions have been upright. Permit me, therefore, to entreat you to believe that the failure is to be attributed to necessity rather than to free-will!

Availing myself of the pleasure arising from the hope that the book of delinquencies is canceled, I will now say, "Let us anew our journey pursue;" and, in the spirit of the sentiment, I will proceed to say, that in your reply to my article, which appeared in the Recorder of Feb. 12, my attention is again callled to the kind of necessity referred to in this controversy. You say, "But we use it in the sense in which it is employed by President Edwards, viz. to denote the full and fixed connection between the things signified by the subject and predicate of a proposition which affirms something to be true. An implied or supposed opposition of the will does not enter into this definition of necessity." Again you say, "The FULL AND FIXED CONNECTION of things, therefore, is what we mean by necessity. The idea of compulsion, or opposition of the will, is not included."

I understand, then, that there is a correlation existing between all of the several events of human life—that there is a "fixed" connection between volition and the result, and a "fixed" connection between motive and the volition. Once more: This necessity, or fixed connection, does not in its operations in any degree force or compel the will; but the will always acts in harmony with it. On the one side of this controversy, (as I understand it,) it is asserted that the certainty of the foreknowledge of future events rests upon the idea of a 'fixed' connection existing between the events foreseen; otherwise God's foreknowledge would not be perfect. In other words, there is a causing power controlling human volitions. The words of Edwards are, "By determining the will, if the phrase be used with any meaning, must be intended causing that the act of the will or choice should be thus and not otherwise; and the will is said to be determined, when, in consequence of some action or influence, its choice is directed to, and fixed upon, some particular object; as when we speak of the determination of motion, we mean causing the body to be in such a direction, rather than in another, the determination of the will supposes an effect, which must have a cause. If the will be determined there is a determiner." Mark, then, President Edwards himself says, "If the will be determined there is a determiner."

But that we may keep the chain of argument unbroken, let us next inquire what "determines" the will? This he states to be motive. He says, "By motive I mean the whole of that which moves, excites, or invites the mind to volition, whether that be one thing singly, or many things conjointly. And when I speak of the strongest motive, I have respect to the strength of the whole that operates to induce a particular act of volition, whether that be the strength of one thing alone or of many together." And "that motive which, as it stands in view of the mind, is the strongest, determines the will." I have now quoted sufficient to justify me in saying, that the self-determining power of the will is by Edwards discarded. For, according to him, volitions are caused by motives; therefore the will has not a self-determining power.

I have opposed this sentiment in two particulars. (1.) That in order to certain foreknowledge, this law of "necessity" is not necessary—that God can as certainly foresee future contingent events as any other—that the idea that God can only conjecture such events is a fallacy. (2.) That the doctrine of necessity, as held by Edwards, is destructive of the doctrine of human responsibility. I by no means charge him with designing this. He has labored sufficiently hard to clear his system of this charge to convince all men to the contrary. It is the misfortune of his system itself.

I wish first to notice this second objection, and to offer some arguments in support of it. But, first, what is Edwards' theory of human responsibility? Is it not that the creature is responsible for his actions because they are the results of his volitions? I certainly so understand him. But, says the objector, is it not true that responsibility rests with volition? Certainly. Well, then, says he, where is the difference between you and him? I answer, the difference is that with him volition is "caused;" with me it is free. Now, when I say the first is caused, I do not mean that it is forced. I will amplify and illustrate. With respect to human action, volition sustains the relation of cause. Now no man would predicate responsibility of the effect; it must lie with the cause. But if there lies back of volition a cause, then volition is an effect, not an independent cause. If, then, volition is an effect, and not an independent cause, responsibility cannot be predicable of it. To say that responsibility attaches to the will because it moves to action, because responsibility must attach to the moving power, is not to clear the question of its difficulty, for we must first inquire into the nature of the will's agency. If the will is free in that matter, then the answer is just.

But here is another question presented: What is meant by freedom of the will? The Calvinist answers, The will is free when it is not forced. To which answer I object. I affirm, that freedom lies in the self-determining power of the will. (One thing, at least I am certain, will be granted, and that is that there is a wide difference in the freedom of these two cases.) But now, to make good my objection, suppose I wish the services of a neighbor, and in order to obtain them, I mesmerize him, and then by a mysterious influence incline his will so that he willingly serves me; would that be a fair case of free volition? Or, let us look at it in another light. I place a man in the presence of temptations to do wrong; I however forbid him to yield to these temptations; he will never yield until he wills to do so; his will has no power to act without motives, but the presence of certain motives will CAUSE the will to act. Now I present the motives, and these motives cause the will to act; I do not say force the will, but incline it—cause it to act. Is will free in this instance, in such a sense as to make it responsible? But in answering this question let the reader have before his mind the idea that there is a necessary, a "fixed CONNECTION," between the motive and the volition. Does not universal consciousness affirm, that in this last instance the man so influenced is clear from guilt? And if I were to proceed to inflict punishment upon him, would I not be charged, and justly so, with tyranny? And when this charge is made, is it a sufficient answer to say, "If he had not willed, he would not have acted?"

Now, with respect to that paragraph in my last communication where I spoke of physical and moral necessity, and Bro. B. thinks that perhaps I thought that I had made him look "quite ridiculous," I meant simply to say, that when you come to sift the matter thoroughly, you might just as well predicate responsibility of human volitions where these volitions are the result of the application of physical force or power, as to predicate responsibility of volitions where the self-determining power is denied. And now, if it can be shown, that the results would be changed, whether you apply physical or moral influence, provided you take away the self-determining power of the will, I should be glad to see it.

(A.) But let us bring this doctrine to a point of infinite interest to our fallen race, and see its application in that instance. According to this doctrine, we are, by a "fixed connection," in a state of alienation from God. We naturally hate his authority; our desires are after sin; all of the motives about us that "cause" our volitions, are on the side of rebellion; and however it may be for our interest to serve God—and this may be perfectly apparent to our intelligence—yet we have no desire (will) to do so. Sufficient motives to do so have not been presented. But whenever the right motives (that is, sufficient motives) are presented, we will to serve him, and then, by a "fixed connection," we do serve him. Now, the conditioning and presentation of these motives are with God. If he shall but present these motives with the proper conditions, then, by the law of a "fixed connection," we will to serve him. But one of these conditionating circumstances here contemplated is, that by his almighty power the Spirit of Life is implanted in the soul. Now no motive could be sufficient to cause volitions in the way of serving God, were it not for the implantation of the "Spirit of Life," as above stated; therefore, in the absence of this, no motive can induce him to a godly life. Now all men alike heir this depravity and alienation from God, and this by the law of a "fixed connection." But to some men he graciously imparts this "Spirit of Life," which by a law of a "full and fixed connection" causes them to serve him. But with respect to the rest, he passes them by, though they were no more aliens from him than were the others, and leaves them in a condition (of his own appointing) where, by this law of a "fixed connection," they are caused to continue in that state of enmity and rebellion, so that in the end they are doomed to an unending perdition, while the others inherit eternal life. But what are the words of the decree upon which these latter are received to eternal life? They are, "Well done, good and faithful servants," &c. But how were they good and faithful servants? Why, by a law of a "FULL AND FIXED CONNECTION," over which, in its operations, they had not the slightest control, they were caused to be good and faithful. But how with respect to the former? What is the language of the decree that dooms them to perdition? It is this, "Wicked and slothful servants," . . . "you ought, therefore," &c. But what made them wicked and slothful servants? Why, because of the operations of a law of a "FULL AND FIXED CONNECTION," over which they had no more control than the African over has the color of his skin, they were CAUSED to be wicked and slothful servants. If God can be just, and thus discriminate, saying one and condemning another, I pray him, in mercy to me, cause me to see it! I can reconcile the painfulness of mystery in the divine government, but the painfulness of CONTRADICTION, who can endure it?

Bro. Brown has introduced, in support of his view of necessity, several passages of Scripture in which this and kindred words occur; and he says that it is "clear" that they are used in the sense he contends for. If this were so, we should readily confess to being routed from our position. But we do not so understand them. The first passage is from Luke 23: 17—"OF NECESSITY he must release one at the feast." On the word necessity Mr. Cruden remarks, "The word necessary, or such as are equivalent to it, as must, must needs, do not always denote an absolute necessity, but a necessity of decency, or of duty, or merely something useful and advantageous, as, for example, Luke 14: 14, 18, 'I have bought a piece of ground, and I must needs go and see it,' that is, it is convenient that I go and see it; Rom. 13: 5, 'Ye must needs be subject,' that is, it is your duty, as well as interest, so to be; and Luke 23: 17, 'Of necessity he must release one at the feast,' that is, it has been a custom observed among us for a long time, and it is proper to have it continued." It will be seen, that two of Bro. Brown's quotations are included in this, and the interpretation seems to be so clear, and yet simple, that I will add nothing to what the learned author has said, trusting it will be satisfactory. The word "compel" is next introduced in the following passage, "I am become a fool in glorying; ye have compelled me." 2 Cor. 12: 11. Also, Gal. 2: 14, "Why COMPELLEST thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews." Each of the other passages seems to present the same sentiment with those above quoted; and to answer those quoted is to answer the whole. I see here presented, as reasons why the above-mentioned acts were performed, strong influences in each case; but not a single instance where these influences MIGHT not have been overcome. If not, then I deny the existence of responsibility in these instances, because volition is not free. The argument upon this is in a former part of this article.

I will close this article with a few reflections upon the term contingent. Bro. Brown says, "As standing opposed simply to necessity, we think we have some idea of its meaning. But when again it is made synonymous with freedom or free agency, we are thrown somewhat into the fog. Does Bro. H. mean by a contingent event, one that takes place without a cause?" Ans. (1.) I use it not as opposed to certainty, but necessity. (2.) I use it synonymous with freedom? (3.) I do not mean by it an event which takes places without a cause, but an event which has a cause, and that cause FREE VOLITION.

But, as I have not space to enlarge upon this point, perhaps this will be as convenient a place in the argument to make a "close for the present," as I shall have. Therefore adieu.

CURIOUS CHINESE CUSTOMS.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

The following I copy from The North China Herald. It may not contain much besides what you have already seen; yet, as facts are confirmed by the mouth of two or three witnesses, I thought it might not be uninteresting.

N. W.

On the morning of Monday, August 11th, groups of three men in each might have been seen passing along the streets of Shanghae and its suburbs—one beating a small gong to apprise the inhabitants of their approach, and the other two carrying large strings of gilt paper on a bamboo pole across their shoulders. On inquiring as to the object, I was told that on that day, the middle of the seventh month by the Chinese reckoning, every family was expected to contribute a quota of gilt paper, to be transformed into money by the action of fire, for the use of those spirits in the other world who had no near relatives or friends living to keep them in funds. It was an all-souls day.

The origin of the custom I learned to be as follows: The first monarch of the Ming dynasty was born of very poor and obscure parents, but, by means of his vigorous abilities, overcame the untoward circumstances of birth and fortune, and finally reached the throne. His parents died during his childhood, and he was never able to ascertain the place of their burial; so, upon his accession to power, being desirous to sacrifice to his ancestors, he commanded his officers throughout the empire to prepare offerings, and burn paper money in every place, so that he might be certain they would, at some place or other, wherever their shades might be, get a portion of what was designed for them, and thus not be left unprovided for in the spirit land. This, it is said, occurred about 500 years ago, and thus originated the practice of making offerings for the ghosts of all who die away from home, and whose friends never know the place of their graves. This custom is observed three times a year. The gilt paper that is collected during the day is strung on long poles, and at night is carried to the many burial grounds in and around the city, and burned at every few rods all along the streets and paths, so as to give every forlorn spirit a share wherever it may roam. Some carrying torches and lanterns, and some playing on various kinds of musical (?) instruments, give the procession quite an imposing appearance in the darkness of the night, as they wend their way along the streets and among the solitary dwellings of the dead.

On the same day, but without any apparent connection between the ceremonies, five of the principal idols of the city are taken from the chief temples, placed in large sedan chairs, and carried about through the most public streets during the day, and at nightfall are brought to a small temple on the bank of the Yang-king-pang out-side of the north gate. Men dressed in the fantastic costumes of former ages, carrying flags and boards containing inscriptions in large gilt characters, some with gongs, others with long pieces of bamboo rattling along the pavements, and others still carrying large lanterns, follow in the train of these idols as their attendants. Beside these are large numbers of persons, of both sexes and all ages, wearing red garments from head to foot, having iron chains around their necks, and hand-cuffed—with disheveled hair—the poorer walking, and those who can afford it riding in sedans. These are persons who, having been sick, have vowed to the idols that if they recovered they would regard themselves as criminals, deserving to be punished, but spared through the compassion of the gods; and they follow in the procession in fulfillment of their vows. Besides these, multitudes of people crowd the streets through which the procession passes, to witness the scene. The occasion is a general holiday throughout the city. Towards night I went to the small temple above mentioned, and found the place thronged. One idol had already been brought in. As the others approached, one after another, the attendants who followed them shouted and prostrated themselves on the ground. Then, as each idol was placed with its sedan in the position assigned to it, small tables, filled with a variety of articles of food of choice kinds, were set before them as offerings, with the belief that the idol actually feasted upon what was set before him. If he did, he was satisfied with a marvelonsly small quantity, or else the same food was eaten twice, for it is certain that the bona fide flesh and blood attendants of his godship ate it afterwards without perceiving any diminution. The usual accompaniments of gilt paper, incense sticks, and wax candles, were burnt in profusion, while hundreds of these poor deluded heathen came and worshiped most devoutly before their senseless blocks. A mandarin with his train, who it seems was master of ceremonies, came in about sun-down, and prostrated himself, bowing his head to the ground nine times before each of the five idols separately; and just at this juncture a pile of gilt paper, eight or nine feet high, was set on fire outside the temple, a little to the eastward of the entrance. The five images remained there and were worshiped by multitudes till midnight, when they were carried back to their residence at the Ching-wong-meau.

PROFESSORS OF RELIGION:

What the World expects of them.

[Copied for the Recorder from an old work—author unknown.]

It is very well known, however blind sinners are to their own characters, and however different they themselves appear in the sight of God, that they are very watchful and discerning of the faults of professors of religion. The Apostle Paul, in speaking of the requisite qualifications for a bishop, says, "He must have a good report of them which are without, lest he fall into reproach and the snare of the devil." That is, he must commend himself to their consciences, by exhibiting in his deportment the spirit and temper of the gospel of Christ. This is what Christ meant when he commanded his disciples to let their light so shine before men, that they may see their good works, and glorify their Father which is in heaven. For a minister or professor of religion to have a good report of them which are without, is widely different from what is meant by "all men's speaking well of him." Too many, at the present day, both ministers and professors, have this latter kind of "good report," which is more evidence of their conformity to the world, than of their renouncing it, and having their affections placed on things above.

The world expect that professors of religion will lead a very different life from what they do themselves—that they will avoid the worldly and profane as much as possible, and choose the society of Christians—that they will frequent the place where Christians meet, and avoid parties of pleasure and dissipation—that they will choose the Bible and religious books before all others, and be ready to engage in religious conversation on all occasions—that they will bridle their tongues when others are engaged in an unprofitable use of it, as in spreading slander—that they will be faithful to their friends, and forgive their enemies, having that charity which "hopeth all things, endureth all things, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil, vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up." Farther, the world expect that professors of religion will not pursue their worldly concerns with that eagerness, hurry, and bustle, that those do who rely on their own strength and wisdom for success. Christians profess to trust in Providence, and to believe that God regards even the hairs of their heads; and that if they use the proper means, their Heavenly Father will provide all that is needful for them to have here, or to prepare them for future felicity. Therefore they expect to find in them more integrity in their dealings, and less of that over-reaching and equivocating way, so frequently practiced by men of the world. They profess to love their neighbor as themselves, and to do good, as they have opportunity, to all men. They are therefore expected to manifest a corresponding disposition on all occasions, without "conferring with flesh and blood," and to contribute to the temporal as well as the spiritual necessities of their fellows. What an inconsistency is a close, pinching, crabbed Christian! Such dishoner their divine Master, and give the world a clue to their character, which all their pretensions to religion cannot evade. Many professors seem to forget religion among wordly people, and bring themselves down to the standard of worldly principles and manners, thinking it is not of much consequence to appear religious before those who care nothing about it, having a willingness at the same time to gratify their own evil propensities. But it is not sufficient that we be religious among Christians only, and at stated seasons. These very people who rejoice to have professors conform to their practices, know what belongs to the Christian character, and will rise up in judgment against them in the last day. It falls to the lot of many professors to be mostly among those who do not profess religion. It may be unpleasant in many respects, if they are Christians indeed; but God has not placed them in a situation where they are incapable of serving Him. They are to let their light shine, and He will make what use of it He pleases; either to condemn their conduct, or to bring them to the knowledge of the truth. There is a reward for such as confess Christ before men, by being living witnesses to the truth. There is also a curse for such as deny Him before men; who, as the Apostle says, "are even the enemies of the cross of Christ," who have a name to live, and are dead, as to spiritual things.

ANECDOTE OF QUEEN VICTORIA.—The editor of the Gospel Banner, in the last number of his "Walks in the Crystal Palace," relates the following incident as happening under his own observation; it speaks well for the spontaneous emotions of the Queen's heart:—"We never saw any persons speak to her in the palace, but some of her own party; nor did we ever hear her direct her discourse to any others except in one instance. An unfortunate, lame girl, fearing to be in the way of her majesty, attempted to run from her presence, but fell in the act. The Queen sprang towards the girl, raised her up from the floor, pressed a kiss upon her pale cheek, spoke a word of kindness to the child, and thus relieved her of her fears."

THE HOUR OF DEATH.

I often think upon the hour
When friends around my bed
Shall watch my pulse's failing power,
And prop my drooping head;
And whisper, "Life is ebbing fast,
It cannot—no!—it will not last!"

And what will, in that hour of grief,
My fainting soul sustain?
Will riches bring me sure relief?
Will honors ease my pain?
Will laurels brush away the dews
Which then my cold, damp brow suffuse?

Ah! no. The wealth the world supplies,
Its titles and its fame,
Will not in that dark hour suffice
The latest foe to tame.
A Saviour's love, for ever new,
For ever strong, alone will do.

His grace the troubled brain will calm,
Support the sinking heart,
And drop upon the soul a balm
Unknown to human art;
And, when both sight and hearing cease,
Suggest the thoughts and words of peace.

Thus, thus sustain'd, the vale of death
I'll tread secure from harm;
And, while I struggling pant for breath,
Still lean upon his arm;
Till life's last gleam shall light my eye,
And my tongue falter, Victory! [Dr. Huei.

REV. ALFRED BENNETT.

I became acquainted with the Rev. Alfred Bennett in the year 1823, at the meeting of the Triennial Convention, in Washington City. It was my privilege to lodge in the same room with him, and to enjoy much of his profitable conversation. The respect and affection with which I regarded him at parting, were subsequently increased by many pleasant interviews, and remain unabated in my heart to this moment. During our stay in Washington, he related to me an incident in his religious experience which made a deep impression on my mind, and which I think worthy of being kept in memory, as showing the strong workings of natural depravity, and also how the doctrine of God's sovereignty enters into the very heart of Christian experience. It was in substance as follows:—

"My cousin, Eliphalet Bennett, and I lived a short distance from each other, when we were both seeking the Lord. We had frequent opportunities of knowing the state of each other's mind, and conversing on the great subject which at the time absorbed our thoughts. One day I heard that Eliphalet had found peace, and was rejoicing in a sense of pardon, and in the hope of life everlasting. The good news had not the effect on my mind which might have been expected. I could not understand why he should be accepted, while I was permitted to remain under condemnation, and with the prospect of eternal wrath. I said, 'I am as good as Eliphalet Bennett, and have sought the Lord as long, and as earnestly.' I repeated this again and again; and dwelt upon it until my heart grew hot. At length I added, 'God is unjust. I think so—and I do not care if he knows that I think so.' Thus my rebellious heart continued to rage against the sovereignty of God for some time. When the storm in my breast had somewhat subsided, I began to reflect on what I had done. I, a feeble worm of the dust, had arraigned and condemned the Judge of all the earth, and had opposed myself to omnipotence. God had heard every word which I had uttered, and perfectly understood every thought of my heart. Why had he not crushed me in the midst of my rebellion, and driven me at once to hell? After this manner I reviewed the insults and provocations which I had offered to the Divine Majesty, until I fell before him in amazement at my sinfulness and his forbearance; and exclaimed, 'God is just. He would be just, if he should take Eliphalet Bennett, and all the world beside, to heaven, and make hell purposely to put me in.' In this state of complete submission, I remained prostrate before the Lord, until heavenly peace flowed into my soul, and I was enabled to rejoice in Christ Jesus." [Christian Index.

THE USEFULNESS OF TRACTS.

The following is from the last number of the London Baptist Missionary Herald. It was written from Chittagong, by a missionary brother named Johannes, and is certainly an encouragement to all who labor for Christ through the means of the press.

"You will no doubt rejoice to learn, that about a fortnight ago two men came to my house from Comilla, three days journey from here. One was a Brahman and the other a Kayast. The Brahman gave me to understand that, some years back, he served in Chittagong, where, with others, he came into possession of a few tracts, one of which was the "True Refuge;" and again, subsequently, he and a few others with him, at the Sitakund mela, heard the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ preached to them. These books were carried by them to their habitations, and read over by the people there; upon which they felt it their duty and obligation to renounce idolatry and believe on Jesus Christ, the only Saviour of a lost and ruined world. The change wrought upon their minds was soon perceived by the Hindoos, and the zemindars commenced a series of persecutions, to make them think differently on the subject, and entirely disbelieve the new shasters. They said that God had opened their eyes to see the evil of their ways, the folly and absurdity of idol-worship instead of that of the living and true God; and that, as the truths contained in these books were congenial to their hearts and feelings, they would rather suffer for conscience's sake, and endure privations of land and property, than return to them. On this they were more openly and greatly opposed and persecuted. They were at length compelled to leave their houses and take shelter in distant villages and hills, where they were living in sheds. On hearing these things, I detained the two men. Both remained, ate and drank with us, and without ceremony united in Christian worship; and then said, they would not leave Chittagong unless I accompanied them and baptized them. I lost no time in deputing six of our brethren, paid their expenses, and desired them to go and encourage the hearts of these people, and to send me a report of what they witnessed of this commencement of God's work among the benighted idolaters at Comilla. One of the brethren has just returned with one of these men, and a letter in Bengali, signed by seventeen persons, declaring that there are upwards of one hundred and twenty-five individuals ready to join the Christian faith as soon as I go there. They plainly state that they believe in Jesus, and wish much to be baptized. They also say, that if, on my arrival at Comilla, I find these statements incorrect, they will gladly defray all the expenses incurred in traveling. Our brethren remain there, and the people will not allow them to return to Chittagong."

HOPE FOR IRELAND.

Rev. J. D. Smith writes to the British Banner an encouraging account of the present condition of Protestant missions in Ireland. According to the letter of Mr. Smith, it appears "that all evangelical bodies in Britain are re-enforcing their Irish missions, and that the harvest is great in proportion to the reapers. A most powerful impulse has been given to popular feeling on the subject of Scriptural inquiry, from which highly favorable results have already been obtained. In the west of Ireland, the church of England, through the voluntary efforts of its ministers and members, is doing a great work; a movement is in progress, which is worthy of the name of a reformation. Ministers are preaching out of doors, in cabins, in cottages, and in churches, to crowds of converted Romanists. An English minister went over to the vicinity of Conemara, to recruit his health. And such results went out from his casual visit, that the Scriptures are now being read through twelve well chosen districts. Some of the popish chapels are almost deserted; 5000 persons have left the errors of Rome; and some of the priests are about to emigrate to America. One minister, Rev. John Gregg, in an excursion from Dublin, visited 56 congregations of seceding Romanists, numbering from 50 to 600 each. In the diocese of Tuam there are ten thousand converts from Romanism regularly gathered into Protestant churches. The bishop was at first opposed to the work, but such was the flood of inquiry rising around him, that it carried him over, and compelled him to join it. Bishop Daly stated in Exeter Hall, that in Connaught alone, there had been 10,000 converts. Dr. Duff, in a late visit to this district, seemed to forget his own fields in India, in his joy at the prospects opening upon Ireland. He said he was "perfectly satisfied that in a most remarkable manner God was opening the minds of the popish population to the knowledge of the truth."

"WHERE ARE THE NINE?"

I observed an amiable wife come to the Lord's table. It was the first time she had ever been there, but her equally amiable husband sat under the gallery alone, with a look of solicitude and anxiety. He had always come in and sat with her in the house of God at other times, but in this instance he left her to go alone in the way of duty.

She had lingered long for him, and tried each fond endearment to win him to the church and to Christ. She had succeeded in the former; he accompanied her to the house of prayer, but not to Christ. He loved her as his nobler life; but his love to her could not overcome his aversion to repentance, faith, and duty. With her he had enjoyed great and equal privileges; with her he had stood amid the same afflicting providences, and listened to the same expostulations from an affectionate and faithful pastor; yet he lingered behind, and left her, his weak and timid partner, to go alone to Christ. Was it discourtesy or coolness to her? No! but it was such, and more than this, to Jesus.

I saw parents at the table, also, whose children were left behind; children, whose parents and friends, whose companions, were left behind. I saw many of those who were very closely united by the ties of blood and affection; persons who had always been intimate elsewhere, separate on this occasion. It was a sad sight to look upon; and as I mused, I imagined I saw re-acted the ingratitude of the nine lepers. I could hear the Saviour renew the inquiry, "Were there not ten cleansed? but where are the nine?" Did I not give to that husband all the privileges I gave to his wife? The wife is here to give me glory, but where is her husband? Did I not surround all the other parties with the same blessings? but while the parents are here, where are the children? While the children are here, where are the parents? While the friend is here, where is his companion? The pastor looked sad as he cast his eye upon the delinquents. Ministering spirits seemed to me to bend over them in tender solicitude, and Jesus also to cast upon them a kind, upbraiding glance; but still they relent not.

Let us now pass to another scene. Ages have rolled away; the heavens have waxed old and disappeared; and God's abode, with its judgment-throne and mighty arches, and bowing principalities, becomes visible. The long-neglected Jesus descends. The dead in Christ arise; and here, among the happy immortals, is the pious wife; but where is her husband? Here is the parent, but where is the child? Here is the child, but where is the parent? The friend is here, but where is his companion? Those who are not found in the walks of piety on earth, are not found among the blessed on this joyous morning that dawns at last on the long night of death. "Were there not ten cleansed? but where are the nine?" [Home and Foreign Record.

Oliver Cromwell was a staunch Puritan, and could not brook the least approach to Popery. "What are these?" he once inquired, as he saw a dozen silver statues in the niches of a chapel. "The twelve apostles," replied the trembling dean. "Take them down," said Cromwell, "and coin them into money, so that, like their Master, they may go about doing good."

"FOREKNOWLEDGE."

Reply to Bro. Hull—See First Page.

It is all-important to this controversy to arrive at some just notion of free agency. Necessarians and anti-necessarians have disputed wherein free agency consists; but the thing itself is allowed on both sides, nor can it be denied by any one who considers that man is accountable to his Creator. According to our view, it consists in the power of following one's inclination. This is the notion which the unsophisticated common people have of the subject; and what more in the way of freedom can any reasonable man desire?

But Bro. H. seems to think it essential to liberty, not only that one should have the power to follow the inclination which he actually possesses, but that he should originate the inclination itself. In other words, that he should not only act according to his choice, but that he should choose according to his choice! If this is not his meaning, we are unable to conceive what it is. The theory of Edwards, that the will is determined by motive, he appears to discard; and, in the language of the Arminian school, talks about the self-determining power of the will Let us see what this self-determining power amounts to.

King David walks upon the roof of his house at even-tide, and, casting his eye in a certain direction, beholds Bathsheba washing herself. He has not yet had criminal connection with her, but by a volition he determines to do so. Now the question is, Was this volition self-determined, or was it determined by motive? Let it be borne in mind, that a volition is an act of the will; and an act is not freely performed, unless it is performed from choice. But this choice is itself an act of the will, which must also be freely performed; and this implies a still previous choice. This previous choice is again an act of the will, which again implies a previous choice; and so on in an infinite series, the absurdity of which must be obvious. We maintain, therefore, that the aforesaid guilty volition of David, or that act of his will which looked to a criminal connection with Bathsheba, was not self-determined, but determined by motive; understanding by motive "the whole of that which moves, excites, or invites the mind to volition, whether that be one thing singly, or many things conjointly." If this reasoning is not sound, will our brother have the kindness to point out its defect?

But Bro. H. is not willing to allow that volition is caused—that it is an effect—lest responsibility should be destroyed. "No man would predicate responsibility of the effect; it must lie with the cause." Why not predicate responsibility of the effect, as well as of the cause? The moral character of dispositions of the heart, and of acts of the will, lies in their nature; and any attempt to derive it wholly from their cause, involves an absurdity. Shall we say, that vice consists not in what is vicious, but in that which produces it? Shall we say, that virtue consists not in that which is virtuous, but in that which produces it? We are sure that, upon mature reflection, Bro. H. himself will not say so.

Strictly speaking, however, responsibility cannot be predicated of either cause or effect, but only of the intelligent personal agent who wills and acts. And the mere fact that his volitions are caused, cannot destroy his responsibility, unless by causation be meant compulsion, force, or something of the kind. But as for a forced will, the idea is a perfect absurdity—a contradiction in terms; it is impossible that there should be any such thing. That which is voluntary, is not forced; and that which is forced, is not voluntary. Therefore, when we speak of the causation of human volitions, we mean that kind of influence—be it what it may—which is strictly adapted to the nature of the human mind. And if strictly adapted to the nature of the mind, how can it destroy responsibility? It is strange, passing strange, that, rather than admit the operation of a cause which offers no sort of violence to the will, our opponents will even contend for the existence of an event without a cause: for a volition which is not determined by any thing, is an event without a cause.

The expression "freedom of the will," is used by our correspondent. Whether he admits the strict propriety of the expression, we do not know; but he says, "The Calvinist answers that the will is free, when it is not forced." The truth is, however, that freedom is not predicable of the will, but of the man—the living, intelligent agent. We may correctly speak of free agency, but not of free will. One might as well talk of an angelic angel, a fluid liquid, or a mental thought. The will is free by its very nature, just as a thought is mental by its very nature, or as a liquid is fluid. We may conceive of its being destroyed, or annihilated; but when one begins to conceive of it as subjected to force, he loses sight of its nature, and actually thinks of something else. If an intelligent Calvinist comes down from his true position, so far as to say "that the will is free when it is not forced," the expression is one to which he is driven by way of rebutting the false conception of his views entertained by his opponents; it is not one which he adopts from any conviction of its propriety. If we admit that man acts as he wills, we admit his freedom in the fullest and broadest sense. When we have reached the will, we have reached an ultimate point in our researches into the nature of liberty. He who goes beyond this, to inquire wherein the freedom of the will consists, chases an ignis fatuus.

The idea that volition is not an effect, but an independent cause, is one which does no credit to our brother's philosophy. That which begins to be, must be an effect; it cannot be an independent cause. And it is the intuitive dictate of our nature, that every event, or whatever begins to be, must have a cause. Perhaps an appeal here may be made to consciousness; it may be said, that we are conscious of being ourselves the cause of our own volitions. But all that can be meant intelligently by this, is that we are conscious of putting them forth. If any one doubts this, it is not the writer of these remarks. But can any one be conscious that, prior to his agency in putting them forth, there was no cause to induce him to do so?—no motive, no persuasion, no temptation of any kind?

But let us look a little further along in our correspondent's article. He thinks, that we "might just as well predicate responsibility of human volitions when these volitions are the result of physical force, as to predicate responsibility of them when the self-determining power is denied." We accept this as an ample atonement for making us look "quite ridiculous," but we are not so ready to accept it as sound argument. It is the very first dictate of our nature, the intuitive sense of all mankind, that we are responsible for whatever we do willingly; but whether the will itself is caused, or acts independently, is something which we never stop to consider. That is a question which we leave for philosophy to settle. It is quite sufficient for us to feel that we act willingly. It is true, when we have committed a fault, we are always eager to find, in the cause or causes which led to it, something which can be construed as compulsion; because that would take away the uncomfortable sense of guilt. But just as far as we find the absence of compulsion, and the exercise of a willing desposition, we feel ourselves responsible.

But "if it can be shown that the results would be changed, whether you apply physical or moral influence, provided you take away the self-determining power of the will," Bro. H. would be "glad to see it." That moral effects do just as certainly result from moral causes as physical effects do from physical causes, is the very proposition which we affirm. If this is what our brother means by his intimation that the results would not be changed, we shall not shrink from the responsibility of our affirmation.

The paragraph which, for convenience of reference, we have marked (A.,) is one which, we should suppose, was written for effect rather than argument, did we not conceive of our brother as too honest to avail himself of such an artifice. The changes which he has rung upon "full and fixed connection," will sound quite musical to many of his readers, we have no doubt. But let us see whether such notes belong to the gamut. You have admitted already, that God certainly foreknows every thing that will happen, although you deny the necessity of some things which will take place. Take the proposition, "John Smith will commit murder fifty years hence," for illustration; supposing, for the argument's sake, that such an event will actually transpire. You will not say, that there is no connection between the event and God's foreknowledge of it; for that would be a contradiction. It would be the same as to say, that God foreknows the event, and yet does not foreknow it. There is a connection, therefore; and this connection is absolutely perfect, or it is not. If it is not, then by how much it lacks of being so, by so much does God fail of being certain of the futurition of the event; and by how much he fails of being absolutely certain of it, by so much does his supposed foreknowledge of it become mere conjecture. But if the connection between the event and the Divine foreknowledge of it is absolutely perfect, it cannot be rendered more perfect. So that here is a "full and fixed connection" between the commission of murder by John Smith, fifty years hence, and God's foreknowledge of it. Can you deny this, upon your own principles? And yet this is all that Edwards means by necessity. If the propriety of the term be disputed, it is a mere dispute about words, which those who choose may agitate to their full satisfaction. We do not intend to be beguiled into a logomachy, if we can avoid it. But we do insist, that those who undertake to oppose this doctrine should understand what they are going to oppose. We repeat it, that necessity, in the sense of constraint, compulsion, or opposition to the will, is not what is meant. If those who differ from us cannot hold in their minds any other idea of the term except that which implies such a constraint upon actions, exercised ab extra, as renders choice or will impossible, we do not wonder at their repugnance to the doctrine; but we beg leave to say, that their controversy is not with us.

In our issue of Jan. 22d, we said, (alluding to the act of the Jews in crucifying the Saviour,) that "there was no other kind of necessity for the act, except that which was requisite to make the connection between the act and God's foreknowledge of it absolutely perfect; that this connection was absolutely perfect, infallible, and indissoluble; and that if a decree be added to the foreknowledge, it does not increase or strengthen the connection; it does not render it more infallible, or indissoluble." The fallacy of this reasoning Bro. H. has not yet exposed. But, in the paragraph above alluded to, he finds a great deal of fault that, "by a 'fixed connection,' we are in a state of alienation from God; we naturally hate his authority; our desires are after sin," &c., &c. Nevertheless, according to his principles, God eternally foresaw this state of things. He foresaw that some would continue in rebellion, while others would prove good and faithful servants, and be received into life eternal. Say, brother, is the connection between this state of things and the Divine foresight of it absolutely perfect, infallible, and indissoluble, or is it not? If it is, what is the foundation of this perfect connection? Has it any foundation at all? Has it any certain or fixed foundation? You cannot answer this question, without admitting the very necessity for which we contend. Take care of the "divine decrees."

But while we admit, that an entirely depraved man has a natural power to do all which is required of him, yet he certainly will never do as well as he can, unless by a special influence from above. Bro. H. knows this as well as any body, and, we doubt not, has preached it a thousand times. His implied censure of our doctrine, therefore, that the Spirit of Life must have possession of the soul, in order that Gospel motives may induce one to lead a godly life, is what we would hardly have expected. There is no middle ground to be occupied here. Our brother has told his unregenerate hearers, over and over, again, that unless they are born again they cannot render a pleasing obedience to God. But what he means by such language, and what every understanding person means by it, is, not that they are not possessed of all the natural power requisite for serving God; but that the alienation of their hearts from this service is so strong, that, till the Spirit of Life has got possession of them, they will go on in sin, with a certainty as infallible as that by which a stone thrown into the air falls back to the earth. Yet the opposition which our brother feels to God's discriminating grace, causes him to reason as if he did not believe his own preaching.

On the words necessity, must, must needs, &c., as employed in certain passages which we quoted to show the Scripture usage of the terms, our correspondent quotes Mr. Cruden, who says, that the terms "do not always denote an absolute necessity, but a necessity of decency, or of duty," &c. But what is this necessity of decency, or of duty, but a sense of decency, orduty, so strong, in the cases alluded to, as to give rise to volitions—all-controlling volitions—which urged the subjects of them on to the acts in question? Mr. Cruden, therefore, agrees with us; or, at any rate, he does not dis-agree. Our brother "sees here presented, as reasons why the above mentioned acts were performed, strong influences in each case; but not a single instance where these influences might not have been overcome." So they "might," in one sense; that is, the persons spoken of possessed all the natural power which was requisite to make effectual resistance; but their moral power, which was nothing different from their governing disposition, was inadequate. Hence the necessity to do as they did. Will Bro. H. now "confess to being routed from his position?"

The term contingency—our correspondent "does not mean by it an event which takes place without a cause, but an event which has a cause, and that cause free volition." But volition itself is an event, being an act of the will. Is it a contingent event? If it is, then, as our correspondent does not mean by such an event one which takes place without a cause, it must be caused; the thing which he has denied all along. If it is a necessitated event, it must certainly have a cause which necessitated it. If it is no event at all, then it did not begin to be.

NEW MOVEMENT FOR SUNDAY.

A few years ago, the advocates of coercive laws to secure the closing of canal-locks and the stopping of railroad trains on Sunday, sought to promote this object by holding conventions, making speeches, and passing resolutions. But failing in this—as they always will fail where an opportunity is given for discussion—they are now trying to accomplish their purpose in a more stealthy way. Petitions against Sunday Mails are circulated among the "orthodox" churches in different parts of the country, and the first notice which the public have of their existence, is the announcement of their presentation to Congress. But we have very little idea that success will attend these efforts to secure a national recognition of Sunday, unless its friends can present other arguments for it than any they have yet produced.

In some of the State Legislatures, however, there is more encouragment for the Sunday coercionists. Accordingly, we learn that they are busily at work there. The latest movement of which we have heard is designed to secure a law to close the locks of all the canals in the State of New York on Sunday. It seems that a number of theological students at Rochester were first inspired with a zeal for this object; and that through their instrumentality the students of the Theological Seminary at Auburn, were so enlisted in it as to canvass that city and get the signature of every man who could be induced to sign a petition for it. A student was then sent to Albany as a "lobby member," who obtained promises to favor the movement from some fifty members of the Legislature. With this encouragement, petitions have been forwarded to the students of the Union Theological Seminary in this city, accompanied by a letter exhorting them to spare no pains in canvassing the city for signatures. We understand, however, that the New York students have too much business on hand to admit of their engaging in a general canvass, and they have consented only to circulate the petitions in the churches with which they are connected

TIDINGS FROM OUR MISSIONARIES.

Their Health—Death of Mrs. Shuck—Opening of the Chapel—An Illustration of Heathenism.

[From a Letter of N. Wardner, Shanghae, China, Dec. 18, 1851.]

As a family, we have never enjoyed so good health and spirits in China as at present.

The wife of Rev. J. L. Shuck, of the Southern Baptist Mission, died on the 21st of November, leaving an infant. She was a woman of uncommon worth, and a zealous missionary. Her death will be deeply lamented by all who knew her.

On the 22d of November we opened the new Chapel for the public ministry of the word, with encouraging prospects. The congregations do not seem to diminish as yet, but rather to increase. Its location seems to be a very good one. Still, as there are four preachers of us, we might easily occupy one or two more if we had them. The First-day Baptist Mission here has but three preachers, yet they occupy five chapels. It is hoped that as soon as consistent, means will be furnished to enable us to enlarge our operations. There is a village not more than a mile from our dwelling, where I feel anxious to get a foothold and establish a school. It contains inhabitants enough, within the distance of a few rods, to fill a large chapel; and swarms of children are growing up ignorant both of Christianity and of the literature of their own nation. Three hundred dollars in hand, I think, would purchase a site and build an edifice that would answer well both for chapel and school-room. A location in some of these country villages, it seems to me, would afford quite as much promise as one in the city, and can be obtained with far less expense. At any rate, would it not be worth a trial?

Before I close I must not omit to give you one specimen of heathenism which has just come under our observation. On the 14th inst., about one o'clock, my teacher came in, saying that an infant had been thrown out near our yard, which was still alive. I immediately had it brought in, and a more pitiful object I never beheld. The first offices of humanity had not been performed, and it had not sufficient of the most filthy covering to conceal its nakedness. There was a paper with it, stating that it was born at ten o'clock the night before, but giving no information whence it came. The night was freezing, and spires of withered grass were frozen to its limbs. We did what we could to save it, but in vain. It revived considerably on being warmed, but died the next day about 12 o'clock. We informed the neighbors that it would be buried the next morning, and invited them to attend. A few came, and Br. C. being present, we each in turn gave our testimony against such inhumanity and wickedness. I have seen no less than three infant bodies that were thrown out upon the city walls, and have seen two thrown into a little tower built for the purpose, called tih-queh-tak (tower for depositing bones,) which stands but a few rods from our house. Such is heathenism in its most elevated and refined form.

TOO DEEP TO BE FATHOMED.

Zophar, one of Job's friends, says, "Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? It is high as heaven, what canst thou do? deeper than hell, what canst thou know?" He seems to set at defiance the intellect of man, however large its grasp, to comprehend the Almighty. Indeed, when we contemplate the Divine Existence, the light is so effulgent, and the weight of the subject so ponderous, that we lie prostrate in the dust, and exclaim, "We are but of yesterday, and know nothing." A clergyman of well-disciplined and penetrating mind, once said to his son, who was turning his attention to some of the mysterious and perperplexing doctrines of revelation, "My son, take care how you approach those depths." A caution of great importance to be heeded in reference to the profound themes of the Bible.

Some of the truths of revelation seem simple and plain, and yet some of the wise of this world stumble upon them to their ruin. In the simple statements of divine truth, there is a solemnity and grandeur which engages the attention and fixes the thoughts of angels. They cavil not at the mysteries they contemplate. But man, whose mind is darkened by sin, and who is at best but in his infancy, disputes every revealed truth. Some cannot understand the eternity of God, and therefore deny his existence. Some think that God is too great to condescend to reveal his will to man, and therefore reject the Bible. Some cannot see how there can be three distinct persons in the Godhead, all equal and eternal, and therefore become unitarians. The same class of persons have no idea of the union of the divine with the human or incarnate Deity, and therefore stumble at the divinity of Christ. Mulitudes, by a desperate skepticism, throw overboard all the encouraging and consoling doctrines of the gospel, and perish. What can we do without faith in God and his word? We are out at sea, without helm or compass, at the mercy of the winds, which may veer to every point, and drive us we know not whither; and a wonder if we are not dashed on the rocks or driven on the sands.

We may not be able to comprehend how a holy and benevolent God could permit sin to curse this beautiful creation, morally and naturally. We may be equally at a loss to understand how God could know all events from the beginning of the creation to the close, and yet how man can be held responsible for all his actions, even though those actions accomplish the Divine purposes. Yet who can evade the conviction, that if God is infinite, eternal, omniscient, and omnipresent, every thing, even the most minute, is, and always has been, perfectly known to Him? Who can read the 139th Psalm without coming to such a conclusion? And if man is an intelligent being, capable of moral actions, who can escape the conclusion, that he must be responsible to his Maker? Besides, his being under law, moral law, and his destination to a future judgment, where he will be rewarded according to his works, whether they be good or bad, leaves us without a doubt as to his accountability. Let wise men, therefore, sit down at the Master's feet, and believe and adore where they cannot comprehend, and wait the disclosures of the "great day" and the future state. Then, without speculating, philosophizing, or metaphysical reasoning, things will be better understood; for all darkness will be dissipated by the broad day-light of eternity.

SALEM, N. J.

THE NORTH-WESTERN ASSOCIATION.

We are indebted to A. W. Coon, one of the clerks of the Seventh-day Baptist North-Western Association, for the statistics of the churches composing that body, and an abstract of the minutes of its fifth anniversary.

The meeting was held with the Church in Christiana, Dane Co., Wisconsin, on the 1st, 2d, 3d, and 5th days of October, 1851. Eld. Samuel Davison preached the opening discourse. The Moderator was Eld. Samuel Davison, and the Clerks were A. W. Coon and Wm. M. Clarke. The statistics prepared from the Letters of the Churches, also a Report on the State of Religion in the Churches, will be found below. A series of resolutions introduced by a committee appointed for the purpose, (but of which we have no copy,) furnished matter for a lengthy and interesting discussion. The ministers of the Association were appointed a Committee to attend all "Sabbath Conventions," so called, within the bounds of the Association. A Committee was also appointed, consisting of V. Hull, Z. Campbell, and J. M. Todd, to watch the course of legislation in Wisconsin relative to the Sabbath, and to circulate and present to the Legislature remonstrances against the passage of any laws conflicting with equal religious privileges. A Missionary Board for the ensuing year was appointed, consisting of Stillman Coon, Wm. H. Redfield, Varnum Hull, Alfred Maxson, and Joseph A. Potter. Eld. Stillman Coon was appointed a delegate to the Anniversaries of our Missionary, Tract, and Publishing Societies, to be held at Plainfield, N. J., in September next. A vote was passed, that any delegate of the Association, who may attend any Anniversary, General Meeting, or Associational Meeting of the denomination during the ensuing year, be authorized to represent this body. Levi H. Bond was appointed Treasurer for the current year, and Morris Crandall, Recording Secretary. The Association finally adjourned to meet with the Church in Albion, Dane Co., Wisconsin, on the 29th day of September, 1852.

Report on the State of Religion.

The Committee on the State of Religion report, That many tokens of grace and mercy have been manifested, not only in the revival of some of our churches, but also in the conversion of sinners. Our number has been increased, the last year, one hundred and twenty-two; which is a matter of encouragement. Still, we regret that all have not been revived, and that there is too little ardent piety and self-consecration to the service of God among us. The subject of the Sabbath is attracting the attention of some of those who are looking for truth. Several have renounced the traditions of men since our last anniversary, and embraced the Sabbath of the Bible. In conclusion, we remark, that we have much to induce us all to renew our diligence and take courage, having this assurance, that if we venture all on the promise of God, the cause in which we are engaged will finally triumph, in spite of all that may oppose.

Statistics of the Churches.

Milton—Varnum Hull, pastor; Stillman Coon, Dan'l Babcock, and Richard C. Bond, elders; Wm. H. Redfield, licentiate. L. H. Bond, deacon. Post-office, Milton, Rock Co., Wis. Added 78, dismissed 5, deceased 3, total members 180.

Albion—James Weed, licentiate. J. A. Potter, J. Weed, S. Burdick, P. C. Main, deacons. Post-office, Albion, Dane Co., Wis. Rejected 1, dismissed 4, total members 86.

Walworth—O. P. Hull, pastor. A. Maxson, Wm. S. Clarke, deacons. Post-office, Walworth, Walworth Co., Wis. Added 10, total members 34.

Farmington—S Davison, pastor; L. D. Ayres, J. Hill, elders; J. Hill, licentiate. Dennis Saunders, deacon. Post-office, Farmington, Fulton Co., Ill. Added 10, dismissed 1, deceased 3, total members 41.

Christiana—Z. Campbell, pastor. Z. Gilbert, deacon. Post-office, Utica, Dane Co., Wis. Added 19, rejected 1, total members 52.

Berlin—J. M. Todd, elder. Charles Hubbell, deacon. Post-office, Berlin, Marquette Co., Wis. Added 5, rejected 2, total members 35.

A COLONY FOR OREGON.—A letter from A. W. Coon, of Milton, Wis., says: "Quite a number of our people leave Wisconsin on the 20th of March for Oregon. They form a Colony, and among them are some of our most enterprising and worthy citizens." We hope they will not fail to inform their brethren at home of their progress, and particularly of the location which they fix upon. A considerable number of our people will undoubtedly settle in that country within two years, and it is all-important to their comfort and usefulness, that they locate in the vicinity of each other.

MISSION TO TERRA DEL FUEGO.—Intelligence has been received by the Patagonian Mission Society, of the death of a party of seven persons, namely, Capt. Gardiner, Mr. Williams, (a surgeon of Burslem,) Mr. Maidment, three seamen, and a ship's carpenter, who sailed from Liverpool on the 7th of September, 1850, to attempt to establish a mission at Terra del Fuego. It appears by a journal kept by one of the party, (Mr. Williams,) that he and his companions encountered much hostility from the natives; but their deaths were caused not so much by violence as from want of food and exposure to the weather.

TRIBUTE TO MOUNT VERNON.

From my Private Journal.

Having weighed anchor at the mouth of the Potomac, our gallant steamer was rapidly wending her way to the seat of the American Government. As she approached the city, the eyes of more than two hundred of her passengers and crew were directed towards the ancient residence and present resting-place of the "Father of his Country." As we hove in sight of Mount Vernon, the tolling bell and minute gun began to speak the feelings of all hearts, and to render more significant the solemn scene which respect has rendered customary. High on the yellow bluff, and within the shady grove on our left, stood the venerable mansion; and midway to the shore, beside the obliquely ascending path, was the tomb of our beloved Washington. As we passed and viewed the half-concealed obelisks which mark the spot of his earthly rest, our numerous company, with heads uncovered, stook in silence; the colors, which hitherto had waved gaily at the peak, took a half subdued position; and the ponderous wheels suddenly ceased to exert their usual energy, as if conscious duty imposed a muffled silence. Thus solemnly and silently the Baltic glided along, till the eye could no longer behold the tomb; when the scene as suddenly changed, and presented the accustomed bustle and activity.

SPECTATOR.

EXPOSING GOODS ON SUNDAY.—In the Assembly of New York, on Sixth-day, March 5, Mr. Van Santvoord, Chairman of the Committee to whom the petition of S. Bently and others, asking for an amendment of the law so that persons who keep the Seventh Day or Saturday as holy time may expose goods for sale on Sunday, reported adversely to the prayer of the petitioners, and the report was agreed to.

LITERARY INSTITUTIONS IN THE UNITED STATES.—There are in the United States not less than 207 colleges proper, 43 theological, 17 law, and 27 medical schools. Out of the aggregate, Pennsylvania has 21—consisting of 8 colleges, 7 theological, 2 law, and 4 medical schools. The number of volumes contained in the libraries of the colleges, exclusive of those in the professional schools, is, as far as estimated by imperfect returns, 871,800.

A RELIC.—At a recent conference of Churches in Groton, Mass., the identical Bible used by John Rogers, the martyr, and carried by him to the stake—some of the leaves of which bear the marks of the flames—was brought to the conference by a descendant of the martyr.

DEDICATION AT MILTON, WIS.—The Seventh-day Baptists at Milton, Rock Co., Wisconsin, have recently completed a meeting-house, which cost some $2000. The dedication services were appointed to be held on the 26th of February.

The Legislature of Vermont, at its recent session, enacted a law forbidding the employment of conductors, engineers, brakemen, or switchmen, "who shall make use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage." If any Company within the State fail to comply with the requirements of the law, they are liable to a prosecution, and a fine of from $300 to $3,000.

While Calvin Fairbanks has been convicted at Louisville, Ky., of stealing negroes, and been sentenced to an imprisonment of fifteen years, George Alberti, for stealing a free negro, and selling him into slaveay, got ten years; and this was regarded as monstrous by some.

Three hundred prisoners in the State Prison at Charlestown, Mass., have petitioned the Legislature to pass the Maine Liquor Law. There are now 402 convicts in the institution. Upward of fifty convicts in the New York prisons had always been total abstinence men.

The people of Indiana are petitioning their Legislature for the passage of a law which shall provide that the wife, and all others injured by the sale of intoxicating liquors, may maintain an action against the vender who furnishes the liquor.

The Liquor bill before the Massachusetts Senate has been amended so as to submit the question of its adoption to a direct vote of the people, and in that form it will probobly pass. Better so than worse.

Intolerance gives way by degrees; Jews and Christians are now allowed to intermarry in Hamburg, a thing the bare proposal of which would have shocked all Europe two centuries, nay, half a century ago.

A leading medical practitioner at Brighton, England, has lately given a list of sixteen cases of paralysis produced by smoking, which came under his own knowledge, within the last six months.

Captain Sir Edward Belcher is spoken of as likely to take command of the new searching expedition to the Arctic regions, which is to be dispatched to those seas by the British Government.

The Methodists at the West are moving in favor of a Branch of the Book Concern in Chicago. There is now but one branch establishment in the West, at Cincinnati. The Methodist Churches in the North-West are increasing rapidly.

The venerable Dr. Maclay, of this City, now seventy-four years of age, was at Jackson, Miss., on the 9th ult., engaged in the business of the American Bible Society. For the last fifteen years the Dr. has made semi-annual visits to Mississippi.

The late Michael Allen, of Pittsburg, has left $25,000 to missionary and other purposes connected with the Presbyterian Church, and $4,000 to the American Tract Society.

The Mississippi Senate has passed a Bill to prevent the introduction of slaves into that State for sale.

Frazee, the Artist, died last week, at the residence of his daughter in New Bedford, at the age of sixty years.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, MARCH 1.

In the SENATE, Mr. Dawson presented the joint resolutions of the Legislature of Georgia against intervention in foreign affairs by an effort to maintain non-intervention, and in favor of the established policy of neutrality in all political matters beyond this Continent; read and ordered to be printed. Mr. Seward then introduced a motion, that when the Senate adjourn it be to Fourth-day so that members may have an opportunity to visit the steamer Baltic. The motion prevailed after a long discussion, in which Messrs. Seward, Dodge, Gwin, Brodhead, Bayard, Borland, Mallory, Rusk, Downs, and Mangum, took part. The Iowa Land Bill was taken up, and Mr. Dawson addressed the Senate at length upon it; after which Mr. Dodge got the floor, and the Senate adjourned over to Fourth-day.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Fitch of Indiana asked leave to offer a resolution about the Compromise Measures, and requested a suspension of rules for the purpose, which was negatived by a vote of 74 to 119. Mr Johnston (of Ark.) introduced the Senate bill for the appointment of a Superintendent of Indian Affairs in California, with an amendment, which was agreed to, and the bill passed. After the transaction of some other unimportant business, the House adjourned over to Fourth-day, in order to visit the Baltic.

FOURTH-DAY, MARCH 3.

In the SENATE, a large number of petitions were presented, among which was one for a grant of land to aid in the construction of a wagon road from the Mississippi River to Oregon, and several from Ohio, Illinois and New York, praying the passage of a law making Public Lands free to actual settlers. The Bounty Land bill as it came from the House was taken up, and after a short debate every one of the House amendments were rejected. The Iowa Railroad Land Bill was then taken up, and Mr. Dodge spoke in favor of it until the hour of adjournment.

In the HOUSE, resolutions were presented from the Legislature of Ohio, asking for the construction of a canal on the Indiana side of the Falls of the Ohio River; and it was stated by the Committee on Roads and Canals, that a bill for this purpose will be reported. The bill granting a right of way and donation of lands to Missouri for railroad purposes, was taken up, Mr. Bennett concluded his speech on it, and the House refused to instruct the framing of a bill making grants of lands on some equal and just principle of apportionment, and in proper amounts, to all the States, to aid in the construction of railroads therein. Without disposing of the subject, the House proceeded to the consideration of the special order, the bill to encourage Agriculture, Commerce, Manufactures, and all other branches of industry, by granting to every man who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a Homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land, upon condition of occupation and cultivation of the same for a certain period. A speech by Mr. Dawson occupied the remainder of the session.

FIFTH-DAY, MARCH 4.

In the SENATE, the resolutions of the Legislature of Ohio for a ship Canal around the falls of St. Mary, were presented. A large number of petitions and remonstrances were presented, including some for and against Whitney's plan of a National Railroad from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Mr. Gwin offered a resolution, which was adopted, requesting the President to communicate copies of all communications on the files of the Departments relative to the Empire of Japan. A resolution was adopted calling for information in relation to California mail contracts. The Iowa Land Bill was then taken up, and its discussion occupied the remainder of the day.

In the HOUSE, the resolutions of the Georgia Legislature against intervention were presented. Mr. Hall, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported bills granting the right of way and a grant of land to the States of Indiana and Illinois for railroads. Also, similiar grants to Michigan, for the construction of a ship canal around the falls of St. Marie; to Wisconsin, for the construction of a railroad from Chicago to the head waters of Lake Superior. Also, grants of land to the States of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, for a railroad from Toledo to Springfield. Breckenridge made a speech on the bill donating land to actual settlers. He was interrupted several times; and when he had concluded, Mr. Campbell of Ohio obtained the floor, and the House adjourned.

SIXTH-DAY, MARCH 5.

THE SENATE passed a bill to facilitate the settlement of accounts of public officers in Mexico, California, &c., and appropriating money to meet expenses of California State Government previous to her admission into the Union. Petitions and private bills occupied the remainder of the day. Adjourned over to Second-day.

The HOUSE, in Committee of the Whole, had up the homestead bill, upon which speeches were made by Campbell of Ohio, Chastian of Georgia, and others, occupying the whole day.

SABBATH-DAY, MARCH 6.

The SENATE was not in session.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Beale made a personal explanation, which drew out remarks from others, and occupied considerable time. Five private bills were passed. The Senate bill, extending for five years the time for selling the lands granted by Congress to the Kentucky Asylum for the Deaf and Dumb, was passed. A debate then arose on the Senate bill for the relief of the Raleigh and Gaston Railroad—suspending the duty on rails, and proposing to pay the duties in mail service. Without taking any definite action on the subject, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the homestead bill, and the remainder of day was occupied by Mr. Davis of Massachusetts in a reply to remarks of his colleague Mr. Rantoul.

It is mentioned as a remarkable circumstance, that within the past month ice made firmly into Lake Ontario a distance of some three miles from the piers, to the depth of four inches. Such a thing is not recollected by the oldest inhabitant, and may not be seen again for a century to come.

European News.

The U. S. Mail Steamer Franklin, with four days later news from Europe, arrived at New York on the 2d inst. Her London dates are to Feb. 18.

In the House of Commons, on the 16th, Lord John Russell brought forward the second grand measure of the session, viz. to provide for the National Defense. Lord John proposed to add to the regular army about as many men as have been sent to the Cape during the present war; that is to say, 4,000 troops of the line, and 1,000 artillery-men; and as regards the militia, to enroll by ballot one fifth of all the men in Great Britain between the ages of 20 and 23 in the first year of the system, and of those between the ages of 20 and 21 in all succeeding years. They are to be liable to serve only for 14 or 28 days in the first year, and for 14 days in each of the three succeeding years.

The British Government has commenced prosecuting the Irish press, and the proprietor of The Dunkald Democrat had been arrested for publishing wicked and malicious libels on the English Government.

Accounts from the Australian Gold Diggings to the beginning of November state that the excitement had increased a hundred fold, and the Colonists had nearly gone mad. The yield of gold was immense.

The Continental news by this steamer is destitute of matter of striking interest. It is still affirmed that Louis Napoleon has designs upon Belgium, and has made some peremptory demands on Switzerland, against which the Swiss Government has claimed the intervention of Great Britain.

A letter from Vienna, of the 12th, states that the treaty respecting the indemnity due to Russia for the aid accorded by her to Austria in the war of Hungary in 1849, has been definitively concluded. Austria is to furnish Russia with salt to the amount of 1,051,133 florins (rather more than 2,000,000f.) and to pay in money 4,615,384 florins in three installments, the first of which has been already paid.

The town of Lagos, on the West Coast of Africa, was almost totally destroyed by the British Squadron, on the 26th and 27th December. The English ships sustained severe losses, having 30 men killed and 66 wounded. This great casualty was caused by one of the steamers having grounded within range of a battery of 13 guns. These hostilities were undertaken in consequence of the King having refused to ratify a treaty of peace for the suppression of the Slave-trade. An immense number of Natives were killed during the two days' fighting, and the King or Chief was deposed and another one substituted.

The Overland India and China Mail, with dates from Hong-Kong to Dec. 30, and Bombay to Jan. 17, arrived in London on the 16th February. The Burmese are said to have shown the white feather, and had acceded to the demands of the British Government. All the English ships of war remained off Rangoon, as doubts were entertained of the good faith of the King, 100,000 troops having been mustered and great warlike preparations made. About 500 houses in Hong-Kong had been destroyed by fire. The rich men of Canton had been called upon to contribute large sums toward the expense of the war, reports of which are exceedingly vague.

Three Days Later.

The steamer America, with three days later news from Europe, arrived at Halifax on the 4th inst.

In England, the great political event has been the defeat and resignation of the Russell Ministry. In the local militia bill, Lord Palmerston moved that the word "local" should be stricken out of the bill, and that the proposed force should be perambulatory—not confined to England, Scotland or Ireland—but should be sent to any quarter of the United Kingdom where it might be required. On this proposition of Lord Palmerston the Ministry joined issue, and were defeated on the division by a vote of 136 against 125. Subsequently to this expression of the Commons, Lord John Russell intimated that, having lost the confidence of the House, he could no longer hold office. The event was wholly unexpected, both in and out of Parliament, especially as on the previous night Ministers had a decided majority on Lord Naas's motion of a want of confidence, arising out of the Clarendon and Birch (the Irish editor) affair. The number voting on that occasion being 137 for the motion, and 232 against it. All sorts of rumors were afloat at Liverpool, prior to the sailing of the America, as to who would succeed Lord Russell as Premier. A coalition between Sir James Graham and Lord Palmerston was confidently expected by many.

From France there is no news worth reporting.

The health of the Queen of Spain has been completely restored. The event had been celebrated by public thanksgiving at Madrid, and in all the Catholic capitals in Europe, with great pomp and ceremony. The body of the regicide had been burned, and the Gazette contains the royal orders for the destruction of his poignard, pistols, &c.; also, for the burning of his manuscripts, in the presence of his Judges.

THE LAST OF THE TEA PARTY.—David Kennison, who fought in many of the battles of the Revolution, and is supposed to have been the last survivor of the Boston Tea Party, died at the residence of William Mack, Chicago, Feb. 24. He was born in November, 1736, and was consequently 115 years and 9 months old. An excellent portrait and biographical sketch of Mr. Kennison appeared in the first volume of Lossing's Pictorial Field Book of the Revolution. It is there stated, that Kennison had lost all traces of his children, and that he believed that not one of them survived. It is an interesting fact, that a surviving daughter, who was living at Oswego, first obtained a knowledge that her father was yet living by having Mr. Lossing's publication put into her hands. She immediately went to Chicago, and was with her venerable parent until his death.

ONONDAGA SALT.—We stated the fact some weeks since, says the N. Y. Tribune, that by order of the War Department, a parcel of 500 barrels of first quality Pork had been packed, half of it in Onondaga Salt, and the other half in Turks Island, with a view of testing the real merits of the former. Several barrels of each pickle were recently opened, in the presence of a number of gentlemen interested in the experiment. It was found upon careful inspection, that the condition of the meat was about the same, the difference, if any, being in favor of the Onondaga salt. In order to perfect the experiment, the pork is to be sent to various military and naval stations, with directions to return special reports of its quality. Should the result be what it has been thus far, the long-existing prejudice in favor of Turks Island salt over the home article will be dissipated, much to the benefit of the people, and the credit of the Government.

SUCCESSFUL ROBBERY.—On Sunday morning, Feb. 29, between 4 and 5 o'clock, the schooner C. & N. Rogers, (Thomas Rogers, master,) lying at the foot of Dover-st., New York, was robbed of $500 in gold. The money was in the Captain's trunk, in the cabin, where four men were asleep, the cabin being unlocked, and a light burning. The robbers carried the trunk on deck, broke it open, destroyed the vessel's papers, and stole the money. They also picked the pockets of the sleepers in the cabin, stealing $14 from one man's pantaloons. They took nothing but money. The schooner had just arrived from Fairhaven, and it is thought that the robbers may have come from that place also, as no one here knew that so much money was on board.

GRAND RAILROAD SCHEMES.—A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune says that there are now before Congress thirty-one applications for grants of land to assist in building railroads in the Western States. These thirty-one railroads measure upward of eight thousand three hundred miles in extent. If they could all receive alternate sections of land six miles in depth on either side of the track of each road, the aggregate number of acres would be upward of thirty millions. Assuming this land to be quadrupled in value by the roads in question, which is a moderate estimate, the worth of them would be one hundred and forty millions of dollars.

SUMMARY.

The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has affimed the judgments obtained some months ago in the District Court, by the Commonwealth, against the Bank of the United States. The first judgment was for $100,000, and the second for $800,000, both with interest. These judgments are for the annual bonus of $100,000 per annum, to which the Bank, by its charter, is liable for twenty years. The Bank resisted on the ground of having made an assignment of its effects, and consequently having no longer a legal existence. The Court, however, decided that the organization was kept up, and hence the liability was unimpaired.

Accounts from the Cape de Verd Islands to Jan. 31, state that there has been a great deal of sickness there, especially at St. Antonio and St. Vincent. At the latter place nearly three-fourths of the population had died. At the former large numbers had died, and the mortality was increasing at the last accounts. The Islands had suffered greatly from gales and rains, which prostrated houses and destroyed crops. The inhabitants were obliged to live in mud hovels, and to this cause was ascribed the great mortality.

The Cincinnati Gazette states that J. Davis, of Ross County, Ohio, cultivates 1,800 acres of Indian corn; that he has this winter "a corn crib filled, which is three miles long, ten feet high, and six feet wide!" H. L. Ellsworth, of La Fayette County, Indiana, cultivates twelve thousand acres, which would require at the same ratio a crib twenty miles long, six feet in hight. He is desirous of selling thirty small farms of one thousand acres each.

We learn from The Bath (Me.) Tribune, that recent efforts for the execution of the Liquor Law in Wiscasset have resulted in the entire suppression of the sale of intoxicating drinks for beverage. Three rumsellers stand convicted on the third case; one has appealed, by giving bonds. One was committed for 60 days, in default of payment. The amount of fines, exclusive of appealed cases, paid over to the town, is $120—besides cost of suits, $20.

The Jamestown Journal has an account of the death of Miss Artemesia Eames, a young lady formerly of Carroll, Chau. County, and at the time of the fatal occurrence teacher of a school in Ohio. In crossing a stream on horseback, in the evening, her horse took fright, and she was thrown and carried under the ice. Her body was not recovered up to the 5th.

A man named Rapp, living in Philadelphia, has invented glass coffins. They are made air-tight, and of sufficient strength to prevent bulging. The durability of glass is well known, and the remains of the departed being entirely protected, decomposition goes on very slowly.

Rev. Mr. Littlejohn, of New Haven, in his lecture before the Arts Union, remarked that the first piece of cloth ever made in the United States was manufactured in Hartford, Conn., by Jeremiah Wadsworth, in 1790, and that Gen. Washington wore a suit of clothes made from this cloth.

At the late term of the Circuit Court in Genesee, N. Y., James Welden was convicted of arson in the first degree. He was indicted for setting fire to a dwelling-house in Dansville. He was sentenced to be hung on the 9th of April next. He confessed his guilt.

Letters from Buenos Ayres to the 8th January, state that Urquiza had crossed the Parana with about 26,000 men, and Rosas had about 30,000. An engagement was daily expected, and the general impression was, among the foreigners, that Rosas would be overthrown.

In the Southern portion of Arkansas, near a mountain of iron, a mountain of emery or corondum has been discovered, equal, if not superior, to the Russian emery. In Russian emery, rubies are found; and that in Arkansas is of the same components.

The value of all the milk sold in Massachusetts for the year ending June 1, 1850, was $276,887. Dedham is the largest town in the "milky way," having sold $45,000 worth. The above does not include the milk made into butter and cheese.

The steamship Baltic was visited by the President of the United States, Heads of Departments, Members of Congress, &c., &c., on the 2d inst. Some 2000 persons are said to have been on board at one time. As "victuals and drink" were gratuitously and plentifully furnished, of course there was a jolly time. A large appropriation by Congress to sustain the Line to which the Baltic belongs, is considered certain.

A machine for the manufacture of bricks is shortly to be put in operation in Louisville. The inventor is a native of England, and is now in that city. It is said that the machine, when constructed, will manufacture bricks ready for use in the short space of thirty-six hours, and at a cost of at least fifty per cent. less than the usual mode of manufacturing them.

Died in Strafford, Orange County, Vt., on the 16th ult., Mr. Elias Carpenter, in the 91st year of his age. He served the three last years of the Revolution; was the first American soldier that entered the City of New York at the evacuation of the British, which occurred Nov. 25, 1783.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co. have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Two Living Aztec Children.

A NEW AND ABSOLUTELY UNIQUE RACE OF MANKIND.—The most extraordinary and inexplicable phenomena that the history of the human race has yet produced, can be seen for a few weeks at the large Exhibition Room of the Society Library, corner of Broadway and Leonard-street. They were recently taken from a newly-discovered and idolatrous people in Central America, by whom they were kept with superstitious veneration, distinct and secluded as a caste of their priesthood, and employed as Mimes and Bacchanals in their Pagan ceremonies and worship.

They are male and female. The latter measuring 29½ inches in height, weighing 17 lbs.; the former is 33 inches high, and weighs 20 lbs.

From repeated and careful examination, the best Physiologists state the older to be 12 or 13 years of age; the younger about 10 years.

They differ altogether from examples of the dwarf kind, and from children; affording complete and undeniable illustration of a Piamean variety of the Human Race!

Miscellaneous.

Oregon Territory.

Circular of Hon. Joseph Lane, Delegate from Oregon, in reference to the Settlement, Soil, and Climate of Oregon Territory.

WASHINGTON CITY, January 1, 1852.

The great number of letters I am constantly receiving, making inquiries in reference to the Territory of Oregon, has induced me to embody in the form of a circular such information as is usually desired, that I may thus be enabled to furnish it more promptly and more in detail than a due attention to my other public duties would allow me, were I to endeavor to give a written answer to each. I hope this course will not be considered discourteous to my correspondents, for in pursuing it I will more effectually and satisfactorily serve them, which is my chief desire.

Oregon is a mountainous country, interspersed with many extensive, rich and beautiful valleys, watered by cool, pure streams, having their sources among its snow-clad mountains. It is exceedingly healthy—no country is more so. The atmosphere is pure, and the climate delightful, especially during the summer. From April to November there is but little rain, but a cool, gentle breeze blows almost perpetually from the North. The winters are rainy, but mild, for during this season warm South winds constantly prevail.

The country is well watered, and the soil very fertile, and well adapted to the growth of all the small grains, grasses, potatoes, and other culinary vegetables—and yielding most abundantly, except Indian corn, which is not regarded as a successful crop. Many of the hills and mountains are covered with inexhaustible forests of fine timber, generally fir and cedar. These forests frequently skirt the valleys and streams.

As is well known, the Columbia is the only great river on the Pacific slope, and stretches from the seacoast to the Rocky Mountains. From its mouth to the Cascades, a distance of about one hundred and fifty miles, there is an uninterrupted navigation for vesssels of the largest size. The Willamette empties into the Columbia about ninety miles from its mouth. This river is also navigable for the largest vessels to Portland, fifteen miles from its mouth, and many have ascended as high as Milwaukie, seven miles further.

At the risk of some little repetition, it may not be deemed improper or unnecessary to give a more detailed and minute description of the valley of this and some of the other streams of Oregon.

The Willamette valley is bounded by the Coast mountains on the west, and the Cascade range on the the east. The soil is excellent, and is not surpassed, if equaled, by any portion of the continent, in its adaptation to the growth of wheat, rye, and oats. Potatoes are produced in great abundance, and of a superior quality; while wheat is invariably a certain crop, subject to none of the diseases and uncertainties peculiar to it in the States: it matures slowly, hence the grain is always full and plump, and the straw unusually solid and elastic, and not subject to fall. In consequence of the cool, dry summers, and the entire absence of rain during the harvest season, the farmer is enabled to gather in his grain without waste.

This valley is about one hundred and fifty miles in length, and thirty-five in breadth, and is sparsely settled throughout its whole extent. Many fine locations are yet unoccupied which will richly repay the labor of the thrifty husbandman. Natural meadows, as yet untouched by the hand of cultivation, afford abundant and rich pasturage for immense herds of cattle. The valley is mostly prairie, skirted by beautiful groves of timber, while through its centre runs the Willamette river.

The Umpqua valley is distant from the Willamette about twelve miles, and is separated from it by the Calapooe mountain. It is about ninety miles in length, and varies from five to thirty-five miles in width. It is made up of a succession of hills and dales, and furnishes but little timber, yet abounds in a natural luxuriant growth of the richest grass.

North and South Umpqua rivers run through this valley, and form a junction about forty miles from the bay of the same name. The entrance to this bay is found to be practicable, as many ships and steamers have crossed the bar at its mouth, finding from three to three-and-a-half fathoms of water upon it, without the aid of pilots, buoys, or light-houses. A few slight accidents, however, have occurred for the want of such improvements. A port of entry has been established here, and appropriations have been made for a light-house and fog signals.

This bay is destined to be an important point to the southern portion of Oregon; here will be the outlet for the produce of the Umpqua valley, and, consequently, here will be its commercial city. Many pack trains are already employed in the transportation of goods and provisions from this point to the "gold diggings" on Rogue, Chasté, and Scott Rivers.

Rogue river valley, which takes its name from the river that passes through it, is about seventy miles by the main traveled route from the Umpqua. The valley is well watered by never-failing streams; the soil is generally good, and it is skirted and interspersed with groves of fine timber. As it borders upon a rich gold region, it must eventually become densely populated. As yet, however, it contains no white settlement, but is occupied by the Rogue river Indians, who have rendered it the seat of much trouble and suffering from their depredations.

There is no portion of the Territory, and, indeed, I may almost add of the world, better adapted to grazing than this valley. In extent it is about fifty by thirty miles. Surrounded by mountains, the eye seldom rests upon a more beautiful, picturesque, and romantic spot. It extends to within a few miles of the boundary between Oregon and California. These valleys all lie west of the Cascade mountains, and south of the Columbia.

There are also many small valleys, rich and fertile, in this part of the Territory, affording good inducements to settlers, and which no doubt will be speedily occupied so soon as suitable protection can be extended over them by the Government.

A very interesting portion of Oregon lies north of the Columbia, and is being rapidly settled. The Cowlitz, which rises in the Cascade mountains, north of the Columbia, runs through a large tract of fine, arable land, entering the Columbia some forty or fifty miles from its mouth.

A French settlement, of many years growth, commences near this river, about thirty miles from its mouth, and now embraces some large and valuable farms. Americans also, have, within the last six years, settled between it and the Chahales, and are doing well. The country is level and fertile, and beautifully interspersed with prairies and timber.

The valley of the Chahales is also fertile, and well adapted to cultivation. Between it and Puget Sound, the country is level and well timbered, with occasional small prairies. This Sound is one of the safest and best harbors in the world. It affords fine ship navigation into an important portion of the Territory. Surrounded by a large district of country, rich in soil, with immense forests of the finest timber in the world, and combining many advantages, agricultural and commercial, it is destined to be, at no distant day, one of the most important points on the Pacific coast. A low pass in the Cascade mountains offers a route for a good road from the Sound to Fort Walla-Walla, on the Columbia. Such a road would be important for military purposes, and would also be a great saving of distance and time to emigrants going to the Cowlitz and Chahales rivers, Puget's Sound, or to any other point north of the Columbia. At present, emigrants are compelled to take the road across the Cascade Mountains, south of the Columbia, to Oregon City, from whence it is as far, by a road almost impassable, to Puget Sound, as it would be from Walla-Walla by the road suggested.

There are, also, east of the Cascade range, north and south of the Columbia, now in possession of the Indians, large districts of country finely adapted to grazing, with occasional good tracts of farming land, which will, no doubt, ere long be occupied by the whites.

Oregon City is situated at the Great Falls of the Willamette. Steamboats run daily from this place to Portland, and those of a small class also run daily up the river, above the falls, from thirty to fifty miles, and in some instances, recently, as I am informed, they have even gone up one hundred and fifty miles. A small, judicious expenditure would render the river constantly navigable for such boats that distance.

The population of Oregon, including the immigration of the last season, is probably twenty thousand. The immigration is rapidly increasing, owing not only to the natural advantages of the country, but the liberal provisions made for actual settlers by a late law of Congress. By that law liberal donations of lands are made to all who will settle upon them previous to the first day of December, 1853. To a single man one hundred and sixty acres, and to a married man three hundred and twenty—one half in his own right and the other half to his wife in her own right, upon condition that they will live upon and cultivate it for four years.

The population is of a substantial character, much better than is generally found in new countries. The people are enterprising, industrious, frugal, and orderly. Many of the earlier settlers have large well cultivated farms; indeed, agriculture every where in the Territory may be said to be in a flourishing condition, remarkably so for a new country. California and the Sandwich Islands afford markets and good prices for all our surplus products, and will undoubtedly for years to come.

Many of the various religious denominations have established churches in the Territory, to some one of which the majority of the settlers belong. Great interest has also been manifested by the people in the establishment of good schools, and admirably have they succeeded in their laudable efforts. The Institute at Salem, under the patronage of the Methodist Episcpoal Church, and the Academy at Tualatin Plains, under the control of the Presbyterians, are excellent and flourishing institutions. There are also two female Institutes in Oregon city. Portland, Lafayette, and other small towns, have good schools. Indeed, they are common in the country wherever the population will justify them. A grant of land was made by the last Congress for the endowment of a university—the site of which has been fixed by the Territorial Legislature at Marysville.

The Indians immediately bordering on or near the settlements are perfectly friendly and well-disposed; settlers have nothing to fear from them. Those upon Rogue river are troublesome to persons passing through their country, and will probably continue so until a garrison shall be established to overawe and keep them in subjection. This I hope will soon be done, for their depredations upon travelers have already caused much trouble and suffering. They are upon the great thoroughfare from Oregon to California; a fork of which leads to Fort Hall, being the road frequently traveled by emigrants from that point to Oregon.

Emigrants have the past year suffered considerably from the Snake Indians, who infest the great road west from Fort Hall, and who are scattered over a large extent of Territory through which the road passes. The establishment of a garrison in their country is essentially neccessary for the maintenance of peace, and the protection of the lives and property of persons passing to and from Oregon. A number of emigrants have, during the past season, been murdered by the Indians, and many of their animals and other property stolen from them. Emigrants should exercise great care and prudence in passing through this district of country, and they should remember, that it is essential to their safety, upon all parts of this road, that in no case should they suffer themselves to be taken by surprise, or the least advantage had of them by the Indians, for the least carelessness, or want of proper precaution, often seriously endangers the safety of not only their property but their lives.

Those who contemplate emigrating to Oregon, should be ready to leave St. Joseph, on the Missouri river, with a proper outfit, by the first day of May. Ox teams are much to be preferred. Provisions for the trip, and sufficient blankets for bedding, with such tools only as are necessary to repair a wagon, should be taken. Each man should also carry his gun and plenty of ammunition. The journey is a long and tedious one, and all who undertake it must expect to endure fatigue, privations, and hardships. I would advise every person, or at least every company, to procure Palmer's Emigrants' Guide. It correctly lays down the fords across the streams, the camping grounds, and also the places where grass, wood, and water, can be found. No article not necessary for the journey should be taken, as there is great danger of overloading and breaking down the teams. Dry goods, groceries, furniture, and farming utensils, of all kinds, are abundant in Oregon, and no one should think of taking such things with them. It must not, however, be supposed that no inconveniences are to be experienced by emigrants after they arrive there. These are always incident to the settlement of new countries, especially for the first year, but they are fewer in Oregon than are usual in the settling of new territories. JOS. LANE.

Mozart Composing at Six Years of Age.

No musician has more successfully embraced the whole extent of his art, or shone with greater lustre in all its departments, than Mozart. His greater operas no less than his simple songs, his learned symphonies as well as his airy dances, all bear the stamp of the richest imagination, the deepest sensibility, and the purest taste. All his works develop the originality of his genius, and rank him with the small number of men of genius who from an epoch in their art.

At six years of age, Mozart had made such progress in music as to be able to compose short pieces for the harpsichord, which his father was obliged to commit to paper for him. His father, who was a musician of some eminence, returning home one day with a stranger, found little Mozart with a pen in his hand. "What are you writing?" said he. "A concerto for the harpsichord," replied the child. "Let us see it," rejoined the father; "it is no doubt a marvelous concerto." He then took the paper, and saw nothing, at first, but a mass of notes mingled with blots of ink, by the mal-address of the young composer, who, unskilled in the management of the pen, had dipped it too freely into the ink. He had blotted and smeared the paper, and had endeavored to make his ideas with his fingers. On a closer examination, his father was lost in wonder, and his eyes, delighted and overflowing with tears, became riveted on the notes. "See," exclaimed he to the stranger, "how just and regular it all is; but it is impossible to play it; it is too difficult." "It is a concerto," said the child, and must be practiced till one can play it. Hear how this part goes." He then sat down to perform it, but was not able to execute the passages with sufficient fluency to do justice to his own ideas.

The sensibility of Mozart's organs was excessive; the slightest harshness or discordancy in a note was quite a torture to him. Entirely absorbed in music, this great man was quite a child in every other respect. His hands were so wedded to the piano, that he absolutely could not use them for any thing else. At table his wife carved for him; and, in every thing relating to money, or to the management of his domestic affairs, he was entirely under her tutelage. [Arvine.

Strange Fanaticism.

In Finmarck, which is the remotest northern region of Norway, almost lost in Arctic snows, a revolution is now raging, which, although purely religious, is attended with all the disastrous circumstances of political troubles. The inhabitants of this desolate region, persuaded by missionaries of some sect whose tenets have not transpired, have repudiated Christianity, and especially the seventh commandment, banished the Priests, and now adopt the doctrines of the missionaries, who profess to have received them directly from Heaven.

The Bishop of Drontheim, in whose diocese Finmarck is situated, immediately upon receipt of the intelligence, dispatched two of his clergy to the scene of excitement, who were instructed to show the inhabitants into what errors they had fallen. These gentlemen arrived, and found that the report was less startling than the actual state of things. Universal dejection reigned in Finmarck, labor was abandoned, the Churches were deserted, and the Pastors driven away. In the streets and in the houses, men, women and children lay upon the ground, with their garments torn, their heads strewn with ashes, and bitterly lamenting that until then they had lived in a false faith, ignoring the true God, and meriting eternal suffering. The ecclesiastics dispatched by the Bishop apprised him that the fanaticism was so obstinate, and the confusion so profound and universal, that they saw no other means of preserving the peace of the country, and saving the inhabitants from their own fury, than the intervention of the military power. In consequence of these representations, the Governor of Drontheim has dispatched a high officer of Police and an armed force to Finmarck. The result of the movement is not yet known.

SEASONABLE ADVICE.—The following "recipe" commends itself to every reader:—

Of all the means of curing colds, says an exchange, fasting is the most effectual. Let whoever has a cold eat nothing whatever for two days, and his cold will be gone, provided he is not confined in his bed, because by taking carbon into the system by food, but consuming that surplus which caused that disease by breath, he soon carries off his disease by removing the cause. This will be found more effectual if he adds copious water drinking to protracted fasting. By the time a person has fasted one day and night, he experiences a freedom from pain and clearness of mind, in delightful contrast with mental stupor and physical pain caused by colds. And how infinitely better is this method of breaking up colds than medicines!

THE TROUBLE OF BEING SOMEBODY.—The vexations to which Mr. and Mrs. Goldschmidt are subjected, in Northampton, are vividly depicted in The Northampton Courier. That paper says:—

"One boorish chap arrived in town on Saturday—quartered himself at the Mansion House, and dispatched the porter with a letter to Mrs. Goldschmidt, conveying the astounding intelligence that if she did not immediately send him ten thousand dollars he should be obliged to go into insolvency! Another equally stupid, but more modest chap, informed her that his grandmother bore the name of Jenny Lind, in whole or in part, and requested three or four thousand dollars. And still another, that a relative wished to commence business, but was short of funds—three thousand would give him a good start, and that little sum, a mere drop in her bucket, was politely requested. Other equally ridiculous requests are doubtless made. It is a pity that people will make fools of themselves in this way."

A long experiment, of the Coast Survey, with some dozen different lines of telegraph, establishes the fact that the velocity of the galvanic current is about fifteen thousand four hundred miles per second.

DO INDIANS SWEAR?—We have been favored, says an exchange, by the Rev. R. M. Loughridge, missionary to the Creek Indians, with the following answer to the question—"Do the Indians swear?"

The remark, that the heathen do not swear in their own language, is, I believe, correct. Certain I am that the Creek Indians never attempt it. To call another by some vulgar name, as 'old dog,' or something of the kind, is the nearest approximation they can make. On a certain occasion, Jim Henry, a half blood Creek, then Government interpreter, swore very profanely in English. After he had ceased, I asked him if he could swear in Creek: 'No,' he replied, 'the Creeks cannot swear in their language. I could translate an oath into our language, but it would be the most solemn prayer to God which any one could offer.' The same is also the case with the Seminoles, Choctaws and Cherokees.

THE INTRODUCTION OF COAL INTO ENGLAND.—When this fuel was first introduced into England, the prejudices against it were so strong that the Commons petitioned the crown to prohibit the "noxious" fuel. A royal proclamation having failed to abate the growing nuisance, a commission was issued to ascertain who burned coal within the city and its neighborhood, and to punish them by fine for the first offense, and by demolition of their furnaces if they persisted in the transgression. A law was at length passed, making it a capital offence to burn coal in the city of London, and only permitting it to be used in the forges in the vicinity. Among the records in the tower, Mr. Astle found a document importing that in the time of Edward I., a man had been tried, convicted, and executed for the crime of burning coal in London. It took three centuries to entirely efface this prejudice.

DOINGS OF "THE SPIRITS" IN VERMONT.—The 'Spirits' are doing a large business up in Woodstock, Vt. Gen. Washington has been communicating at length his views on national politics. The 'medium' wishes to make oath that the entire communication was transmitted to him from the Spirit World, but the laws of Vermont forbid the administration of extra-judicial oaths, so the Justice could not consent.

The spirit of the once famous Radical, Wm. Cobbett, has rapped out that a book which has won a very wide circulation, under the title of "The Young Man's Guide, by Wm. A. Alcott," is in essence and substance stolen from his own much older work, known in its day as "Cobbett's Advice to Young Men," which charge he assumes to back up by ample citations of chapter and page.

POLICY OF AFRICAN SLAVE-TRADERS.—The nut of the shea butter tree, found in Dahomey, is about the size of a pigeon's egg; and the kernel, when new, is nearly all butter. It was formerly an article of considerable trade amongst the natives, until the foreign slave-traders, fearing lest this industrial pursuit might indispose them to the prosecution of the slave-trade, recommended to the king to impose a heavy duty on the article when brought to the market for sale; and when this was found ineffectual, orders were given to destroy the tree by burning it. What term will fitly characterize men who will take such a course? What would be too dear or too sacred for them to trample on, if it lay in the way of their interests? [Journal of Missions.

THE MAGNETIC TELEGRAPH IN MEXICO.—A party of Americans have put up a line of magnetic telegraph from the City of Mexico to Napolucan, a distance of one hundred and fifty miles, or half way down to Vera Cruz, to which it is to be extended in less than three months time. The line already up is doing a very fair business, the receipts averaging thirty-five dollars per day, and the expenses about fifteen dollars. These receipts will be largely increased when the line is finished to Vera Cruz. Another line is in contemplation from the City of Mexico to Acapulco, on the Pacific, three hundred miles further, which will connect the Atlantic with the Pacific. This will be a highly important connection, considering our California possessions on the Pacific.

VARIETY.

One of the subscribers to the Worcester Spy, sent to the office recently, for two or three missing numbers, to complete his file of the paper for the last year. He had taken, and paid for the paper, since Anno Domini 1792, a period of sixty years, and now possesses the whole set, bound in a good substantial manner. It is needless to add that the aforesaid subscriber is one of the most intelligent men in the county.

The speed attained on the Hudson River Railroad is believed to be without parallel in this country. Two new locomotives have been put on the track—the speed of one was three hours and twelve minutes between New York and Albany, and the other only three hours and eight minutes—the whole time, including stoppages, only four hours.

People's ideas of comfort are various. A celebrated hangman in England, showing the gallows attached to Newgate, observed to the by-standers, that he had hung twenty persons on it at one time. Some one said that it was too small. "Oh! no, bless you, twenty-five people could swing on that very comfortably."

When a Grand Jury was being empannelled at Cambridge, Mass., a juror asked to be excused on the ground that he was deaf of one ear, and could only hear on one side. Judge Hoar replied, that that did not appear to be a sufficient excuse, since, as a Grand Juror, he was only expected to hear one side!

It is calculated that flax cotton, prepared by Claussen's method, can be furnished to the manufacturer at six cents per pound, and leave ample margin for profits to those who produce the flax and prepare it. In Illinois flax can be raised at $5 a tun, and the seed from a tun is worth $1.

The death of Simeon B. Stevens, Esq., a respectable citizen of Newbury, N. H., was caused by a newspaper, which he had borrowed and was carrying home, when the wind took it away. He chased it through the drifted snow, and died of fatigue soon after recovering it.

The following is a child's idea of the head-ache:—"What's the matter, Harry?" inquired a lady of a little fellow scarce two years old, who was evidently suffering with the headache. "Something is pulling all my hair out," was the lisping reply.

A horse belonging to Mr. William P. Dakin, of the town of North-East, was frightened to death under the following circumstances:—As the team were drawing wood to the Harlem Railroad, on the morning of the 22d ult., while standing by the pile to unload, a few feet from the track, a train of cars came up with rapid speed, discharging a large volume of steam. As they passed, the horse nearest the track turned his head to see them, then drew it back, gave a snort, and fell and expired.

An Affghan, living in London, and well known there to many offcers of high rank, has written his Memoirs, including Journeys and Campaigns. He ascribes the origin of the Affghans to the Jews, and although they have paid taxes to the Government over them, they have kept aloof from it. They are hard and obstinate, selfish and cross, he says, but on the other hand very regular in prayer, well read in the Koran, respect an oath, honor the marriages tie, and respect their Priests.

The last number of the Cherokee Advocate gives the substance of the President's Message in verse, after the manner of the singing-geography, adapted to the tune of "The Winding Way." The editor states that these documents are apt to be prosy, and he "has employed a competent poet for the accommodation of that large portion of the public which is horrified at these annual inflictions in their usual shape."

THE Academic Year commences the last Wednesday in August, and closes the last Tuesday in June of each year.

Board of Instruction.

Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress.
Rev. J. W. MORTON, } Assistants.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, }

The Terms for 1851 and 1852 are as follows:—
The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.
" Second " Dec. 3 " " March 16.
" Third " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one of two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term, Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.

Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS.

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00
Drawing,	1 00
Monochromatic Painting	3 00
Oil Painting,	5 00
Writing and Stationery,	0 50
Vocal Music, Elementary,	1 00
Advanced Class,	2 00
Instrumental Music,	8 00

Use of Organ or Piano, $2 00 per quarter.

BOARD, in private families, per week, from $1 25 to $1 50; in clubs, from 60 to 90 cents.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall Term, and at the middle of the Winter Term, and continue seven weeks. The course will embrace a thorough review of the common school branches, with daily lectures on "The Art of Teaching," Chemistry, Physiology, Laws of Health, School Laws, &c., &c. Tuition $2 50.

Students should not be furnished with unnecessary pocket-money, neither should minors be allowed to contract debts in the village. Either member of the Faculty will superintend the financial affairs of pupils placed under their care, by special direction from parents and guardians, if funds are furnished in advance.

FOREKNOWLEDGE.

Dear Brother Brown:

You commence your "reply," of Feb. 19, by saying, "In the vocabulary of every-day life, contingency denotes that which comes without design, foresight or expectation on our part. On our part, we speak of contingencies; but with an Infinite Being nothing can be contingent. This is so clear, that metaphysical writers have generally employed the term in a more restrained sense, viz: as denoting that which comes without necessity; 'something which has absolutely no previous ground or reason, with which its existence has any fixed and certain connection.' Our arguments have been, and will be, designed to show that, in this metaphysical sense of the term, a contingent event cannot have any existence. Consequently, those who maintain the doctrine of contingency, must, in the end, either abandon this metaphysical definition, and adopt the common one, or, like Socinus and his followers, conclude that the attribute of foreknowledge does not belong to the Almighty to the extent in which it is usually understood. Taking the word in its common acceptation, we can admit, without hesitation, that God foreknows some events as contingent."

That God foreknows some events or circumstances that come to pass or happen without our foresight or expectation, is very true. That with us this kind of contingencies may happen, is not denied or affirmed in this discussion. But what I affirm is—1. All things that occur in the course of human events are certainly foreseen by God. 2. All things that occur in the course of human events, concerning which the doctrine of human responsibility is justly predicable, occur by the power or operation of man's self-determining and therefore un-necessitated will. 3. A contingent event is one that happens or comes to pass by the operation of the self-determining and therefore un-necessitated will of man. Another definition of contingency may be stated as follows: Any thing the possible existence or nonexistence of which may be conceived of.

Upon the first proposition, no time need be spent; as to that we are agreed. But as regards the second, we are not agreed. The Calvinist insists that the Divine Being cannot certainly foreknow a future event unless it be made certain by the operation of the law of necessity; to say that God can certainly foreknow a future contingent event, is an absurdity, because certainty and contingency are contradictions. Hence he affirms, that the doctrine of certain foreknowledge with regard to the acts of a self-determining (and therefore uncertain) will, is a fallacy. Upon this let us bestow a little further attention.

1. I call certain foreknowledge that which certainly foresees or foreknows all future actions. Now, it makes not the least difference in the world whether it is necessitated or free, as to the idea of the certainty of the foreknowledge of any given act or event. If it be said that the idea of the possible uncertainty of existence of the act destroys the idea of certainty, so that God could not certainly foreknow it, we answer, By no means! For the Divine and Infinite Intelligence can at the same time foresee the certainty and yet possible uncertainty of any given transaction. To say that an act is both certain and uncertain at the same time, may be a contradiction. But to say that an act is certain, and yet the possibility of uncertainty attaches to its character, is not a contradiction. To assert the contrary, is to assert the doctrine of fate.

What I assert, then, is not, that an act may be both certain and uncertain at the same time, but that an act may be certain and at the same time there exist a possibility of its being otherwise. I will illustrate what I mean. In 1841, I had an excellent horse stolen from me by some man or men. Now, my horse was certainly stolen. God foreknew that he would certainly be stolen; that is, that the thief (or thieves) would certainly steal him. But he also as certainly foreknew that the power, the whole power, all the power necessary was possessed by that person or those persons to let that horse be! Else where was the guilt? Upon the principles of Edwards' system, the thief in this instance stood in the same moral as well as physical relation to the act committed as does the engine upon the railroad when it runs over a man and kills him!

Now, however "clear" to Bro. B.'s mind that statement of Edwards' may be, wherein he says, "There is absolutely no evidence at all of the future existence of that event which is contingent, without all necessity," to my mind it is not so "clear." To reason that God cannot certainly foreknow a future event because it is contingent, that is, because it possesses the character of possibility of being otherwise; to reason that he cannot distinguish between its certain character, and its possible character; to reason that an action or event cannot possess at the same time a certain character, and the character of possibility of having been otherwise, that is, the possibility of occurring under other circumstances, or of not occurring at all; in short, to reason that God cannot foresee the certain operations of a free volition, may be the consummation of all metaphysical and philosophical reasoning!—the end of logical deductions! If so, I conclude the "end thereof is death!" That the "mind has no ability to seize upon evidence where there is none," I know is a truism. But that God's infinite mind is able to seize upon all facts, truths and circumstances of free will, and therefore free actions, and to know, to comprehend most circumstances, their certain and possible characters, I verily believe.

Bro. B.'s statement concerning axioms and theorems is correct, and a good enough illustration of the point he is presenting. His reasoning concerning the mode and objects of knowing and knowledge, is well; but after all, if future events are self-evident to God, as is acknowledged, then is not their character also self-evident to him? Can he not as easily know the possible as the certain character of an event?

As to whether my language concerning the "law of contingencies" is unmeaning or "without meaning," of course that is a good deal as you take it. Let contingency be defined as I have defined it above, (and I conclude that I have a right to this definition,) and I think it will be found to have a meaning by the operations of a law of a "full and fixed connection."

"If God certainly foresees what you will do, He foresees that you certainly will do it." Certainly. "And any proposition affirming that you will possibly not do it; he foresees or foreknows to be false." Certainly. [But any proposition affirming that I cannot do otherwise, He also knows to be false.] "The absolute and unfrustrable certainty of your doing it is the foundation of his certain foreknowledge of it." [The absolute certainty that I will do it is the foundation of His certain foreknowledge of it.] "By how much you take away the certainty of it; you take away God's certain foreknowledge of it." [I do not take away its certainty.] "And if the act is first certain before God can have any knowledge of it, some cause or power has made it certain—that is, has necessitated it—that is, has decreed it; otherwise you have an effect without a cause." [But if it was made certain "before" God knew any thing about it, then God did not make it certain. If he did, he did it without knowing it! Decrees existing before God knew anything about them! Who enacted them? Of course we cannot have an "effect without a cause!"]

Bro. B. opens his reply to my argument upon human responsibility, by saying that he does not know but I may mean conscience instead of consciousness. I will rehearse my statement. I said, "Human consciousness is against the doctrine of necessity in every instance where it affirms responsibility." Now I meant consciousness, not conscience, and think I stated an important truth. By consciousness I mean self-recognition, the mind knowing itself, in its knowledge, volitions, emotions, &c. But my ideas perhaps may be made plain by illustration. My consciousness affirms the presence of guilt in my mind when I am convinced of wrong doing; also, it affirms the presence of regret where I have made a mistake in some important matter, though my intentions were good. I may by mistake do a man an injury; he may assert that I intended the injury; but my consciousness affirms my innocence in that respect. Now for an application of this to our argument. 1. If you are required under heavy penalties to perform a task that you are physically incapable of, your consciousness affirms the requirement unjust; and if you are charged with guilt for non-performance, your consciousness denies the charge, and affirms your innocence; and 2. Your consciousness affirms that "power and responsibility go together." This is a first principle of reason.

But that we make no mistake here, let us know what the system is that we oppose. Bro. B. says, in reference to our statement that the predetermination of all human actions refers the power to God, 'and' therefore the responsibility is with him, "Pray, how is this? Our system amply concedes that man has a natural power to do right. He possesses all the physical and intellectual capacities which are requisite for serving God. He has all needed opportunities for doing the things which are required of him. There is, therefore, no natural necessity for doing wrong. Yet he lacks moral power; that is, he lacks the disposition; hence the only sense in which it is true that the proposition objected to refers the power to God, is that it refers to him the power to originate in man the moral power or disposition to do right. And does this relieve man from responsibility? Does it throw the responsibility on God?" Most certainly! Let us see. Is man required to do right? He is. What abilities are essential for him in order to do right? Why, natural, physical and moral. Can he do right if he has not natural ability? He cannot. Can he do right if he has not physical ability? He cannot. Can he do right if he lacks moral ability? He cannot. In whose keeping are these several abilities? God's. If God commands, and then withholds the natural ability essential to do right, does he require impossibilities? And if he shall charge you with guilt; does not consciousness deny the charge, and affirm your innocence? Pray, how can it do otherwise? But you are met with this statement, "You had all the physical ability and moral ability necessary; you only lacked natural ability." Would you not reply, "Yes, but natural ability was essential to the doing of the thing?" And further you might say, "that so far as doing the thing is concerned, I might just as well have been without the other two as without this one, inasmuch as I could not do it without this also." If God should punish a man for not exercising an ability which he had withheld from him, would not your consciousness affirm that in so doing he was unjust?

Again, "Who denies that man has the power of volition? What we deny is, that he has the power to originate his volitions or even to change them. Every man has the power to exercise his volitions," &c. Well, then, men cannot do right without volitions; but they have volitions; yes, but in their creation wrong volitions were given them, and they can not originate good volitions nor change their volitions. What then? Why, it is a "part of their very nature" to exercise their volitions, and of course they must exercise such as they have. Therefore, they must disobey. Well, what then? Why, they must be damned for not exercising volitions that God never gave them! Is THAT SO?

In regard to the question of "predominant inclination," it seems to me Bro. B. confounds inclination with will. Now, I take it that they are entirely separate, and that inclination is entirely under the control of the will. Will is the executive power in man; inclination is a prompting power. Apply this principle, and the whole paragraph is at once answered.

"The devil himself is a free agent. He possesses all the natural powers requisite for serving his Creator, (!) but he is such a devil that he cannot cease from sin." Then he is neither a free agent nor guilty.

As to the illustration I made use of when I referred to mesmerism, I did not suppose that the kind of influence used by the Almighty, or the mode of employing it; was analogous to that introduced, but, that so far as responsibility was concerned, they were very much alike.

In regard to the question, "Is it possible for an unrenewed man to keep the law of God?" I answer, The obligation and the ability possessed or proposed must go hand in hand. If God does not afford me the ability and the grace essential to the performance of a given act, then he does not require it. "If there be first a willing mind, then it is accepted according to what a man hath, and not according to what he hath not."

As my sheet is full, I must stop short of saying some things I would like to say in this connection.

ANOTHER LETTER FROM MESHULLAM.

Published by request of James L. Boyd, of Philadelphia, Agent of the Agricultural Manual Labor School in Palestine.

Artoss, (Bethlehem Valley.) Palestine, Dec. 29, 1851.

Dear Christian Friends,—Preserved by wonderful tokens from the Almighty, I now again address you. Under the circumstances in which it has pleased our Heavenly Father to place me, there are many and various incidents occurring, well calculated both to excite the curiosity of the novice, and to inspire with sympathy the faithful dependent upon Providence. Many, indeed, in Jerusalem, entertain a species of resentment [the English and foreign residents] respecting my exposure in such a 'Patmos' of solitude, (among surrounding wild Arabs,) while others—who deserve to be admired for their simplicity—are struck with astonishment at my (so-called) undaunted courage—which is just this, that I depend upon "the Divine assistance." In these characteristics, I am here so known—far removed from their circle of dependence, or the conspiring overreach of their malice. In these respects, I can only humbly attach to my enterprise, and to all the success hitherto realized, as the entire offspring of patience, resignation, constancy, and perseverance—in living exposed amid the solitudes of a mountainous and lonely country—which has hitherto required all the genius, labor, and constant attention, on the part of myself, to set it on its present prosperous basis, and, withal, being advanced in age, and much worn with labor and forethought—it ought to inspire all who wish well to this undertaking with full dependence on Providence, and to all the events it may please Him to bring about for the good both of him that soweth, and him who may, in future, be called upon to reap a harvest of blessing for Israel, "His treasure."

The country within which I am surrounded at the present time has all the aspect of wild deserts. I am alone, with only my family and a few Arab servants. This being my position, I have full confidence of hope in the same "Divine assistance" to prosecute our proposed plan with more patience and resignation to the will of God. The impulse given me from an unseen Providence does, (notwithstanding all my many difficulties and trials) inspire me with encouragement and confidence—especially from such quarters as have already proved themselves disposed to sympathize with and animate me in my path of duty; yet the prospect before me is such as does require a decided token of disinterestedness from all who will come forth, either to do likewise, or to help me in my weak efforts to cultivate the desolate land of my fathers.

In calling upon some of the intelligent Christian public to patronize this plan, I am not involved in views that are, in themselves, not appreciable, and which fail in the intended object I have set about; neither do I venture to ask co-operation and dispensing liberality for any incomprehensible object of fancy. My motive is not to imitate those who have long imposed upon the grandees of Europe, which has never been either in fact, or matter of intention, as can be clearly seen by the most superficial observers. My purpose is not equal with those who sit engrossed in schemes to reap a harvest of lively-imagined success, and which will end at length—before the light of a simplified gospel-worship—in finding that they have neither had a real commencement, or any true-grounded purpose, from beginning to end. But I trust in God that my object is fixed—my purpose open—and my motives, views, and prospects, are disclosed to all who will be inclined impartially to appreciate my undertaking, as one not of more dependence upon others, but of united and indefatigable labor on my part. My means are, however, feeble and small, and my success, up to the present, but limited. My achievements, hitherto, have greatly reduced my own poor stock, but the means I had I have gladly laid out and expended in view of a plan which is INVINCIBLE from its right aim and promising tendency; and, if I am at this juncture humbly led to apply for the concurrent action of co-workers, and to the liberality of beneficent Christians, it is simply to take into their hands a cause from under my protracted and small endeavors, in order to render it more extensively transcendant for the end it has purely in view—for, all those who wish well to this desolate land, and its ancient but benighted people, must contribute their moiety of interested action, which is, at no distant period, I believe, destined to build again its walls and breaches, and repair its many and mournful desolations. And let it be our prayer, Christian friends, not only that the Lord would build up Zion, but that, with the restoration of the land, He would very shortly restore also the "remnant" of his people (according to His sworn promise to our father Abraham) to re-inhabit their pristine abode; and, for this end, that He will be pleased ("for the fathers' sakes") to raise up sincere benefactors, and workers, to usher in these glorious events—the temporal and the spiritual salvation of Israel's sons. Artoss is in no way backward towards this restored result.

At the present time, (on account of the Sultan attempting to recruit his army from the tribes of Arabs, who in consequence have fled back towards the desert of Arabia, and among them those Arabs who inhabited and owned part of the valley, and left me indefinitely the sole master of the valley,) land is for sale, with oxen, &c., for a mere trifle of ready money; yet I cannot venture to engage it upon credit, until I know that some of my American Christian friends are arrived; but my hopes are centered, in the Lord, upon the spirit of industry that so greatly characterizes Americans, whose agency, when animated by Christ's Spirit, to feed, to clothe, and open the fœtid, subterranean prison-houses of mine (and my Master's) brethren, is yet to be signally used by the Disposer of events for the future glory of this land, and to saving of many souls who are ready to perish.

My family are all doing well. Elijah's request for clothing for some poor Jews of his acquaintance will, I trust, be attended to by the friends of Israel in America. In conclusion, dear friends, I trust you will remember us in your prayers at the throne of mercy, and that you will hasten hither to begin those efforts that will ultimately redound to the welfare and redemption, in body and spirit, of the anciently chosen people of God.

I remain, in the fellowship of Christ Jesus, His servant and yours, JOHN MESHULLAM.

LIBERALITY IN HUMBLE LIFE.

In the course of the late autumn, the Rev. Mr. Nesbit of Bombay arrived unexpectedly at ——, on a Saturday evening, intending to preach next day, and to ask a collection in aid of the funds for erecting mission premises at Bombay. All that could be done, in the circumstances, was to intimate at the close of the forenoon's season of worship, that Mr. Nesbit would preach in the afternoon and evening, and that the collection would go to the object of his visit. At an early hour on Monday afternoon the minister was waited upon by ——, a servant man, and unmarried, who expressed an anxious desire to see Mr. Nesbit. On finding that Mr. Nesbit had gone out, he explained to the minister the special purpose he had in view. He said that he had been taken by surprise the day before, and had nothing but a trifle in his pocket, which he thought was too little for him to give. He was quite satisfied that the Lord required the buildings which were proposed; they were evidently indispensable to the success of the missionary work; and therefore it was the duty of the Lord's people to provide the necessary funds. He then put into his minister's hand a sum of money as his contribution to be given to Mr. Nesbit. The sum was ten shillings. The minister expressed his surprise that he should give so largely to one object, however excellent. "No sir," was the reply. "The Lord enables me; it is my own wish as a Christian man to give so much." Some conversation ensued, in the course of which this humble but exemplary disciple said, that he had never been allowed to want for money to give to the Lord's cause. He put half-a-crown into the plate for every one of the schemes; he considered it his duty, and felt it his privilege, to do so; and had never been the poorer for any thing he had devoted to Christian objects. Not long before he had been out of place; and while so unfavorably situated, there came round the day of the collection for one of the Assembly's schemes. He resolved to give his usual contribution, his half-crown, and did so. "And very remarkable it was," he said, "the Lord returned it to me in the course of two or three days in a way totally unexpected. The same thing has happened to me oftener than once. The Lord has never allowed me to want for money to give to him, and I believe he never will. It vexes me," he added, "to see how unwilling professing Christians are to support the cause of Christ, and how very little is actually given." Were the spirit of this servant-man more generally diffused, our missions abroad would be more prosperous, our Church at home more influential and blessed, our ministers more efficient in the work of saving souls, our people reacher far, both in the perishable wealth of this world, and in the unsearchable treasures of the kingdom of heaven.

POWER OF PRAYER.

At the first annual meeting of the Society held in London, Mr. Fuller and Dr. Ryland preached in the Dutch church, Austin Friars. In his discourse, the latter adverted to the happiness of Dr. Carey, in having two of his sons, Felix and William, devoted to the mission; 'but,' said he, 'there is a third, who gives him pain, he is not yet turned to the Lord;'—then making a solemn and lengthened pause, tears flowing abundantly from his eyes, he exclaimed, in a shrill and vociferous voice, which seemed to exhaust a whole soul of feeling, 'Brethren, let us send up a united, universal, and fervent prayer to God, in solemn silence, for the conversion of Jabez Carey!' The appeal was like a sudden clap of thunder, and the pause afterwards as intensely solemn as silence and prayer could make it. Two minutes, at least, of the most profound devotional feeling pervaded an assembly of perhaps two thousand persons. The result was striking. Among the first letters afterward received, was the announcement of that conversion which had been so earnestly sought; nearly or quite synchronous with the season of fervent supplication.

NEAR, NOTHING OFF, AND FULL AND BY.

BY ALLEN C. SPOONER.

Written on board ship while beating up against the wind off the coast of England.

How often, as we beat along,
With wind ahead, and blowing strong,
We hear our watchful captain cry,
"Near! nothing off! and full and by!"

So when in life our steps begin
To tread the devious paths of sin,
May conscience wake our timely fear,
Uttering her warning cry of "Near!"

And when from Truth's unerring line
Our coward lips would dare decline,
Then may we heed—though fools should scoff—
Her stern injunction, "Nothing off!"

Virtue and vice to win us try;
Be then our watchword, "Full and by!"
Safe course through this world to another,
Is full of one and by the other.

A PLANT OF RIGHTEOUSNESS.

The following extract of a letter from Mr. Lacey, at Cuttack, shows how peacefully the believer in Jesus can die:—

Bamadabe was a Christian of more than eighteen years' standing, and was more than six years a steady, zealous, and useful preacher of the gospel. He was one of the earliest of the Choga converts, and suffered a deal of persecution by his heathen relatives, especially by his elder brother, Bearer hadhan, 'the oldest persecutor.' Before his baptism he was forcibly carried away from the Christianpoor settlement, in the middle of the military bazar, Cuttack; but no persecutions and no threats induced him to alter his determination to serve Christ. His Christian course was consistent to the end, which course, like the shining light, increased till the shades and clouds of death obscured him from our view. In a comparatively short period after his baptism, Bamadabe was called to preach the gospel to the heathen, for which important employment he was well fitted, both naturally, intellectually, and morally. He was raised up and called of God; and was peculiarly suited for the commencement of the kingdom of Christ in Orissa. He produced a good degree of conviction on the minds of his hearers; and his earnest and affectionate manner, almost to weeping, generally disarmed his hearers of their opposition. He was useful in his ministry to many individuals now members of the church of Christ.

When this good man came to die he was prepared for the important change. His unshaken confidence in Jesus Christ was evinced by the absence of all fear of death, and by his steadfast resignation to the will of God; as well as by many pleasing expressions which escaped him during his last illness. Perhaps, on the last occasion of his being out of his house, when he returned, he said to his wife, 'Shemama, for what purpose do you place vegetable plants in the garden?' 'To pluck them for use,' was the reply. 'So,' rejoined he, 'God has placed me in the garden of his church, and now is about to remove me into his presence in heaven. I shall soon leave you, but be not sorrowful or dismayed; remember the promise that God will be a husband to the widow, and a father to the fatherless.' Just before he died he joined his hands on his breast, as he used to do while in life and health, and offered thanksgiving and prayer to God; and in this attitude, he quietly resigned his soul into the keeping of his kind Redeemer; and for some time his friends knew not that he was gone. 'Mark the perfect man and behold the upright; for the end of that man is peace.'

From the Watchman and Reflector.

THE SUPPORT OF THE MINISTRY.

The honor, purity, and prosperity of a church and congregation are intimately connected with a just and liberal support of its ministry. The unembarrassed and faithful preaching of the gospel, it will be admitted on all sides, is indispensable to the prosperity of Zion. But if the pastor is not supported, he is embarrassed—his heart is distressed for his family. He is obliged either to abandon his study, and his work from house to house, and betake himself to secular employments for his daily bread, or he must contract debts, with rather a dubious prospect of paying them.

If he abandon his books for the plough or the bench, his mind is diverted from his appropriate work—his sermons become dull, monotonous, and uninteresting, and the cause of God suffers in his hands. If he goes into business, the business man, as all experience proves, eats up the preacher, leaving the church and congregation only the dry bones.

If he adopt the other expedient of contracting debts which he cannot pay, his reputation justly suffers reproach. His creditors regard and proclaim him a dishonest man; and through him the cause of God is reproached, and the church with whom he labors becomes a hissing and a by-word. I have known preachers, who, either for the want of economy, or a competent support, have in every field where they have labored, adopted the expedient of contracting debts beyond their means to pay. Their characters have uniformly been assailed as dishonest men, and their labors have soon terminated, leaving the churches with whom they have labored in a much worse condition than they found them—sinking, sinking into merited disgrace and ruin. I have known others, who, rather than contract debts in this way, have betaken themselves to some secular employment. The result usually has been, after a few years struggle between the duties of the pulpit and the shop or farm, they have abandoned the pulpit, and given themselves up to secular employments.

Is it wise? Is it expedient for the churches to press their pastors to either of these alternatives? Is this the way to pray the Lord of the harvest to send forth more laborers into his vineyard? When a course is pursued, which produces either of these results, the church is dishonored in the sight of God and all reasonable men. The community look on. They learn the facts in the case, and render a verdict, and that award is—"The church and congregation are mean—too penurious to provide the means of their own health and happiness!" High-minded and honorable men in the community pass them by in contempt.

I know of churches located in thriving towns and villages, where the wealth and population are rapidly increasing from year to year, and where neighboring churches are constantly growing in strength and numbers that have continued weak and rickety for almost an entire generation, and are still dying of consumption, while others of the same class have long since expired. Go into those places, and inquire into the cause of this lingering death, and the intelligent portion of the community will tell you, that they are constantly changing preachers—that they employ one pastor, and they soon starve him from the field, and then another, and still another, and treat them all alike, and that in the course of their frequent ministerial revolutions, their best men have died off, or left them—that they have become divided and alienated from each other, and lost all their influence for good. I could give you names and places for the original of this picture. All such churches are, and must be, a nuisance in the vineyard of the Lord, and when they die, a nuisance is abated by the visitation of the Almighty.

I put it to your common sense—how can a church and congregation, favored with numbers and means to support the institutions of public worship—how can they retain, for any length of time, an intelligent and efficient minister, if they have not the honor and manliness to support him? How can they permanently prosper, if the sin of covetousness is eating away their vitals like a cancer? How can they long remain united among themselves, if the great mass of the members contrive from year to year to throw all responsibility upon a few burden-bearers? How can they command or retain the confidence of the better portion of the community, if they starve preacher after preacher from their pulpit? By pursuing such a course, they dig their own grave, spin and weave their own winding-sheet, and "the mourners that go about the streets," when they are gone, will be few and far between.

P. R. R.

A TIMELY REPROOF.

The stage was crowded with passengers as it passed from New York to Boston. It was late in the evening when one of the passengers, a sea captain, endeavored to excite the attention of the drowsy company, by giving a relation of his own circumstances. He had been at sea in a fine ship; in a dreadful storm his ship had been wrecked, his money and property all destroyed, and every soul on board had been lost except himself. He had been at the mercy of the waves for several days together floating on a plank. The company were interested in this narrative; they pitied the poor unfortunate captain, who was returning home to his family only destitute; but they wondered that a man relating such a tale, and telling of an escape almost miraculous, should confirm almost every sentence with an oath. Nothing, however, was said to him.

In the morning, when the stage stopped, Mr. B., one of the passengers, invited the captain to walk on before, designing to step into the stage when it should come up. The proposal was agreed to, and they walked on alone.

Mr. B. said, "Did I understand you last night?—the stage made much noise—did you say that you had lost your ship?"

"Yes."

"That you saved your life on a plank?"

"Yes."

"Let me ask you one more question—when on that plank, did you not vow to your God, that if he would spare your life, you would devote that life to his service?"

"None of your business," said the captain, angrily. The stage by this time came up, and they entered it.

Towards evening, as the stage was entering Providence, the captain informed the company that he should not sup with them, as he was so unfortunate as not to have any money. Mr. B. took from his pocket and offered him a handsome bill.

"No," said the captain; "I am poor, yet I am no beggar."

"But," replied Mr. B., "I do not give it to you as to a beggar, but as to an unfortunate brother. You must learn that I profess to be a Christian, and I am taught by my religion to do good unto all men. The gospel prescribes no limits to benevolence; it teaches us to do good to all."

The company applauded, and pressed the captain to take the money. He silently put it into his pocket, without even thanking the donor; though his countenance betrayed uneasiness. The company supped together, and the captain bid each adieu, after having asked Mr. B. when he would leave town. They then parted. The captain went home with a heavy heart, while Mr. B. retired to rest. He was surprised, the next morning at daylight, to hear some one rap at the door. He opened it, and beheld the captain standing before him in tears. The captain, pressing his hand, said, "Sir, I have not slept a wink since I saw you; I abused you yesterday; I am now come to ask your pardon. I did, while on that plank, vow to God that I would live differently from what I ever had done; and by God's help, from this time forward, I am determined to do so." The captain could not proceed; they pressed each other's hands, and parted, probably to meet no more in this world.

Pitching towards Sodom.—The Christian man, who sacrifices principle to interest, and who makes the law of the Lord a variable thing, is pitching his tent towards Sodom. A gentleman, an elder of the Presbyterian church, some years since opened a hotel in a country village. He did it to support his family, and it was right; but then to secure custom he departed from Christian principles, and kept an open bar. In a few years he died, leaving a widow and several sons. The hotel was kept up, and his sons attended at the bar. The sons of that man all became drunkards, they squandered his property, and his widow is now sustained by the benevolence of the church. He was a good man; but he pitched his tent towards Sodom.

"FOREKNOWLEDGE."

We do not think it necessary to attempt any extended reply to the article on our first page. The question which originated the discussion was, Whether God did not foreknow some events as absolute, and others as contingent? After so long a time, and the consumption of much good paper and ink, it turns out, according to the metaphysics of our brother, that "a contingent event is one which comes to pass by the self-determining and therefore unnecessitated will of man." In the mean time, we have exploded the theory of self-determination, showing that it involves the absurdity of one volition before every volition, and even before the first. That this absurdity may become abundantly manifest to our brother's mind, we commend to his careful perusal the argument of President Edwards on this point. (See his Inquiry, Part II. Sect. I.) It is given with a logic as rigorous as Euclid's; and is so distinct and conclusive, that we hold our correspondent, and all who agree with him, to the task of encountering it directly, if they will still insist upon the self-determining power of the will.

After all our correspondent's endeavor to extricate himself from the absurdity of maintaining that an event may be both certain and uncertain at the same time, we do not see that he has mended the matter. If God is certain of any future event, it is very clear that he cannot be uncertain about it. To say that there is "a possible uncertainty" of it, does not help the case; for it is not even possible that God should be uncertain of any event which he foresees. You may say of any event involving moral responsibility, that it was possible for the agent concerned in bringing it about to have acted otherwise; as in the case of your horse which was stolen. But what you mean by this is, that he might have acted otherwise if he had been disposed. And if you conceive of your opponent as maintaining the contrary of this, he requests you to examine his articles with more care. He is not conscious of having uttered one sentiment, either during this discussion or at any other time, which would imply that a sinner could not do better, if he would. It is most freely admitted, that every sinner can obey God, if he will. The thief who stole your horse, could have refrained from doing so, if he had been so disposed. Joseph's brethren could have spoken peaceably to him, if they had been so inclined. Judas could have been faithful to his Lord, if it had been his choice. Whatever possibility there was, therefore, for the agents in these cases to avoid the acts in which they were respectively concerned, it was a possibility limited in each case by the "if" that stood in the way. Had we foreseen these acts, or any one of them, we would have said that there was a "possible uncertainty" of their occurrence. But we would have said so, only because our foreknowledge is not perfect. It is, in most cases, but little more than conjecture. But let the last vestige of doubt be removed; let our foreknowledge take in the events with all the clearness and certainty which characterize the foreknowledge of the Infinite; and instead of speaking of them as possibly uncertain, we would speak of them as certain to take place without the possibility of failure. With respect to us, and to all intelligences who merely conjecture forthcoming events, there is a "possible uncertainty" of their occurrence. But with respect to Him who sees all things as they are, and as they will be, it is not even possible that they should be uncertain.

At the close of his ninth paragraph from the beginning, our correspondent appears to feel so well in having convicted us, as he thinks, of a ridiculous blunder, that it seems almost a pity to spoil his enjoyment. "If it was made certain 'before' God knew any thing about it, then God did not make it certain. If he did, he did it without knowing it! Decrees existing before God knew any thing about them! Who enacted them? Of course we cannot have an 'effect without a cause.'" Well, Bro. H. has raised a spectre, which he, no doubt, thought we could not lay. But what if there should be a distinction between the order of nature and the order of time? In the order of nature, the sun must exist before it can shine; yet, in the order of time, there never was a period when it did not shine. In the order of nature, God must exist before he can have a purpose; yet, in the order of time, he was never without a purpose. So, in the order of nature, there must be a certainty in events themselves "before" God can have any certain knowledge of them; but in the order of time, such priority was not necessary or possible.

Bro. H. thinks that, in speaking of the predominant inclination, we "confound inclination with will," and fancies that they are entirely separate. But we confess that we are not sensible of the difference. A man's predominant inclination for a thing is his choice of that thing. What "executive power" there is in him which controls his choice, we know not. It can be nothing but self-determination, which has already been exploded.

Any farther notice of our correspondent's communication, is rendered unnecessary by what we have already written. We regret that we have not succeeded in expressing ourselves so as to be understood. It must be so, or else our correspondent possesses a singular faculty of caricaturing his opponent's arguments. We have maintained, that God's foreknowledge of events implies the certainty of those events, and that the divine disposal which secures this certainty is moral necessity. We have said, over and over, that we held to no other kind of necessity for the acts of men, for which they were held responsible, except that which was requisite to make the connection between them and God's foreknowledge of them perfect; that the divine disposal or decree implied nothing more. We have said, plainly, that, in pleading for moral necessity, we do not plead for a literal necessity. And we now say again, that when we say it was necessary for the Jews to reject Christ, or that any other foretold or foreknown act of wickedness was necessary, we do not employ the word in its literal acceptation. So too, when we say that a sinner is unable to do right, we do not impute to him a literal inability. The expression denotes merely the strength of the enmity of his heart against God; a strength so great, that he is urged forward in a course of rebellion with a certainty as infallible as that by which a stone falls to the earth. In all such cases we say, that a sinner can do better, if he will. But what can be the meaning, when it is said, that he can will that which he certainly will not will? Is it meant, that if he should will differently he would? Or is this the meaning, that he can will one way or another, according to the influence which directs his choice? Or must we understand that the will is so evenly balanced, that it will turn this way or the contrary, regardless of all influence whatever?

In conclusion, we suggest that this discussion must be confined within reasonable limits. Our brother has occupied a large space in our columns, and, we doubt not, has presented his strong points. Whether he has succeeded in demolishing the views which he has combated, must be left to the judgment of our readers. For our own part, we do not consider ourselves capable of conducting such a controversy as it ought to be conducted. We could only reiterate what has been written by others; and we are not vain enough to think, that we could make any improvement upon their manner of handling the subject. If our correspondent has any thing farther to offer, we hope he will condense his remarks as much as possible; and unless he furnishes something new, we shall probably let it pass without any formal reply, as we have no ambition to have the last word. BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

The Change of Ministry—Ocean Penny Postage—Intemperance.

GLASGOW, February 27, 1852.

The party politics of this country, is no subject for the columns of the Sabbath Recorder. It is only, therefore, in the measure in which such an event as a change of the British Cabinet may affect liberty, morality, and religion, that we can be called to chronicle the resignation of what has been termed the Liberal Ministry, with Lord John Russell as Prime Minister, and the formation of what is termed a Conservative Government, with the Earl of Derby (the former Lord Stanley) at its head. We dwell not, therefore, on the introduction of a bill into the House of Commons previously, reducing the pecuniary qualification for the exercise of the elective franchise—a change which would add neither intelligence nor morals proportioned to the added number of electors. The Bill has, however, one noticeable feature; it omits from the oath to be taken by members of Parliament the words "on the true faith of a Christian." This clause was intended to allow individuals of the Jewish persuasion to obtain seats in the House of Commons—where, however, it is to be feared, there are already not a few who are destitute of the "faith" by which they were sworn. Another change occasioned by the fall of the Russell Ministry, deserves mention here, as having a general interest of peculiar character. One of the members of that Cabinet, the lately-appointed Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, owed his seat to attainments of an antiquarian scriptural character. Mr. Layard is, we believe, known in the United States from the efforts made by him in the rescue of important sculptures and inscriptions from the ruins of the palaces of Ninevah, of which full accounts have been furnished by his pen. No place has been assigned him in the new cabinet, although a very recent arrival of additions to the collection already in the British Museum, including a marble bull of fifteen tuns weight, might have suggested the propriety of a continuance of the bestowed reward.

The more important question, however, as to the result of the change, apart from its influence on our own commerce and agriculture, is how it is to affect the country in relation to other States. There is little doubt that the previous expulsion of Lord Palmerston was the proximate cause of the downfall of his late colleagues in the Cabinet. Now it is a well-authenticated fact, that that noble Lord was feared and hated by the Continental despots; and rejoicing was very unequivocally expressed on his office having been filled by another. Very significant indeed it appears to be, that the expulsion of the English Missionaries to the Jews at Pesth, hurriedly and cruelly enforced as it was, followed immediately upon the receipt at Vienna of the intelligence of that change in the personel of the British Ministry. This view was taken yesterday at a meeting convened in Edinburgh for consideration of their case, by Mr. Wingate, one of these missionaries. And the manner in which Earl Granville, who succeeded Lord Palmerston as Foreign Secretary, received a deputation, including both the missionaries, certainly lead us to think that Despotism judged wisely though not well in the preference shown. Even our Ambassador at Vienna, Lord Westmoreland, who composes chants for Romish masses, received these heralds of the cross with a coldness which induced them to seek sympathy from the American Ambassador at Vienna, and fully he gave it, in forms now recorded to his praise. We need not, indeed, be surprised that Austria feels annoyed; nor is it quite obvious that our Government is wholly blameless in regard to her. We speak not now of the enmity between Popery and Protestantism, but of the encouragement given to, as well as the asylum found by refugees in our land. The Emperor, in a published note of the Austrian Envoy Extraordinary now in London, dated the beginning of this month, complains of the "freedom of action" given to such refugees, and declares, if such be continued, that "immediate instructions" will be given to put into more vigorous force throughout his dominions the regulations as to passports against English travelers, without exception in their favor as hitherto enjoyed. It is well to show kindness to the wanderers in their distress; but it is a different thing if we should connive at their efforts in our land against the Government of their own, with which we are at peace.

An influential meeting was held here last night, at which Elihu Burritt presented calculations to prove that "Ocean Penny Postage" would not be unfavorable to the Post-Office in a financial point of view. We shall be glad to see his efforts in this cause crowned with success, but we doubt the soundness of the view thus expressed. It is not, however, the only consideration to be taken into account when judging of the propriety of giving increased facilities of communication, between Britain and America more especially.

A Public Houses Regulation Bill has been introduced into the House of Commons. The evils of intemperance are strongly felt, where yet it is regarded as untrue that wine, beer, and spirits, have no legitimate use. The difficulty of legislating in any effective manner for preventing the abuse, and affording opportunity of use, is great, yet locally and legislatively the effort is being made. Oh that more effective measures were adopted for bringing home the truth, in the love of it, on the hearts of men, whence are the issues of life! This is the grand spring alike of good and evil action, and to the correction of it, as the source, should Christian zeal be more immediately directed. J. A. BEGG.

GERRIT SMITH ON COLONIZATION.

Gerrit Smith has written and printed a long letter to Governor Hunt of New York, relative to the recommendation, in his last Message to the Legislature, of aid to the American Colonization Society. Years ago Mr. Smith gave a great deal of his time, and some ten thousand dollars of his money, to help forward the Colonization Society; but, becoming convinced that its influence was in favor of slavery, rather than against it, he formally withdrew from its support, and identified himself with those societies which go for immediate and universal emancipation. In his letter to Gov. Hunt, Mr. Smith argues that the colonization scheme grows out of a wicked and unnatural prejudice against color; that the colored people themselves do not wish to colonize; that sending them to Africa does not serve to civilize and Christianize that country to any such extent as the advocates of the scheme represent; that it is a means of strengthening slavery, by removing the free colored people, whose presence in this country is a constant remonstrance against the enslavement of their brethren; and that, finally, no friend of freedom can consistently support the scheme. We copy from the letter two paragraphs, which contain matter for serious and profitable reflection:—

"But we will pass on to look at the Colonization Society, as it now is. There is not one person in all its membership, who is a confessed abolitionist—not one, who is willing to bear the reproach of that name. It says not a word against the social, or political, or ecclesiastical wrongs of the colored man; not a word against the crime of refusing to eat or ride with him; not a word against his exclusion from the ballot-box; not a word against the erection of the negro-pew. It says not a word against the 'Fugitive-slave Statute'—a statute, which is of all statutes Satan's master-piece. Indeed, the warmest defenders of this statute are to be found among its members. It sees men and women chased down under this statute, and plunged into the pit of slavery, and it is utterly careless and contemptuous of their horrid fate. It sees one State after another imposing, or attempting to impose, discriminating and onerous taxes on its already crushed and helpless free colored people; one free State after another excluding, or attempting to exclude, this persecuted people from its borders; and it never remonstrates against this devilism. Nay, this devilism is its own work, prompted by the spirit which it begets and nourishes, and performed by none more eagerly than by its members and advocates. The Colonization Society apologizes for slavery, and denies, that it is sinful. It is, in a word, as infidel and inhuman as the current religion—that conventional and spurious religion, which looks upon the battered and bleeding slave, and then passes by on the other side; that conventional and spurious religion, which is divorced from humanity, and which forgets, ay, and devours the poor and the small, in order to keep on better terms with the rich and the great."

* * * * * * * *

"During the thirty-five years since the Colonization Society was organized, the millions of colored people in this land have doubled, and far more than doubled; whilst of all who have been taken to Liberia, that frightful grave-yard, probably not three thousand survive. That the emigrants would readily and harmoniously blend with the Africans, was taken for granted. But it turns out, that they despise the Africans, as much as they are themselves despised by us. If we can hate the emigrants for their color, the emigrants can hate the Africans for their barbarism. It was also taken for granted, that, very soon, our colored people would all be eager to go to Liberia. I hear, that several of them in the City of New York are, by some means, made willing, or, more probably, but made to say that they are willing to go. Extensive, however, as is my acquaintance with colored people, not one of them tells me, that he is willing to go."

JEWS IN CHINA.

From a letter of Solomon Carpenter, Seventh-day Baptist Missionary at Shanghae, China, dated Nov. 13, 1851.

Since we last wrote, we have seen two Jews from the province of Honan, about 2,700 Chinese (900 English) miles from this place. One of them is a teacher of youth, the other a merchant, and both men of good abilities. The number of Jews in their native city they state to be upwards of 2,000, besides women and children. Their ancestors came into China more than 2,000 years ago. They have copies of the Pentateuch, beautifully written on parchment rolls; each roll about twenty inches wide, and several rods long. Some of these they were induced to bring to Shanghae, and we had the pleasure of seeing them. Some of them have been sent to England. They still keep the Sabbath, and observe many of the rites of the former dispensation. They seem to be in a state of decline; for the last forty years they have had no man who could read their much-venerated books, which have not been translated into Chinese.

These two Jews seemed to feel much at home with us, on account of the identity of our Sabbath day and theirs. They manifested a desire for instruction, both for themselves, their children, and their people. As often as circumstances would allow, while in Shanghae, they attended our little meeting on the Sabbath. My teacher Tong, who was deeply interested in them, as we all were, using their dialect, took great pains to instruct them.

We expect to hear from them in a month or two. By this time they are probably at the end of their journey homeward. After consulting their brethren, suppose they should ask us to take three or four of their sons to educate in the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures; or, suppose they should ask us to send them a native preacher (a foreigner could not remain there) to instruct their people into the doctrines and duties of the Holy Scriptures; and suppose, in addition, we should have such a man, his heart burning with zeal to proceed to that important field of labor; shall we be prepared for such emergencies? Prepared or unprepared, would it not be an evident token of our duty towards those who are beloved of God for the fathers' sakes?

ELD. ESTEE—THE VIRGINIA SCHOOL.

SALEM, Va., March 3, 1852.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Contrary to my inclination, I am required to discontinue my missionary labors in Virginia, and return to New York. My son, who has had the care of my business in Petersburgh, informs me that he has made such arrangements as to render it impracticable for him to retain the charge of my affairs longer than the first of April next. Under these circumstances, it appears necessary for me to return home as soon as practicable.

I had hoped to labor in concert with my brethren and friends in Virginia until the Academy at West Union should be completed, and the school properly organized and in successful operation under the supervision of a competent teacher. Could I remain in Virginia, and could a person be found of adequate literary attainments, and of requisite natural qualifications, who would be willing to unite with me and others who feel a deep interest in this enterprise, in laboring to establish a Literary Institution at West Union on a firm basis, I should have no doubt of ultimate success. Nearly a thousand dollars capital has been invested in the purchase of property and in the erection of a suitable building. In connection with my missionary engagement, I have acted as Agent for the Institution, and during the winter term have, with the assistance of my wife, had charge of the school. We have had in our school more than fifty pupils, and I am gratified in being able to say, that many of them possess promising mental endowments. Several of the young men are deeply anxious to obtain a thorough education, and regret very much to have the school suspended for the want of a competent teacher. I am willing to give ~~publicity~~ to these statements, cherishing the hope that some person in our denomination may be willing to take my place, and labor to promote the eductional and religious interests of this section of Western Virginia.

AZOR ESTEE.

THE COMPROMISE ACTS IN MASSACHUSETTS.—In the Massachusetts House of Representatives, on the 11th inst., Mr. Hoar, of Worcester, introduced a series of resolutions on Slavery, which declare that the principles upon which the permanence of the Union and the liberty of the citizens depend, have been put in hazard by the Compromise acts,—that Congress has no right to involve Free States in the shame or guilt of Slavery by laws designed to countenance, perpetuate or extend it,—that Massachusetts yields to no others in attachment to the Union and the Constitution,—that they will support the one and obey the other, and resist any measures which violate liberty, disturb the harmony and endanger the existence of the Union,—that the Fugitive Slave Law is unconstitutional, unjust and oppressive, and ought to be speedily and forever repealed,—that Massachusetts protests against the delivering into Slavery of men found upon free-soil, especially without due process of law, and without trial by Jury, or a legally constituted judicial tribunal,—and that Massachusetts expects her Senators and Representatives to conform to the principles of these resolutions. The resolutions were referred to a Select Committee.

IRELAND CUTTING LOOSE FROM POPERY.—Conversions from Romanism to a purer faith have been multiplying of late in Ireland, to an unprecedented extent. A correspondent of the New York Times, whose letters certainly give no evidence of Protestant prejudice on the part of the writer, in a late letter says:—

"The unprecedented spectacle was recently presented at a parish church in Mayo, Ireland, of a converted Roman Catholic priest preaching to a large congregation of his former parishioners, and urging them, in their native language, to embrace the Reformed Faith. Such an occurrence would not have taken place in Ireland a few years ago, as no Roman Catholic would have dared to listen for a moment to a heretic priest in a Protestant church. It is certain that a great change is taking place in the opinions of the Irish Roman Catholics, who are falling away rapidly from the Church of Rome."

MISSION TO PARIS.—The American and Foreign Christian Union recently proposed to Rev. Mr. Kirk, of Boston, to become their representative in Paris, and the chaplain of an American congregation there. But the following paragraph from the Boston Atlas shows that he has declined for reasons:—

"He stated to his congregation, that his attachment to the feeble churches of France, and to all the interests of Protestantism, had given great weight to the call; but the unlimited opportunities of usefulness in actual possession, in his present sphere, had sufficed to counterbalance it. The present confused condition of France, and the reasonable presumption, not to say certainty, that every effort to promote real religion would be thwarted by the government and priesthood of that country, added great weight to this conclusion."

FREE-WILL BAPTIST MISSION.—Rev. J. Phillips writes from Jellasore, Oct. 31, "The events of the past month are of a character calculated to cheer and encourage our hearts. Four families, containing an aggregate of sixteen persons, including children, have thrown off the trammels of caste, and openly signified their desire to become connected with our Christian community, and others seem on the point of following their example. Of this number I can but hope that a part are real seekers after an enduring substance. On the 12th I visited Abhir's village, and found quite a number of the leading men in his village anxious to have a school started in the house we had erected for that purpose. I therefore agreed to send a teacher, and the school commenced with seven or eight scholars, with the prospect of an increase soon."

COURAGEOUS FAITH.—Mr. Kincaid relates the following incident, strikingly illustrative of the character of the Christian Karens:—

"Two young Karens, from the province of Pantanau, were sent here by the pastor of a church to bring letters and to get a few books. Ten New Testaments, the Pilgrim's Progress, seven tracts, and two hymn books, were wanted. They remained two days, and then set off on their long journey back. The books were carefully rolled up and put in the bottom of a basket, and then the basket filled up with rice and dried fish. This done, they gave the parting hand, and in a tremulous voice said to each one of us, 'Pray for us, that we may be delivered from the calamity of falling into the hands of officers with these books.' Two Christian boys, some sixteen or seventeen years old, trusting in God, set off on a journey of 130 miles to get this handful of books. Here is faith that will remove mountains."

THE NEW MOVEMENT AMONG THE METHODISTS.—The advocates of Lay Representation in the Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, recently held a Convention in Philadelphia. A large number of delegates were present from different States, and the meetings were fully attended and of unusual interest. Strong resolutions were passed, expressive of the sense of the convention relative to lay delegations in the annual and general conferences, as a matter both of justice and expediency; and it was determined to continue the agitation thus commenced, till the constitution of the church is so amended as to admit lay delegates. The Convention also appointed delegates to urge this matter before the General Conference, which is shortly to meet in Boston.

CHANGES OF CHURCH RELATION.—The Rev. Robert Little was recently received by the Presbytery of New York, from the Reformed Presbyterian Church. Little repudiates the views respecting civil government, Psalmody, &c., held by the church which he has left.

The Presbyterian Herald has received a copy of the letter of Y. H. L. Laird, of Shelbyville, Ky., to Bishop Smith, announcing his withdrawal from the Episcopal Church, and the reasons therefor. It is his intention to apply for admission to the Presbytery of Louisville.

PRESBYTERIANS IN NEW ORLEANS.—A writer in the Presbyterian Herald speaks of having visited New Orleans in 1836, when the only Presbyterian church consisted of twenty-five members, the whole congregation numbered about 120, and the worship on Sunday was conducted by a layman. There are now nine Presbyterian houses of worship, all well attended, and twelve Sunday-schools in full operation, at the different churches and at other points in the city and suburbs.

THE DISTURBANCES IN LIBERIA.—The National Intelligencer publishes a long letter from J. J. Roberts, President of the Republic of Liberia, under date of the 26th of January, giving a history of the recent disturbances there. The President says he has undoubted evidence that the difficulties were instigated by a foreign trader and who largely aided the natives in their rebellion. The trader alluded to has fled to the interior, but President Roberts hopes to be able to catch him and teach him manners. There was great financial distress in Liberia, there being even no money to pay the soldiers, and the President earnestly solicits aid.

N. Y. STATE ASYLUM FOR IDIOTS.—The first Annual Report of this institution was presented to the Legislature last week, and furnishes many interesting facts. The institution is located near Albany, and is under the management of Dr. Hervey B. Wilbur. The number of State pupils was limited to twenty, to be selected from the poor of each Judicial District. Other pupils, for whom payment is made by friends, are also received. An appropriation of $6,000 was made for the current year, and the expenses will not exceed that sum.

Dr. Wilbur presents a satisfactory statement of the arrangements of the Institution. The House—its situation—its advantages of air and water, are all that could be desired. The pupils were selected from every part of the State, and were twenty-five in number. Of these twelve were speechless, and six of the twelve had no idea of language, and comprehended nothing that was said to them. There were five others who had very imperfect ideas of speech. They were all more or less diseased and incapable, and the Doctor confidently appeals to the intelligent observation of the Trustees for proof of the improvement already attained. His philosophy regards Idiocy as a kind of intellectual and moral paralysis; and his aim, consequently, is "to give to the dormant faculties the greatest practicable development, and to apply those awakened faculties to a useful purpose."

THE PORTUGUESE EXILES.—We learn from the Independent, that the Portuguese churches at Jacksonville and Springfield, Ill., consisting of the exiles from Madeira, have put forth to the public a caution with regard to Mr. Gonsalves, formerly an agent of the American and Foreign Christian Union. They say he has not only collected money for their benefit, which he has refused to account for, but that the whole was done without their knowledge, or any just occasion, because they are no longer under the necessity of being a burden upon their kind Christian friends. Their circular gives the following account of their manner of getting along:—

"All the members of this church who are able to labor are earning a very comfortable support, and we have a fund for the aid of the infirm, the diseased, and the aged, raised by voluntary contributions among ourselves, each contributing every Sabbath day as the Lord may have prospered him. We request, therefore, that the public will not listen to any appeals that Mr. Gonsalves, or any other person, may make to them on our behalf, unauthorized by us."

BEAUTIES OF THE PECULIAR INSTITUTION.—A little affair occurred at Goldsboro', N. C., a few days since, which strikingly illustrates the beauties of the "Peculiar Institution." It was the sale, at auction, of a colored woman and her children. The Goldsboro' Patriot states the case as follows:—

"They were the children of a free negro by the name of Adam Wynne, who had purchased their mother, his wife, previous to their birth. They were consequently his slaves, and, he having become involved, they were sold for his debts."

We learn from the same authority, that these people "brought prices ranging from $711 to $827."

RECEIPTS FOR BAPTIST MISSIONS.—The receipts of the Baptist Missionary Union from April 1, 1851, to Feb. 19, 1852, ten and a half months, amounted to $45,500. The expenses of the Union for the year ending March 31, 1852, amount to $100,000; leaving $54,500 to be received in the last forty-two days of the financial year, in order to make the receipts and expenses balance. The habit into which the patrons of the Union have fallen, of delaying their remittances to near the close of the financial year, is justly complained of by the Board as the cause of great inconvenience and anxiety.

SUNDAY LEGISLATION IN NEW YORK.—The movement to close the locks of the New York State Canals on Sunday does not seem to progress very rapidly. In the Assembly, on the 8th inst., Mr. Underwood laid on the table the resolution for the closing of the Canal Locks from 12 P.M. on Saturday to 12 P.M. on Sunday. On the following day he called for the consideration of the resolution. The Ayes and Noes were taken, and showed 32 for and 40 against its consideration. We are not aware of any subsequent movement on the subject.

GOOD NEWS.—A letter from a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Nile, Allegany Co., N. Y., dated March 5th, says:—"There is rather an increasing interest in the cause of religion in this place. Three young ladies offered themselves to the church last Sabbath, and are to be baptized and received next Sabbath. Eleven were baptized at Richburgh last Sabbath, ten of whom united with the church there."

THE CYCLOPEDIA OF ANECDOTES of Literature and the Fine Arts, edited by Kazlitt Arvine, and published by Gould & Lincoln, of Boston, is just completed with the eighth number. The whole forms a beautiful imperial octavo volume of over 700 pages.

ASCENT OF ORIZAVA.—A description of the ascent of Orizava was last month presented to the Geographical Society by Mr. Thornton. The ascent was made to the hight of seventeen thousand feet, or about three and three-quarters miles. The ascent was a work of danger and difficulty, compared with which Popocatepetl was but a trifle. The mountain is a mass of ice, with a covering of not more than two inches of snow in general; the sides are so steep that the snow very soon blows off and is melted; enormous crevices, sometimes a hundred feet in width, occur in the glaciers; the winds blow furiously, clouds and fog become very thick, the thermometer stands at zero, and the crater is of less size than that of Popocatepetl. The after-effects of the ascent were unpleasant, inflammation being induced to an alarming extent.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, MARCH 8.

In the SENATE, after the presentation of a large number of petitions, Mr. Hunter, from the Finance Committee, reported a bill changing the laws regulating the coinage of silver, in compliance with the recommendation of Mr. Secretary Corwin, in his last Annual Report. The bill provides that, from and after June 1, 1852, the weight of the half dollar shall be 192 grains, and the quarter dollar, dime, and half dime, shall be respectively one-half, one-fifth and one-tenth of the said half dollar; which coin is made a legal tender in payment of all sums not exceeding five dollars. It also provides for the coinage of three-dollar gold pieces, the devices and shape to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury. The subject of a reduction of postage on letters transmitted by sea was briefly discussed. The Iowa Railroad Bill was then taken up, and Mr. Underwood spoke upon it.

In the HOUSE, nothing worth mentioning was done except that, pending the Homestead bill, Mr. Fitch of Ind. made a speech on the question of the next Presidency and several other subjects.

THIRD-DAY, MARCH 9.

In the SENATE, Mr. Sumner's resolution, directing inquiry as to the reduction of rates of Ocean Postage, was adopted. Mr. Hunter introduced a bill ceding public lands to the State in which they lie for Railroad and Canal purposes—the States to pay $1 25 per acre for lands which have been in the market less than ten years; $1 for those more than ten and less than twenty, and 75 cents for all above that. Mr. Stockton introduced a bill granting bounty land to sailors engaged in the Mexican war. The non-intervention resolutions were then introduced, and Mr. Seward made a long speech in favor of them. Mr. Jones of Tenn. got the floor, and the Senate adjourned.

The HOUSE, after talking a while about aiding a railroad in Alabama, took up the Homestead Bill, in connection with which several political speeches were made, Messrs. Wilcox and Rantoul taking the lead.

FOURTH-DAY, MARCH 10.

In the SENATE, numerous petitions were presented, among which were several on the standing topics of aid to the Collins Steamers and against the extension Woodworth's planing machine patent. A bill was reported for the relief of those who rescued the passengers and crew of the ship Caleb Grimshaw. Mr. Brodhead, from the Committee on Claims, reported adversely on the petitions praying that the expenses of the American exhibitors at the London Fair may be paid by the United States. Then, after considering the report from the Judiciary Committee on the new apportionment's bearing on the next Presidential Election, the Senate listened to a long speech from Mr. Borland, on the Iowa Land Grant. An explanation between Stockton of N. J., and Seward of N. Y., followed. Mr. Cass took the floor on the Iowa bill, and the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Lane introduced a bill to amend the act establishing a Territorial Government for Oregon, which was referred to the Committee on Territories. The Homestead Bill was then taken up, and Mr. Richardson of Illinois and Mr. Breckenridge of Kentucky amused themselves on the merits of Judge Douglas, the Democratic Review, &c. The remainder of the day was spent in talking about an appropriation of $72,000 to repair the library of Congress.

FIFTH-DAY, MARCH 11.

In the SENATE, almost the whole day was spent in discussing a resolution to pay from the Contingent Fund of the Senate, the bills for entertaining Kossuth, to an amount not exceeding five thousand dollars. The resolution finally passed; after which a brief executive session was held, and the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE, the Homestead Bill was discussed by Marshall of California, Breckenridge of Kentucky, and Bell and Cable of Ohio. It was then postponed till Third-day week, and the House adjourned.

SIXTH-DAY, MARCH 12.

In the SENATE, after a personal explanation by Mr. Hamlin, the Private Calendar was taken up, and 16 bills of no public interest whatever were ordered to be engrossed. The bill making an appropriation to complete the Cemetery near the City of Mexico, was passed. The Senate then adjourned till Second-day.

The HOUSE spent the whole day in considering the Senate resolution authorizing the continuance of the work on the two wings of the Capitol. An appropriation of $500,000 is proposed, to be expended before the 30th of June, 1853; but much complaint is made of the foundation already laid, and hence the delay in voting the appropriation. In the course of the discussion, a personal rencontre occurred between Messrs. Brown and Wilcox of Mississippi, for which they both afterward apologized to the House.

SABBATH-DAY, MARCH 13.

The SENATE was not in session.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Polk of Tennessee stated that the Mississippi pugilists had settled their personal difficulties. The resolution appropriating half a million of dollars to continue the work on the wings of the Capitol, was then taken up; Mr. Wilcox finished his speech; and brief remarks upon the subject were made by Messrs. Beale, Duncan, Wallace, Chandler, Carter, and Clingman; after which the bill was passed, and the House adjourned.

THE JAPAN EXPEDITION.—The following is a list of the vessels which will compose the squadron which has recently been ordered to the East Indies:—

The Steamer Mississippi, Steam Frigate Susquehanna, Steamer Princeton, Sloop-of-War St. Marys, Sloop-of-War Plymouth, Sloop-of-War Saratoga, Brig Perry, and Store-ship Supply. The Susquehanna, Plymouth, and Saratoga, are already on the Pacific Coast, awaiting the arrival of the remainder of the Squadron. The St. Marys is now on the way to Japan, having on board the Japan Sailors, and on reaching Japan will await the arrival of the squadron. The residue of the squadron will probably get under way in the course of April.

The objects of the expedition are well known. It is designed to effect a landing at Jeddo, the capital city of Japan, at all hazards, and orders have been given to make various explorations on shore, and to leave no efforts untried to open commercial intercourse with that long-sealed people. It is supposed the squadron will be absent about 18 months.

European News.

By the steamers Arctic and Asia, we have European News to Feb. 28, being one week later than noticed in our last.

In England, of course, the great event is the formation of a New British Ministry. The Earl of Derby, who is now Premier, had made a moderate and politic declaration of the course Government will pursue. It adheres to protection, but will not attempt to force it upon the country at the present moment, at the expense of a dissolution of Parliament and a special election. The Government will await the result of the regular election, and in the meanwhile will administer affairs without any marked change from their previous course. This election, in the due course of things, will follow after the present session, which is the sixth of the present Parliament. Lord Derby also gives notice, that he shall abandon Lord John Russell's Reform bill, and shall not bring in any such measure as the bill to establish a system of National Schools promised by the late Premier. In the view of the present Government, the only good education is one founded on the study of the Scriptures; and the Church of England, acting through its parochial clergy, the best possible means for conferring it. With regard to foreign policy, the line of conduct marked out in Lord Granville's late circular to the Continental Governments will be adhered to, while the refugees in England are warned that they will not be allowed to conspire against the powers that have banished them.

The Jury in the case of the Helmfirth explosion have found the Commissioners, Engineers and Overseers grossly culpable and guity of willful neglect. The Jury regret that they cannot indict them for manslaughter.

Thomas Moore is dead. He died on the 26th Feb., at his residence, Sloperton Cottage, aged 72 years. For the last few years his mind had become affected, but no man of the last century had seen more of what was best and most brilliant in every department than Thomas Moore, and of the polished and intellectural society in which he moved, he was one of the brightest ornaments. He desired to be buried in the churchyard of the parish where he died.

From Ireland, we have news of the death of Dr. Murray, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin. This venerable prelate has long been the leader of the moderate party among the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland.

In France, M. Bocher, administrator of the Orleans estates, with MM. Delavaigne and Hovyn Trauchere, have been arrested for having in their possession insurrectionary documents in favor of the Orleans family. The London Times explains the offense of M. Bocher in this manner: He is the administrator of the Orleans property, and his duty of course is to defend it against the rapacity of the Dictator. When M. Dapin and the executors of Louis Philippe wrote to Louis Napoleon, telling him that his act was illegal, &c., the censor forbade the publication of the documents. The Princes, however, had them printed in England, and they were smuggled into France in false bottmos of trunks, &c., and M. Bocher addressed himself to a house in Paris which distributes parcels, &c. over France, to employ them to scatter these documents, and it was upon returning from a business visit to this house that he was arrested.

By decree in the Moniteur, a prize of 50,000 francs is instituted in favor of the discoverer who shall render the Voltaic Pile applicable with economy to industry as a source of heat, lighting, chemistry, mechanics, or medical practice. Scientific men of all nations are admitted to compete during five years for the prize.

The Presse of Paris says that the French Government had demanded the extradition of three Frenchmen accused of taking part in the insurrection of December, who had fled to Savoy. The Sardinian Government granted the extradition, but the refugees, warned in time, had escaped from the Sardinian territory.

From Prussia, we have the report of extreme distress from the scarcity of food. The famine is felt even in Berlin.

The Direction of the Prisons in Naples has been again committed to the monks, as before 1848.

The Emperor of Austria has conferred the decoration of the Iron Crown upon M. Hulsemann, the Austrian Chargé d'Affaires in the United States.

A letter from Messina states that shocks of earthquake have been extremely frequent there during the whole month of January, but that their number and intensity increased to a frightful degree on the night of the 26th, when the whole population stayed out of doors for fear of the houses falling in. Some old inhabitants, who still recollect those of 5th of February, 1783, related that the shocks commenced a month before in the same manner, and at last ended in the total destruction of the town.

California News.

The steamer El Dorado, from Chagres, arrived at New York on the 15th inst., bringing the mails, a million and a half dollars in gold dust, and California dates to Feb. 18.

From the Isthmus, we have reports that provisions are very scarce and high, causing much suffering. About 3,000 persons were there waiting passage to California, and some of them, who went from New York by what is called the "Independent Line," are likely to have to wait a long time.

From California, we have intelligence that mining is carried on very briskly and successfully. Burglaries, murders, &c., are also reported very plenty—rather too much so for the taste of orderly people.

On the 31st of January, the steamer General Warren, from Astoria for San Francisco, was wrecked on the bar at the mouth of the Columbia River, and forty-two of her passengers and crew found a watery grave. Two other vessels had been wrecked on that coast, but without loss of life.

A $500 Homestead Exemption Law has been passed in Tennessee.

Advice of a Gold-Seeker.

The Portland Inquirer has an extract from a letter written by a Mr. Norton, formerly of Phillips, Me., addressed to his father. Mr. N. arrived at San Francisco, Jan. 1, sixteen days from Panama, in the Northerner, and he writes from Auburn, Placer County, Jan. 11:—

"She was a ship of only 1,200 tons. They crowded on board 750 passengers. It was very sickly on board; about 25 died before we landed, and about 50 more were carried ashore sick of the Panama, Chagres, or ship fever. We almost starved to death before we could get ashore. We had nothing to eat but tainted meat, and ship-bread full of worms, and part of the time on allowance of water. I had rather be in the State's Prison three months than suffer what I did in coming here. * * * * * *

"You cannot purchase anything here short of a bit (10 or 12 1-2 cents.) You cannot obtain a meal of victuals short of one dollar, or a night's lodging short of 50 cents. If I was at home, and knew what I now know, I never would start for California. I cannot advise any of my friends to come out here. You can get a good living at home, and there you had better stay. I am about 3,000 miles from home, in a land of strangers. There is nothing here worth having excepting the gold, and obtaining this is but a lottery. You had only one side of the story, and that was the bright side. Men are numerous here who cannot obtain enough to get home again.

"I will conclude by saying to all inquiring friends, Stay at home."

SUMMARY.

The long-pending suit of Mrs. Gaines has at length been decided against her claims. Three of the Supreme Judges were not present on the bench, and two others dissented strongly from the decision of the majority, so that this important case was really settled by a minority of the full bench. Mrs. Gaines has spent weary years and a large fortune in prosecuting her claims, and now she not only loses her property, but has a stigma branded on her birth, being denied the title of lawful daughter to Daniel Clark. She was offered large sums a few years ago to effect a compromise, but by grasping at what she deemed her lawful rights, has lost every thing. Such are the glorious hazards of the law.

In the Assembly of New York, last Sabbath, a bill was reported to prevent accidents on railroads. It subjects railroad companies to a penalty of $200 for employing any person known to use intoxicating drinks as a beverage. Provides for punishing indiuiduals for walking upon tracks not in highways, streets, or farm crossings, by a fine of fifty dollars. The injury of any passengers through the negligence of any one employed on a railroad, is a misdemeanor on the part of such agent or servant, and subjects him to fine or imprisonment, in the discretion of the Court. It also requires swing bars where the track crosses streets or highways.

Mr. J. H. Chester, of the city of Cincinnati, has taken measures to secure a patent for a very ingenious "rat trap." It is so constructed that, when Mr. Rat enters and reaches forth to snatch the bait, his weight acts upon a spring trap-door, which suddenly opens, and precipitates him into a dark chamber, in which he can see only one speck of light; for that he rushes into another chamber, and, by doing so, sets the spring of the trap-door by touching a lever; and in this manner the trap is re-set and kept set for any length of time by the animals themselves, so that, without any trouble but to the rats, a whole box-full may be caught.

The New Orleans papers contain a full account of Caravajal's attack on Camargo. Caravajal's version states that the Mexicans were completely routed. He admits, however, that the revolutionary force was afterward seized with an unaccountable panic, and that they all fled, except about thirty, and these subsequently retreated to the American side of the river. On the other hand, Canales says the adventurers were completely beaten, and forced to retreat with great loss.

The Musical World says that a house in this City once occupied by Gen. Washington is now a music store. Washington's bedroom is filled with drums, trumpets, ophecleides and trombones; his study is hung round with fiddles, violoncellos, double-basses, guitars, banjos, and all manner of stringed instruments; the library shelves are piled with pieces of music; the old reception and drawing rooms now compose the general sales rooms, and the remainder of the building is similarly disposed of.

The Boston Traveler gives a long description of the machine, now being manufactured in that city, to drill the Hoosac Mountain. It consists principally of a large revolving wheel, which is made to cut a circle of twenty-four feet. In the center of the wheel is a drill; after a certain depth has been cut and drilled in the rock, a charge of powder is put in the drill hole, and all the rock blown out for twenty-four feet at one blast.

A woman and her two children were found frozen to death in a snow-bank at St. Louis on the night of the 11th ult. At Cincinnati, on the night of the 17th, a woman and a boy were frozen to death. On the following day, near that city, two men were found nearly frozen. One of them was so badly frostbitten that portions of his arms, legs and face had commenced peeling off.

It is proposed to erect thirteen monuments upon Independence Square, in Philadelphia, commemorative of the Old Thirteen States, and of the Declaration of Independence. The Massachusetts Legislature has decided to send a delegate to the Convention to be held in Philadelphia on the 4th July, 1852, for the purpose of taking measures to erect these monuments.

The last sermon preached by Rev. D. Winton, United Presbyterian missionary, previous to his embarking on board the Amazon, was in one of the Glasgow churches, and was from the words of the 12th verse of the sixty-sixth Psalm:—"We went through fire and through water; but thou broughtest us out into a wealthy place."

A gentleman of New Orleans promises to give $20,000 toward the enlargement and completion of the asylum, not long since commenced, for the relief of indigent females and helpless infants, if a sufficient number of persons can be found who will contribute together the sum of $10,000—making $30,000 in all.

The Society of Antiquaries, at London, have found a very perfect Roman leaf-shaped sword-blade of bronze, taken from the bed of the Thames, near Kingston, where Cæsar is supposed to have crossed the river with his army. The superincumbent material was chiefly gravel, of nine feet in depth. Similar relics of Roman power in Britain have been lately discovered in Lincolnshire. Some Anglo-Saxon memorials were also dug up in Cambridgeshire, near Little Wilbraham.

The Canajoharie Creek broke up on Thursday night, March 11, and nearly drowned the village of Canajoharie. The first stories and basements are full of water and ice. The creek bridge was carried away, and a large amount of merchandize entirely destroyed, and some much injured. The cause of the accident was the neglect of the State officers to break up the aqueduct and cut out the ice lodged there by previous freshets.

The late Captain Perez Walker, of Sturbridge, during many years, made liberal donations for benevolent purposes. Amherst College was one of the objects of his bounty, and he sustained a missionary at the West for a number of years. The bequests in his will are as follows:—A. B. C. F. Missions, $500; Home Missionary Society, $500; Tract Society, $250; Education Society, $250; American Bible Society, $250. Total $1,750.

A new edition of Encyclopedia Britannica is announced by Adam & Black, of Edinburgh, in 21 vols. 4to., illustrated by 500 engravings on steel, and many thousands on wood. The work will be carefully re-written, where necessary, by eminent men. It will be published in monthly parts at the rate of four volumes a year. It has been published eighty years, and 35,000 copies have been sold.

The Messrs. Belcher of the St. Louis sugar refinery, are digging an Artesian Well on their premises, with every prospect of ultimately obtaining an abundant supply of pure water, for the use of that extensive establishment. They have already attained a depth of 1,275 feet below the surface, or 745 feet below the level of the sea, and they expect to go some 500 feet deeper.

The fine steamboat C. Vanderbilt, Captain Joel Stone, having been thoroughly overhauled, repaired, and beautifully decorated and newly furnished, has taken her place in the Stonington Line of steamers. The steamers of this line have enjoyed deserved popularity for years past, and bid fair to be more attractive than ever during the coming season.

It is understood that the large squadron which is about being fitted out under Commodore Perry, with the ostensible and primary purpose of visiting Japan, is also designed to keep an eye on the Sandwich Islands, and to be in readiness to check any movements which Louis Napoleon or any other foreign power may be disposed to make against that nation.

The Cincinnati Atlas of the 21st says, that on the 19th M. Kossuth and four of his suite, Paul Hajuk, Col. Count Bethlen, P. A. Nagy and M. Straser, were initiated members of the Cincinnati Lodge of Free Masons, and taken through the First Degree. The others, up to Master Mason, will be conferred on each succeeding evening.

The Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad Company have enjoined upon all those connected with the different trains, abstinence from the use of intoxicating drinks while in the discharge of their respective duties. They have also abolished the sale of alcoholic liquors at the several stations along the Road.

A mechanic of Cincinnati has built a fire engine to which he attaches steam. The machine was tested a few days ago, and although not in perfect order, steam was raised and water thrown with great rapidity in nine minutes. Five minutes is all the time claimed as essential by the patentee. The experiment was satisfactory.

The New York Express says that before the commencement of business, in the Senate of this State, on Monday, the prayer which is usually offered, was made by Rabbi Wise, the minister of the Jewish Synagogue in Albany. Rabbi Wise is a German by birth, and is one of the most talented of the Hebrew Clergy in this country.

The editors of the newspapers in Washington are talking of a Convention for self-protection. For instance, that persons advertising and wishing an editorial notice, shall pay for such notice, in addition to the advertisement. In England an editorial notice is charged twenty times the price of the advertisement.

The Panama Echo of the 13th contains the following paragraph: "Senor Louis Durand, of this city, late resident on Santa Anna Plaza, outside the city walls, died last night, aged 90 years. He had a family of over one hundred children. They are actually his own children, of the first generation."

Dr. Isaac Thompson, who was celebrated ten or twenty years ago as the proprietor of "Thompson's Eye Water," and also made a fortune in that business, died in New London recently. He was a native of Stratford, and is said to have been a very good man.

The Legislatures of Rhode Island, New Jersey, Ohio and Indiana, have severally refused to enact the Maine Law for their respective States, whether with or without submission to the People; those of New York and Pennsylvania are doubtless preparing to folfow the bad example.

The legislature of Rhode Island have passed an act legalizing Christmas day, Fourth of July, Thanksgiving day, and Fast days, either national or State, and New Year's day, as holidays, and making all business paper falling due on these days payable on the next previous.

The Henry Clay Medal has been stolen. Charles Butler was bringing it from Washington in his carpet-bag. When he arrived at New York, he took a carriage, giving the bag to the driver. But on arriving at his house in 14th-st., the bag and the medal were missing.

During the last seven years, 243 wrecked vessels were brought into Key West, valued with their cargoes at 7½ millions of dollars, and the salvage allowed was $723,644, and the total expenses $1,272,569.

It is calculated, says the Boston Mail, that over 3,000 persons have left Boston and vicinity during the last two years for California, and hundreds are now awaiting for a voyage to El Dorado.

At the completion of the New Haven and New London railroad, on the 1st of June, there is to be a connection formed at Norwich with the road to Worcester, and soon another from Daysville to the Norfolk road, by which a line will be formed from New Haven to Boston, 29 miles shorter than the route by way of Springfield, and but one change of cars in the distance.

It seems that two or three of the accidents which have lately occurred on the Erie Railroad were occasioned by the breaking of rails, and that such rails were of American iron. The Company, in consequence of these accidents, have resolved to take up all the American iron and replace it with a stronger article. There is about ten miles of it.

Professor Emmons, State Geologist of North Carolina, in a letter to the Governor, expresses the fullest confidence that there is an almost inexhaustible source of coal in that State. Preliminary examinations at several points establish the fact that the stratum is seven feet thick, and the quality excellent.

For the ten appointments of West-Point Cadets at large in the gift of the President, which have usually been distributed among the sons of deceased officers who distinguished themselves in the Army and Navy, there are no less than fifteen hundred applications, or about one hundred and fifty candidates for each place.

The examination of John Dixey, at Boston, for being accessory to the plundering of bark Missouri of $20,000 in specie, resulted in his being committed for trial in default of bail for $5,000. There are now four persons held for this robbery.

It is said that the Japan Squadron will take out, in addition to its regular armament, about twenty beautiful brass guns, fitted for boat or land service, from each of which nine shots can be discharged every minute.

DIED,

In Charlestown, R. I., Feb. 9th, 1852, Miss LUCETTA WORDEN, aged 13 years.

In South Kingston, R. I., Feb. 15th, 1852, Mrs. MERCY GREENE, wife of Mr. Benjamin Greene, in the 40th year of her age. The deceased was a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church at South Kingston. For a number of years previous to her death she was deprived of her reason. Up to that time she was a consistent follower of Christ; and her friends have hope that she has gone where the weary are at rest.

"Ah! dearest, we call thee, we mourn thee in vain;
Heaven hath claimed thee! and never again
May the song of birds, or the voice of love,
Thy form from its dreamless slumber move—
An eternal spring where the angels rove,
Beloved! thy spirit hath found!"

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Miscellaneous.

Weather Wisdom.

The following are a few of the "old saws" relating to the weather, which abound in Great Britain.

"A rainbow in the morning
Gives the shepherd warning;
A rainbow at night
Is the shepherd's delight."

"Evening red, and next morning gray,
Are certain signs of a beautiful day."

"When the glow-worm lights her lamp,
Sure the air is always damp."

"If a cock goes crowing to bed,
He'll certainly rise with a watery head."

"When you see a gossamer flying,
Be sure the air is drying."

"When black snails cross your path,
Black cloud much moisture hath."

"When the peacock loudly bawls,
Soon we'll have both rain and squalls."

"If the moon shows like a silver shield.
Be not afraid to reap your field."

"When rooks fly sporting high in air,
It shows that windy storms are near."

Dahomey and its Customs.

Mr. Forbes, of the British service, has published journals of two visits to the King of Dahomey and residence at his capital in the years 1849 and 1850. From an account of this work in the Missionary Record, are derived the following particulars of this savage people.

Extent and Business of Dahomey.

Dahomey extends from the banks of the Niger to those of the Volta, and from the coast to the Kong mountains; its seaport is Whydah. It is the principal support of the slave-trade, north of the line; and could the King be persuaded to give up this infamous traffic, it would cease along nearly the whole nothern coast of Africa. The population of Dahomey does not exceed 200,000, of which not more than 30,000 are free. The regular army consists of 12,000, and of these, 5,000 are Amazons or women soldiers, trained to warlike exercises, fully armed, forming the main strength of the army, and rivaling in courage and in deeds of blood the male troops. The whole population is at the disposal of the King, and is just in fact an armed association, whose sole object is to hunt for slaves, and whose time is occupied by warlike expeditions and festivals. When the King goes to war, he levies about 24,000 soldiers, and about as many camp followers, and thus he moves on his desolating expeditions with nearly a fourth part of his people. At certain of the annual customs, it is usual for the soldiers, both male and female, in their songs and addresses, to demand that some neighboring town or nation be given up to them; when this demand has been made for three successive years, it is generally granted, and the ruin of that people becomes the object of the annual slave-hunt. The soldiers have no regular pay. Their support is derived from presents which the King throws to them on one of the festival days, and from rewards granted for captives, and for heads taken in war. They have thus a pecuniary interest in these bloody expeditions. The months of August and September are occupied in serving out ammunition, and in preparing for war. The King then "makes a custom to the memory of his father, which generally lasts a month." In November or December, the army, headed by the King, sets out upon the annual slave-hunt. It marches stealthily, and pounces on the devoted city; and should the attack be successful, it massacres ruthlessly the old and the weak, and carries off those only that are fit for the slave-market. The whole district is reduced to desolation. The army returns home in barbarous triumph; and the other months of the year are spent in feasting and in the celebration of the national customs. During these, the people are kept "in a fever of excitement, dancing, singing, haranguing, and cutting off heads." The country, though fertile, is but thinly inhabited; industry and agriculture are not encouraged, as such pursuits would interfere with slave-hunting; and all around them are ruin and devastation; the mad passion for war and blood absorbs every feeling, and this passion, fed by their national customs, makes them a band of brutal executioners.

Savage Bards.

Mr. Forbes thus describes the scene when various bards of both sexes exhibited before the King and his court:—

The place of exhibition was an extensive square. On one side, under a rich canopy of umbrellas of every color, and ornamented with strange devices, on a couch, reclined the King. Behind him, and on each side, sat his wives and female soldiers, in all about three thousand, all well dressed. The Amazons in uniform, armed and accoutred, squatted on their hams, their long Danish muskets on end, with the stocks on the ground. Opposite the King, and in front, were the chief ministers, wallowing, according to custom, on the ground, and throwing dust upon their heads; and behind them a large crowd of officers and soldiers, all on their hams. Near the neutral ground, between the female and male portions of the audience, which no male but the King can pass, a place was set apart for the English visitors. For their accommodation, a table, having a silver liquor-stand, with glasses and chairs, was provided. Mr. Forbes then says, A strict silence reigned, save when broken at short intervals by the voice of a herald proclaiming aloud the conquests of the Kings of Dahomey. The scene was novel, and the dresses (from color) magnificent in appearance. We were no sooner seated than two troubadours advanced and introduced themselves; then, one at a time, they sang in short metrical verse the praises of the monarch, his exploits in war, his numerous conquests, the "glorious" achievements of his ancestors. "Gezo," sang the troubadours, "was the choice of the nation! the liberal! the free-handed! who so generous as he? who so brave? Behold him, the King of kings!!"

At this stage of the proceedings, the following horrible occurrence took place: "With much ceremony two large calabashes, containing the skulls of kings, ornamented with copper, brass, coral, &c., were brought in and placed on the neutral ground. Some formed the heads of walking-sticks, distaffs, while those of chiefs and war-men ornamented drums, umbrellas, surmounted standards, and decorated doorways. They were on all sides in thousands; these calabashes were placed on a newly-raised heap of earth, which, we were now told, covered the body of a victim, sacrified last night, to be placed under the pole of the pavilion, to be raised for his majesty's court for to-morrow's custom."

Two female bards then stepped forward and sang the praises "of him who," they said, "gave them birth. We were women—we are now men. Gezo has born us again; we are his wives, his daughters, his soldiers, his sandals. War is our pastime; it clothes, it feeds, it is all to us."

Human Sacrifices.

The next day's ceremonies closed with throwing human victims to the soldiers. It is a fearful illustration of the depths of cruelty and degradation to which man may sink.

Fourteen human beings were brought on the platform, carried on men's heads. "These sturdy men," says Mr. Forbes, "met the gaze of their persecutors with a firmness perfectly astonishing. Not a single sigh was breathed. In all my life, I never saw such coolness so near death." Messrs. Forbes and Becroft, whose feelings were deeply excited, having succeeded in buying off three of the victims for a hundred dollars each, declined witnessing the horrid tragedy that was to follow. The King insisted on their viewing the place of the sacifice. They looked over the side of the platform. "Immediately under the royal stand, within the brake of acacia bushes, stood seven or eight fell ruffians, some armed with clubs, others with scimitars, grinning horribly. As we approached, the mob yelled fearfully, and called upon the King to 'feed them; they were hungry.'" The English withdrew to their seats, and as they did so, "a fearful yell rent the air. The victims were held high above the heads of their bearers, and the ruffians thus acknowledged the munificence of their prince. Silence again ruled, and the King made a speech, stating that of his prisoners he gave a portion to his soldiers, as his father and grandfather had done before. These were Attahpahms. Having called their names, the one nearest was divested of his clothes, the foot of the basket placed on the parappet, when the King gave the upper part an impetus, and the victim fell at once into the pit beneath. A fall of upwards of twelve feet might have stunned him, and before sense could return, the head was cut off, and the body thrown to the mob, who now, armed with clubs and branches, brutally mutilated and dragged it to a distant pit, where it was left as food for the beasts and birds of pray. After the third victim had thus been sacrificed, the King retired, and the chiefs and slave-dealers completed the deed which the monarch blushed to finish."

Offsetting with Uncle Sam.

A late trial in the United States District Court has disclosed a most remarkable charge of the Judge to the Jury, as regards "offsets." The case is briefly as follows:—

In 1843 a United States Marshal of one of the Southern States, was declared a defaulter in the sum of $4,140 20. This Marshal was a slave-owner, and previous to the invasion of Florida in 1818, four of his negroes left him, and took refuge among the Suwanee Indians. The master did not pursue them, nor take any steps to reclaim them. In 1818 the U. S. troops attacked these Indians, dispersed them, and destroyed their settlement, and the master never heard of his four negroes afterward. In 1828 this master, who was afterward Marshal, presented his claim for damages, by reason of the loss of these four negroes, who had run away before the invasion, and whom he had made no effort to reclaim. Under the law of Congress, the U. S. Judge of Florida was made a Commissioner to pass upon claims for damages occasioned by the invasion, and his finding was to be reported to the Secretary of the Treasury, who was to approve or reject.

The claim for these negroes was allowed by the Commissioner in 1828, and the damages stated at $1,600; but, on being reviewed by Mr. Secretary Bush, it was wholly and entirely repudiated.

Afterward, and when Mr. Robert J. Walker was Secretary of the Treasury, this defaulting U. S. Marshal applied to him to re-open and revise the decision of Mr. Bush, but it was not done. Another application was made to Secretary Meredith, who examined and reported minutely upon the case, and refused to re-open; and lastly, Mr. Secretary Corwin was applied to for a rehearing and revision, which was again refused.

Well, in 1851, a trial was had in the U. S. District Court, of a suit brought against this U. S. Marshal and his sureties, in an action of debt upon his official bond. The defendants claimed an offset of $1,600 and interest, for damages sustained by the loss of four negroes a quarter of a century ago, and which had again and again been repudiated by the Government, insisting that had it not been for the invasion of Florida, his negroes would have "come home" again, or he could have caught them. And a U. S. District Judge admitted the offset, and directed the jury to allow it, and they found accordingly.

Anecdote of Lady Washington.

In conversation with an aged lady of Whippany, an anecdote was related to me concerning Mrs. Washington, so entertaining and admirable that it must be repeated.

Her first husband's mother, the wife of Joseph Tuttle, whose monument may be seen in the Whippany burying yard, was a sensible and agreeable woman, whose company was much sought, even by those who, owing to their wealth, moved in more fashionable circles. Among other frequent visitors was Mrs. Troupe, the lady of a half-pay Captain in the British Navy. She is described as a lady of affable manners, and of intelligence, and much esteemed.

One day she visited Mrs. Tuttle, and the usual compliments were hardly passed, before she said, "Well, what do you think, Mrs. T.? I have been to see Lady Washington!"

"Have you, indeed? Then tell me all about how you found her ladyship, how she appeared, and what she said."
